FABRICIUS LUSCINUS (CAIUS) a Roman captain, as commendable for his probity and frugality [A] as for his valour, gave signal proofs of all those accomplishments during the war with Pyrrhus. He was consul for the first time in the year of Rome 471, and gained (a) signal victories over the Samnites, the Brutians, and the Lucanians [B]. He raised the siege of Thurium, and got so considerable a booty, that after having given a large donative to his soldiers, and reimbursed all the citizens of Rome for what each of them had contributed towards the war, he had still four hundred talents left, which were carried into the treasury on the day of his triumph. He was the only man who had not his share of those rich spoils. His colleague was Quintus Æmilius Papus, with whom he was consul a second time in the year 475 (b); but between those two consulships we must place his embassy to Pyrrhus [C]. He was sent to that prince, to treat about the ransom of the prisoners made at the battle which the consul Lævinus had lost in the year 473. Pyrrhus, being informed that Fabricius was very poor, offered him a sum of money (c): which Fabricius refused, tho' they protested, that the king presented it to him, not with design to bribe him to any thing dishonourable, but only as a mark of his friendship. The reflexion Fabricius made at that prince's table, upon what Cineas said concerning the Epicureans, that they

[A] He was commendable for his frugality. He refused not only the presents of Pyrrhus, but likewise those of the Samnites. The thing deserves to be related (1). The ambassadors they sent to him, having enlarged upon the good offices he had done their nation since the peace, desired him to accept a good sum of money, which they were ordered to offer him; urging, he wanted a great many necessary things to furnish his house and table, and that he had not such an equipage as became his rank and merit. Thereupon Fabricius extended his hands from his ears to his eyes, and then laid them on his nose and mouth, and afterwards on his bosom, and so down to his belly, and said to the ambassadors, As long as I can command all the parts I have touched, I shall want nothing: Therefore, having no occasion for money, I will be sure not to receive any from those who I know want it. All the plate he had consisted in a silver cup and saltcellar; and he would not allow generals to have any more: (2) Bellicosos imperatores plus quam pateram & salinum ex argento habere vetabat. He lived upon herbs, which he plucked and cultivated himself (3).

[B] He gained signal victories over the Samnites, Brutians, and Lucanians. Signonius (4) had not groped in the dark, as he has done as to this consulship, and would not have said that Fabricius triumphed over the Tuscans and Gauls, if he had known what I have quoted out of Dionysius Halicarnassensis. He is to be blamed for applying to the second consulship of Fabricius, what Valerius Maximus relates of the raising of the siege of Thurium (5); in which action the Romans pretended the god Mars had visibly fought for them (6). Compare that with the St George of our Croyfades. The raising of that siege happened under the first consulship of Fabricius (7). The city of Thurium raised a statue to its deliverer (8).

[C] We must place between those two consulships his embassy to Pyrrhus. Authors disagree as to the time of that embassy: some will have it, that Fabricius was sent to Pyrrhus before the arrival of Cineas at Rome (9); Eutrop. lib. ii. others made the supreme good to consist in a voluptuous life, altogether free from public affairs, and did not believe that the gods troubled themselves with the government of the world; the reflexion, I say, which Fabricius made thereupon, crying out, Heaven grant Pyrrhus and the Samnites may relish that philosophy as long as they are in war with us (d)! was not the least thing which made Pyrrhus conceive a great opinion of the Romans. He liked Fabricius to that degree, that he offered him the first place in his council and his armies, if he would go along with him after the peace (e). The Roman, with his usual plainness, answered him, It is by no means for your interest to have me near you; for those who honour and admire you now, would rather chuse me for their king, if they knew what I can do. Tho' this answer was not very obliging, yet Pyrrhus did not seem offended at it; nor did it hinder Fabricius from obtaining satisfaction about the subject matter of his embassy. During his consulship in the year 475, he gave Pyrrhus a great instance of his probity, by giving him notice, that his own physician offered to poison him [D], provided he was sure of a recompence. It is in this year we ought to place the battle of Asculum, which was the second against Pyrrhus [E]. The most probable opinion is, that the Romans lost it [F]; but that it cost the conqueror so many brave men, that he hoped no advantage from the continuation of the war; so that he was very glad to see himself called to the assistance of the Sicilians. Fabricius was censor in the year 478; and his colleague (f) was the same Æmilius Papus, with whom he had twice been consul. Both of them gave an instance of severe regularity, by degrading (g) a senator, named Cornelius Rufinus, who had been dictator, and twice consul, only because they found in his house silver plate for the use of his table, to the weight of ten pounds. Fabricius had long hated that man; and nevertheless he served him, towards the obtaining the consulship, at a time when he thought him more capable than his others put it back till after the return of Cineas to his master. Plutarch (10) is of this last opinion. What is most certain is, that Pyrrhus did nothing considerable during the second campaign; for the two first battles were fought, the one during the first campaign, the other during the third; the year between being spent in proposals of peace.

Now it was in the interval that Fabricius went to Pyrrhus, and that Cineas was sent to the Romans: but which of the two set out first, is what cannot be determined with any certainty. Adhuc sub judice lis est.

[D] He gave Pyrrhus notice, that his own physician offered to poison him. Authors differ extremely concerning this fact: some (11) say, that an unknown man brought to Fabricius a letter from Pyrrhus's physician, by which he promised to poison his master if they would give him a good recompence for it; and that Fabricius, abhorring such a proposal, wrote, jointly with his colleague, to Pyrrhus, and sent him the physician's letter. The substance of the letter written by the two consuls is in Plutarch, who afterwards describes the battle of Asculum as a passage posterior to that. Others say (12), that after the two first battles won by Pyrrhus, one Timochares came secretly to the consul Fabricius, and promised him, that, provided they could agree upon the reward, he would poison Pyrrhus; which he might do easily, because his two sons were cup bearers to that monarch. Fabricius informed the senate of it, who sent ambassadors to Pyrrhus, to warn him, in general, to be upon his guard against his domestics; but who were not to mention any thing of Timochares. They had a mind to shew some regard to a man who had been willing to do them service, and at the same time to be generous towards the king. Timochares nomen suppressit, utroque modo equitatem amplexus, quia nec hostem malo exemplo tollere, neque eum qui bene mereri paratus fuerat prodere voluit (13).

They suppressed the name of Timochares, maintaining a strict regard for justice to both; for neither would they take off an enemy by any unwarrantable practices, nor betray the man that offered to do them service. Others (14) affirm, that he who came to Pyrrhus was named Nicias; and that he was sent by the two consuls, and not by the senate. They quote the consul's letter word by word; but it is not the same with that whose substance we find in Plutarch. Some will have it (15), that the name of Pyrrhus's physician was Cineas; that he wrote to the senate of Rome; and that the senate, rejecting his proposal, communicated it to Pyrrhus. Others (16) say, that Fabricius sent back to Pyrrhus the deserter who offered to poison him, and that the senate approved what Fabricius had done. There are some (17) who pretend, that Pyrrhus's physician went himself to Fabricius, and that the latter sent him bound hand and foot to his master. Florus (18) robs Fabricius entirely of the honour of this action, to give it to Curius, Medicum venale regis Pyrrhi caput afferentem Curius remisit. — Curius sent back the physician who proffered to sell the life of his master Pyrrhus. Wherein he was not so good a judge as Pyrrhus, who by those actions knew Fabricius again, and cried out, That it was he, and no other, whom it would be more difficult to divert from the accustomed road of virtue, than the sun from it's ordinary course (19). Among so many different opinions of the ancients, it is no wonder to me if those who cite these passages sometimes mistake the one for the other. See Friethemius upon Florus, and you will find he relates altogether wrong what Aulus Gellius had taken from Valerius Antias, and Quadrigarius. I will make no reflexions upon that great variety of accounts, but shall leave it to every one's judgment, and content myself to say, that we should not have facts transmitted to us with such a medley of circumstances, if authors could cure themselves of these two faults: first, the trusting too much to their memory; secondly, the liberty they take to give great examples such a turn as best fits the subject they treat of. As for moral reflexions upon the probity of the ancient Romans, so much superior to that of our times, they are obvious to every body, without my mentioning them. See the 120th epistle of Seneca.

[E] The battle of Asculum . . . was the second against Pyrrhus. They reckon generally but three battles between that prince and the Romans; the two first of which preceded his journey into Sicily, and the other was fought after his return into Italy. But those who say, that the consul P. Decius was killed in a battle against Pyrrhus (20), must of necessity suppose, either that there have been four battles (21), or that there was none fought between Pyrrhus and Fabricius: for it is certain, that the consulship of P. Decius preceded the second consulship of Fabricius, and followed that of Lævinus, under which the first battle was fought. Eutropius, who places the second under the consulship of Decius, says, that Pyrrhus went into Sicily the following year; and that the consul Fabricius had only to do with the Samnites and the Lucanians, over whom he triumphed. Plutarch and Florus positively affirm, that the second battle was fought between Pyrrhus and Fabricius. How can we trust old historians in things little remarkable, since the years of the most decisive battles are not certain?

[F] The most probable opinion is, that the Romans lost it. The ancients had, as well as we, some Senef battles, of which each party claimed the victory, and for which they returned thanks to heaven with solemn pomp. See what is said concerning the battle of Asculum, in the remark (M) of the article PYRRHUS. In some respects, nothing is more easy than for providence to please every body. When people are in war, they seldom own that fortune has been favourable

Which action of his, had it not been justly applauded, would never have been followed by his son-in-law in his fourth consulship, nor again would the son of the latter, when consul, have offered him self the third successor against Pyrrhus. his competitors to discharge that office for the good of the commonwealth. He had a fine saying about it, which is related by Cicero [G]. It is no wonder that such a man died so poor, that the public was obliged to give his daughter a portion to marry her [H]. I find in no author what Moreri relates, that the senate were at the charge of his funeral. I only knew, that, to honour his virtue (b), they made an exception, in his favour, to the law of the twelve tables, which allowed no body to be buried within the city of Rome.

to the enemy; they generally give out he has been beaten, and has a thousand reasons to be uneasy. If the enemy has had any success, they insult over him for not improving it better: they suppose he had formed a hundred great designs; and that being so far out in his reckoning, he ought to be the object of public laughter. There are no men that want so little to be exhorted to celebrate and rehearse the blessings of God, as public news-writers: they might well be excepted out of a cantic that may be made after the pattern of that of the three Hebrew children. They admirably well obey the precept, rejoice evermore (22). [G] He had a fine saying about it. This P. Cornelius Rufinus was a brave man and a great commander, but prodigiously covetous and rapacious (23). He stood for the consulship at a time when the commonwealth was in danger; and his competitors were men who did not underland the war, and who had no merit. Fabricius, though he hated him, did nevertheless use all his interest in his favour. Some, who very much wondered at it, asking him the reason why he did so, Because, answered he, I had rather be plundered than sold. Nil est quod miremini si malui compilari quam venire (24). Cicero pretends, that Fabri-

[H] The public was obliged to give his daughter a portion. I shall quote two authors for it. 'Senatus Fabricii Lusini, Scipionisque filias ab indotatis nuptiis liberalitate sua vindicavit quoniam paternæ hæreditati præter optimam gloriam nihil erat quod acceptum referrent (26). — The senate, by their liberality, supplied the want of fortunes to the daughters of Fabricius Lusinus, and Scipio; the only pair-mony which they could boast of being honour. That is the first. The second is Apuleius: 'Quod si modo judices de causa ista federent C. Fabricius, Cn. Scipio, Manius Curius, quorum filiae ob paupertatem de publico dotibus donatæ ad maritos ierunt, portantes gloriam domesticam pecuniam publicam (27). — *Were C. Fabricius, Cn. FABRICIUS (VINCENT), a native of Hamburg, in the XVIIth century, has been famous by his wit and learning, and the political employments he has discharged. He was both a good poet and physician, an able orator, and a learned lawyer. He gained the esteem of the most learned men in Holland, whilst he studied at Leyden; and they liked his Latin poems so well, that they advised him to print them; which he did in the year 1632. That edition was followed by some others [A]. He was, for some time, counsellor to the bishop of Lubec, and afterwards syndic of the town of Dantzic: which town honoured him with the dignity of burgomaster, and sent him thirteen times as it's deputy into Poland. He died at Warsaw, during the diet of the kingdom, on the eleventh of April 1667, being fifty four years old. A collection of his works was printed in 1685, by the care of Frederic Fabricius his son (a). See the remark.

(a) Taken from the Journal of Leipsic, for the month of June 1685, pag. 279, 279.

[A] That edition of his poems was followed by some others. I must not forget that he was principally encouraged by the famous Daniel Heinsius, at whose house he lodged, to print his Latin verses. He was not very well pleased with that first edition, and therefore he put out another, corrected and improved, in the year 1638. He added to it a satire in prose, which he dedicated to Salmasius, and is intitled, Præfatus paratus: wherein the makers of anagrams, and of leud and extemporary verses, and such as despise the poets, are most bitterly railed at. Note, that he made a poem, which a physician of Geneva (1) inserted in the second part of his Medicina septentrionalis collati-tia. Here follows what was said of it in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, when an abstract of that physician's book was given. 'That is perhaps less surprising than the adventure of the Dutch maid, who was confined to a garden as soon as three plague-sores appeared on her body, during the horrible pestilence in the year 1636. She thought on nothing but on her journey to the other world, when a young man, who loved her, bestowed no other remedy upon her than the most amorous embraces he was capable of; and perceiving they were of some virtue, and the better to repeat the dose, he went and lay every night with his infected mistress. She perfectly recovered, and he got no harm by it. This occasioned a fine Latin poem, which Vincent Fabricius dedicated to Salmasius, and which was soon after printed at Hamburg. It is inserted here at large, p. 210 (2). The subject was as favourable as a poet could wish, and I am sure Mr la Fontaine would have made a very diverting tale of it: which might have been intitled, Love the best Physician. Let us leave to the disciples of Hippocrates and Galen, to make inquiries into the natural cause of that little prodigy. What triumph of love is here! If that passion makes the dullest witty, it also gives courage to the most timorous; for in all probability, the gallant of that maid had run away like a hunted hare from the encounter of a fellow infected with the plague; but because he was in love with the infected woman, and had a fair opportunity to satisfy his passion, he dared and laughed at the danger, and was so lucky as to find, by experience, that fortune favours the bold (3).

The most complete edition of our Fabricius's poems, is that of Leipsic (1685; for besides the verses contained in the edition of Leyden 1638, it contains many others never before printed. It also comprehends many adopted pieces; and both the speeches the author made to the kings of Poland, and that he pronounced at Leyden in 1632, De obsidione & liberatione urbis Leidenensis, besides the theses of physic which he defended in the same city in 1634, &c (4).

FAKREDDIN (a), prince of the Drusians in Syria, was driven out of his dominions by the Turks, and fled to Malta, then to Florence, and afterwards to Rome, about the year 1620 (b). He pretended to be related to the duke of Lorraine. The desire of reigning made him return to mount Libanus. He gave fresh jealousy to the Turks, who made war upon him. He was persuaded to go to Constantinople to vindicate himself, and had his head cut off in that city. Mir Ali, his son, succeeded him, him, and was succeeded by his son Mir Achmed Bin Mahan; and it is the son of this last who reigns at present (c). These people had formerly several emirs; but Ibrahim, basba of Cairo, subdued them all in 1584, under Amurath III. Thirty or forty years after this Fakreddin seized several fortresses (d). The French Mercury (e) mentions his arrival at Florence under the year 1613, and relates some circumstances of it; but who-ever would know his history exactly, and without the trouble of much reading, should have recourse to a work of Mr de la Croix (f): there it appears, that this prince, whom the Arabians called merely Eben Maan, the son of Maan, took the name of Fecred-din, which signifies flambeau, or light of the faith; that he set up for a conqueror, that he oppressed the people he had conquered: that having continued five years in Italy, he returned into his own country in 1618, with vast designs in his head; but not being able to put them in execution he was forced to submit to sultan Amurath, who ordered him to be strangled in his own presence the fourteenth of March 1633.

FANNIA, wife to Caius Titinius (a) a citizen of Minturnæ, dealt very generously with Marius, tho' she was not satisfied with the judgment he had given in a law-suit wherein she was very much concerned. That Woman had lost her Reputation by her leud life; but nevertheless Titinius married her: nay, her very leudness was the chief motive that made him take her to wife, because he expected he might put her away when he would, and keep her portion, if she could be convicted of adultery. He did not fail of an opportunity to put his project in execution; but Fannia stood upon her defence, and had recourse to law. Marius was to be judge, who, as soon as he had been acquainted with the case, took Titinius aside, and advised him to restore Fannia her portion; but not being able to persuade him to it, by a peremptory sentence he adjudged Titinius to give back the portion [A]; and that Fannia should be deemed fully convicted of impudicity, and should pay a fine of a groat (b). Some time after, Marius was obliged to fly from Rome, and was declared an enemy to the commonwealth. He hid himself in the morasses of Minturnæ, from whence he was taken and put under the guard of the magistrates, who provided him a lodging in Fannia's house, because they concluded she would resent the defamatory sentence he had pronounced against her. But they were mistaken: Fannia did herself justice [B], and took all the care imaginable of her gueft (c).

[A] Marius . . . adjudged Titinius to give back the portion.] Nothing could be more just than to force him to it, because he was not unacquainted with Fannia's leud life when he married her. If he had taken her for an honest woman, and desired she should have lived as such, the case had been altered; but in order to seize upon Fannia's great fortune (1), he was well enough contented to be her cuckold for some time. It was not therefore reasonable that he should cease to be so, and have all the benefit of it: And so Marius's sentence was most judicious. 'Mulierem impudicitæ ream festertio nummo, Titinium summa totius dotis damnavit, præfatus idcirco se hunc judicandi modum secutum, quod liqueret sibi Titinium patrimonio Fannia infidias fruenter impudicæ conjugium expetisse (2). — The lady being convicted of the accusation, he fined her a sesterce, and condemned Titinius to restore the whole of her fortune, declaring that he had followed this form of judgment, because it appeared to him, that he had married Fannia to secure her fortune, since he knew of her leud practices before.' Plutarch touches upon the ground of the sentence. 'Ἐφαίνετο καὶ τὴν Φαννίαν ἀπὸ λατῶν γεγονέναι, καὶ τὸν ἀνδρα τοιαύτην εἰδὼτα λαβεῖν, καὶ συμβύσασαι πολλὸν χρόνον. Quum Fanniam constaret impudicam fuisse, & virum qui talem sciret esse eam duxisse, diuque cum ea in matrimonio vixisse (3).

— It was publicly known that Fannia had been a leud woman, and that her husband who knew it married her, and lived a considerable time with her.

[B] Fannia did herself justice.] She knew in her conscience, that she deserved all the infamy Marius had laid upon her; and consequently that he deserved all the esteem one ought to have for a just judge. She had recovered her fortune by Marius's sentence, which was a greater advantage for such a woman as she, than if Marius, in full court, had declared her an honest woman; for he could not thereby have made up the flaws which her amours had made in her reputation. Her neighbours, and in general all her acquaintance, would still have had the same opinion of her virtue as before: And therefore Marius did more sensibly oblige her, by declaring her a whore, and by restoring her her portion, than if he had proclaimed her honest, without allowing her her fortune. When a woman's leud life has once made a noise, she is no longer concerned for her reputation, but she desires then as much or more than ever to have riches, and to enjoy them. We must not therefore wonder, that Fannia behaved herself towards Marius as towards a just judge. See Valerius Maximus, whom I quote in the margin (4). However, we must not doubt but several persons, in the like circumstances, would have abused Marius.

(4) Fannia autem hæc est, quæ postea Marium, hostem a senatu judicatum, eoque paludis, qua extractus erat, oblitum, etiam in domum suam evocandum Minturnis deducum, ope quantacunque potuit, adjuvit: memor, quid impudica judicata esset, suis moribus; quod dotem servasset, illius religioni acceptum ferri debere. Valerius Max. lib. VIII, Cap. II, num. 3.

FANNIA, an illustrious Roman lady, the worthy daughter of the famous Pœtus Thrasea, and worthy grand-daughter of Arria, was so eminently magnanimous and virtuous, that she might not only be a pattern to other women, but likewise be proposed as an example of resolution to men. She followed her husband Helvidius twice into banishment, and was afterwards exiled herself upon his account, that is, because she had desired Senecio to write Helvidius's life, and had furnished him with memoirs. She confessed it openly before the judges [A], and only denied that her mother was privy to

was true, answered, it was. But it is better to hear Pliny speak. 'Bis maritum sequuta in exilium est, tertio ipsa propter maritum relegata. Whether she had furnished him with memoirs: she answered, she had. Whether with the knowledge of her mother: no, replied she. In short she let fall no expression, but what was attended with danger. And notwithstanding the books had been suppressed, and her goods confiscated, she made them the companions, as they had been the cause, of her banishment. If on the one hand, it raises our indignation to see the cringing adulations of an infinite number of Romans, who sued for preferments under the first emperors; we are on the other hand struck with admiration, to see not a few great souls, who preserved the old Roman spirit amidst the public corruption. The author, whose words I have quoted, bestows a thousand praises on Fannia; and acquaints us with one passage, which the curious will be glad to see. It was the custom for the high-priests to appoint certain ladies to take care of the Vestal virgins, who were by sickness obliged to leave their convent; and Fannia being named for that service, she contracted a disease by the extraordinary care she took of one of those Vestal virgins. Angit me Fannia: nix valetudo. Contraxit hanc dum addidet Junia, virgini Vestali, sponte primum, (est enim adfinit) deinde etiam ex auctoritate pontificum. Nam virgines, quum vi morbi atrio Vestæ coguntur excedere, matronarum curæ custodique mandantur. Quo munere Fannia dum sedulo fungitur, hoc discrimine implicita est (2). — I am concerned for Fannia's indisposition, which she contracted by attending Junia, a Vestal virgin, and her relation; her attendance was at first voluntary, and afterwards enjoined by the authority of the high-priests. For when the virgins are by sickness obliged to be removed from their apartments, they are committed to the care and inspection of the matrons. Which service whilst Fannia was discharging with the greatest fidelity, she was unhappily seized with a fit of sickness.

FANNIUS, a Roman family. We are going to mention some persons that belong to it; and we shall not forget Moreri's faults [A].

(1) He should have said Cæsarpinus.

[A] We shall not forget Moreri's faults. I. He places the questorship of Caius Fannius under the consulship of C. Calpurnius (1) Piso & M. Popilius Lænas, and in the year of Rome 611. Here are two mistakes; for that Fannius was questor in the year 614, and that consulship does not fall in the year 611, but in the year 614 of Rome. II. Fannius Strabo was not twice consul, but only once; the consulship of the year 632, which is ascribed to him by Moreri, belongs to Caius Fannius, son to the other. III. These words, perhaps this Fannius, consul in the year 632, was son to the first, are absurd; for there is no body but will explain them thus, perhaps he was son to the first Fannius, of whom I (Moreri) have spoken. Now that first Fannius is the annalist, who, far from being Fannius Strabo's father, is only his nephew. If to excuse Moreri, you suppose that his first Fannius is Fannius Strabo, you will expose him to three reproaches: his pitiful way of expressing himself; his affirming a thing, of which he speaks doubtfully some lines after; and his being ignorant of a known truth. There is no reason to doubt, that Domitius Enobarbus's colleague, in the consulship of the year 632, was son to the consul of the year 592 (2). Let us pass on to other faults. IV. Fannius, Pliny the younger's friend, did not compose a history that was lost. Indeed it was lost in process of time, with an infinite number of other books; but there is no doubt but it was extant a long time: and after all, it is very false that Pliny mentions the loss of that history. Moreri, who affirms it, shews he did not understand the Latin of Vossius, who having related Pliny's lamentations (3), because Fannius's death had overthrown the preparations of a great work, makes this sad reflexion (4). Ita profecto est, nam ut alibi de alio loquitur Plinius (5), omnia illa cum ipso sine fructu posteritatis obierunt. — It is indeed so, as Pliny speaks on a like occasion in another place, all those labours died with him, without any advantage to posterity. Moreri did not understand that this passage of Pliny does not relate to Fannius's works, but to another man's, as Vossius expressly remarks. It is true, Vossius has made use of the words of Pliny, to express what became, in time, of those works of Fannius. That is the least privilege of the art of applications: the same words, which would be most false in the book of the first author, are most true when, a thousand years after, they are applied to other matters. Moreri was so well satisfied that Pliny spoke of his Fannius in the ninth letter of the fifth book, that he has quoted it at the bottom of the article. V. He should not have said, that Fannius's poems were placed with his picture in the temple of Apollo and the Muses, and in a public library. This is beyond hyperbole: this is not to magnify an object, but to give a quite different idea. It is almost as much as to say, that Fannius's image became an idol, an object of people's devotions in the temple of false gods; than which nothing can be more false: For the most that can be said, is, that the poems and picture of Fannius were put in Augustus's library. I own, that that library was put in a temple of Apollo (6); but that ought to be taken in the same sense, as when we say now, that there is a fine library in the cathedral church of such a place; and it is no less absurd to confound those two phrases, To put a picture in the cathedral church, to put a picture in the library of a cathedral church; than to take for the same thing, to put the picture of a poet in the temple of Apollo, to put the picture of a poet in the library of the temple of Apollo. Let us therefore confess, that Vossius has ill expressed himself in relation to Fannius (7): his negligence has deceived Moreri; but however, the latter should have taken notice of the disjunctive etiam; which if he had done, he would not have said, that Fannius's works were placed with his picture in the temple of Apollo and the Muses, and in a public library. The copulative etiam, instead of the disjunctive or, and the omission of etiam, are in this place a prodigious fault: for it not only multiplies things without necessity, but gives us also to understand, that the honour which was done to Fannius, when his picture was placed in a public library, was of another nature than that which was done him when his image was placed in the temple of Apollo. If it was of another nature, what could it be less than a kind of consecration, and a sort of idolatry? Moreri cannot be excused, by saying, that by the temple of Apollo he meant the library of that temple; for the particle etiam, of which he has made use, robs him of that subterfuge. Was not that library public?

FANNIUS STRABO (CAIUS) a Roman consul with Valerius Messala in the year of Rome 592. That consulship is remarkable for two things: I. For the regulations made by the senate concerning the expence of feasts; II. For a decree of the senate, VOL. III. B authorizing authorizing the pretor (a) to expel the rhetoricians and philosophers from Rome [A]. They were not satisfied with the regulations which the senate made to restrain the profuseness of feasts, there was also a law made about it, which from the consul Fannius was called Fannia [B]. We shall mention elsewhere (b) the excesses which made way for it. I find nothing

[A] To expel the rhetoricians and philosophers from Rome. Suetonius (1) and Aulus Gellius acquaint us with it. These are Aulus Gellius's words. 'C. Fannio Strabone, M. Valerio Messala Coss. Senatus-consultum de Philosophis & de Rhetoribus Latinis factum est. M. Pomponius Prætor Senatui consuluit. Quod verba facta sunt de Philosophis & de Rhetoribus, de ea re ita censuerunt. Uti M. Pomponius Prætor animadverteret, curareque uti ei de republica fideque sua videretur, uti Romæ ne essent (2). —

(1) Sueton. de clar. Rhetorib. cap. i.
(2) Aul. Gell. lib. xv, cap. xi.

In the consulship of C. Fannius Strabo, and Marcus Valerius Messala, a decree was made concerning the philosophers and rhetoricians of Rome. M. Pomponius, the pretor, asked the opinion of the senate. The affair of the philosophers and rhetoricians was discussed, and they came to this determination; that M. Pomponius the pretor should take effectual care, agreeably to the interest of the republic, and his own duty, to clear the city of them.

[B] A law which . . . was called Fannia. Aulus Gellius speaks distinctly of that law, and of the senate's decree, as of two things which followed one another. The senate's decree was first made, and the law afterwards. 'Legi adeo nuper in Capitonis Atci conjectaneis senatus decretum vetus C. Fannio & M. Valerio Messala Coss. factum; in quo jubentur principes civitatis, qui ludis Megalensibus antiquo ritu mutitarent, id est, mutua convivia agitant, jurare apud Consules verbis conceptis, non amplius in singulas cenas sumptus esse facturos, quam centenos vicienque æris, præter olus & far & vinum; neque vino alienigena, sed patrio, utrosque; neque argenti in convivio plus pondo, quam libras centum illaturos. Sed post id Senatus-consultum lex Fannia lata est, quæ ludis Romanis, item ludis plebeis & Saturnalibus, & aliis quibuscumque diebus, in singulos dies centenos æris infumi concessit, decemque aliis diebus in singulis mensibus tricenos; cæteris autem omnibus diebus denos (3). — I have read lately in Capito Atci's conjectures, that an old decree of the senate was made in the consulship of C. Fannius, and M. Val. Messala; whereby the magistrates, who according to custom gave mutual entertainments during the Megalensian games, were obliged to swear in form before the consuls, not to expend above a hundred and twenty pieces of brass money, besides bread, herbs and wine, upon every feast, and not to use foreign wines, but of their own growth, nor to bring to table above one hundred weight of plate. But after that decree the Fannian law was enacted, which allowed one hundred pieces of brass to be expended at a time, during the Roman, Plebeian, and Saturnalian games, and on some other particular days; and on ten other days in every month thirty, but on all other days only ten.' This was a marvellous frugality, and such as put a great constraint upon people. What rich nation would now-a-days undergo such a yoke? but passing by all moral criticisms, let us enquire under which Fannius the law Fannia was made; for some people think, it was not made under him whom Aulus Gellius mentions.

(3) Idem, lib. ii, cap. xxiv.

(4) Gland. Onomastic. p. 333.

Glandorp (4), considering the distinction which Aulus Gellius has observed between the senate's decree and the law, is persuaded that the law was made a long time after the senate's decree; that is, under the consulship of Caius Fannius, son to our Caius Fannius Strabo, in the year of Rome 632. But that opinion can never agree with what we read in Pliny, that the law Fannia was made eleven years before the third Punic war. I shall quote the whole passage, because it contains some curious particulars. There you will see that the inhabitants of Delos were the first that crammed hens, which introduced the custom of eating no fowls but what were crammed. In order to restrain that piece of luxury, the law Fannia ordained, that no manner of fowl should be served up at table, except a hen uncrammed. But this law was soon after eluded, under pretence that it did not prohibit crammed chickens. 'Gallinas faginare Deliaci cœpere: unde pestis exorta opimas aves & suopte corpore unctas devorandi. Hoc primum antiquis conarum interdicitis exceptum invenio jam lege C. Fannii Coss. XI. annis ante tertium Punicum bellum, ne quid volucre poneretur præter unam gallinam quæ non esset altalis: quod deinde caput translatum per omnes leges ambulavit. Inventumque diverticulum est in fraude earum gallinaceos quoque pascendi lacte madidis cibis: multo ita gratiores approbantur (5).'

Macrobius would furnish us with very good weapons against Glandorp, if his Computations were not somewhat intricate. He enumerates, one after another, the laws of the ancient Romans against expences in eating, and this is the order he observes. The first law was made at the request of C. Orchius, tribune of the people; the second, which was the law Fannia, was made twenty two years after the first. 'Prima omnium de cœnis lex ad populum Orchia pervenit, quam tulit C. Orchius tribunus plebis de senatus sententia, tertio anno quam Cato censor fuerat. Cujus verba quia proluxa sunt prætereo. Summa autem ejus præscribat numerum convivarum. Et hæc est lex Orchia, de qua Cato in orationibus suis vociferabatur, quod plures quam præscripto ejus cavebatur ad cenam vocarentur. Cumque auctoritatem novæ legis aucta necessitas impelleret: post annum vicimum secundum legis Orchia Fannia lex lata est, anno post Romam conditam, secundum Gellii opinionem, quingentesimo octogesimo octavo (6). — The Orchian law was the first which was published concerning entertainments. C. Orchius, tribune of the people enacted it with the approbation of the senate three years before Cato was censor. As it is very tedious I shall not transcribe it. The principal thing which it regarded was the number of guests. This is the Orchian law on which Cato de-claimed with so much warmth; because more were invited than were allowed by that law. And as the exigency still encreasing called for the authority of a new decree; twenty two years after, the Fannian law was enacted, &c.' The first was made three years before Cato obtained the censorship; and therefore the law Fannia was made nineteen years after he was raised to that office. Now he was created censor in the year 569 of Rome, and so the law Fannia must have been made in the year 588. This conclusion rightly drawn from Macrobius's Words, joined with the Fasti Consulares, is agreeable to the text itself of Macrobius. 'Post annum vicimum secundum legis Orchia Fannia lex lata est anno post Romam conditam, secundum Gellii opinionem, quingentesimo octogesimo octavo (7). — Twenty two years after the Orchian law had been enacted, the Fannian law was passed, in the year of Rome, according to Gellius, five hundred eighty eight.' But here we find this inconveniency, that, according to Aulus Gellius, the law Fannia was made in the 588th year of Rome. Now look as long as you please in Aulus Gellius, and you will not find there that point of chronology; but only, that after the decree made by the senate, under the consulship of C. Fannius, and Valerius Messala, the law Fannia was enacted. Macrobius cannot say, that, according to Aulus Gellius's opinion, that law was made in the year 588, without supposing that Aulus Gellius affirms, that the law Fannia was made under the consulship of Fannius and Messala, and that that consulship falls in the year 588. But it is certain that Aulus Gellius has neither of those two assertions, and that he rather speaks like one that rejects the first, than like one that designs to maintain it. Post id senatusconsultum lex Fannia lata est (8). I know very well that it cannot be concluded from that Latin, that the senate's decree and the law were not made the same Year, and this is what I oppose to Glandorp's reasoning: for there is time enough in one year, both for the senate to make a decree, and afterwards for the people either to confirm, correct, or amplify by an authentic law, that decree of the senate. Aulus Gellius might therefore have expressed himself as he does, although he had been sure that the senate's decree and the law were made the same year; but it is most certain that his words do rather lead to another sense, and that therefore Macrobius is not exact, in pretending that Aulus Gellius has placed both the senate's decree and the law under the same consulship. As for the other assertion, Macrobius is yet more to blame: for Aulus Gellius would

would advance a very gross lye, if he placed the consulship of Fannius and Messala under the year 588. These intricacies in Macrobius will not allow us to make use of his testimony towards a chronological exactness; but here are others which will suffer it yet less.

According to his supposition, it is most certain that the law Fannia was made in the 588th year of Rome: for he places an interval of twenty two years between that law, and that which was called Orchia, and pretends that the later was made three Years before Cato was created Censor. Now that office was bestowed on Cato in the 569th year of Rome (9); and so the law Orchia was made in the Year 566, to which number if you add twenty two years, you will come to the 588th year of Rome. It is therefore unnecessary to correct Macrobius's words (10); for if they are not right, it is the author's fault, and not the transcriber's. Father Hardouin, by supposing that they have adulterated the numbers in Macrobius's text, assigns a very probable cause of that alteration. 'Hinc Macrobius emendamus, lib. 2. Saturn. cap. 13. pag. 367. apud quem corruptus annorum numerus legitur. Fannia lex, inquit, lata est anno post Romam conditam,

'secundum Gellii opinionem, quingentesimo octogesimo octavo. Scriptum erat per litterarum compendium, DLXXXIII. Librarii deinde, ut alias saepe advertimus, denarii nota postrema in quinarium versa, DLXXXVIII, perperam refererunt (11). — Hence I correct Macrobius, lib. 2. Saturn. c. 13. p. 365, where the number of years is corrupted. The Fannian law, says he, was passed in the year of Rome, according to Gellius's opinion, five hundred eighty eight. It was wrote in numerals DLXXXIII. The transcribers, as I have often observed in other places, by changing the last X into V corruptly wrote it DLXXXVIII. But that supposition happens un luckily to be false; for if Macrobius had not set down the year 588, but either the year 592 or 593, he had confused himself by his own calculations. Turn the thing which way you please, and you will never find him exact: and if you should maintain, that according to him the law Orchia was enacted three Years after Cato was made censor (12), you would but increase the confusion. See the article TITIUS (13), wherein I examine, whether what Macrobius says concerning that Man, can any ways back Glandorp's opinion.

(12) One might maintain that the ellipsis of these words of Macrobius, Tertio anno quam Cato Censor fuerit, is not ante but post.

(13) Rem. [B].

FANNIUS (CAIUS) son of the fore-mentioned, distinguished himself by his eloquence [A]. He was consul with Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus, in the year of Rome 632, and opposed the factious attempts of Caius Gracchus, tho' he was indebted to him for the consulship (a). He published an oration against him, which Cicero has commended [B].

[A] Distinguished himself by his eloquence. Left my reader's fancy should go too far, I must acquaint him, that the orator I speak of in this place was never of the first rank, but always passed for one of the middle class. Fannius in mediocribus oratoribus habitus esset (1); however, the following remark will shew you that I might speak of him, as I have done, without hyperbole. Does not Paternus place him among the most famous orators (2)?

[B] He published against C. Gracchus an oration which Cicero has commended. These are his words. 'Horum ætatis adjundi duo C. Fannii, Caii & Marci filii fuerunt, quorum Caii filius qui Consul cum Domitio fuit unam Orationem de sociis, & nomine Latino contra Gracchum reliquit, sane & bonam & nobilem (3). — Cotemporary with these were the two C. Fannius, sons of Caius & Marcus; the former, who was consul with Domitius, has left an oration against Gracchus, which is truly good and noble. That oration was thought to good by nice judges, that some fathered it upon Persius (4), and others said, that several men of quality had a hand in it; because they found in it more beauties than they thought could proceed from a mean orator, such as Fannius was accounted to be. Cicero confutes that opinion among other reasons, by this, that Fannius had always excelled in his language, and had rendered himself illustrious in his tribuneship. 'Eam suspicionem propter hanc causam credo fuisse, quod Fannius in mediocribus oratoribus habitus esset, oratio autem vel optima esset illo quidem tempore orationum omnium: sed nec ejusmodi est, ut à pluribus consula videatur: unus enim sonus est totius orationis, & idem stylus, nec de Persio reticisset Gracchus, quum & Fannius de Menelao Maratheno, & de ceteris objecisset, præsertim quum Fannius nunquam sit habitus linguis: nam & causas defendit, & tribunatus ejus arbitrio & auctoritate Publici Africanus gessit, non obcurus fuit (5). — I imagine this suspicion took it's rise from hence, that Fannius was only esteemed a second rate orator: but that oration even excelled any of that time. It is not however such as may argue it to be the composition of a club; for the periods have all the same turn, and the same stile runs thro' the whole; nor would Gracchus have passed Persius in silence, when Fannius had made objections concerning Menelao Marathenus, and the rest, especially as Fannius was never accounted a man that wanted elocution, for he pleaded at the bar, and his tribuneship, which he obtained by the interest of Publius Africanus, was not inglorious. This passage acquaints us, that Fannius was of a Plebeian family. Cicero is taxed with bestowing elsewhere upon Fannius, the son of Marcus, the tribuneship, which he ascribes in this place to Fannius, the son of Caius. 'In præsentia mihi velim scribas quibus CENS. C. Fannius M. F. Tribunus pl. fuerit: Videor mihi audisse P. Africanum, L. Mummi (6). — I wish you would inform me as speedily as may be, who were CENSORS when C. Fannius Corradus. These as, son of Marcus, was tribune of the people. If I are his words in Brutus Cicero, pag. 187, Vide & L. Mummius were. But I do not find that that later Cicero's criticism (7) is well grounded; for it is very possible diversely tunc Fannius, the son of Marcus, was tribune during the censorship of Scipio Africanus, and that Fannius, quoniam libro the son of Caius, followed Scipio Africanus's counsels decimo sexto ad in the discharge of his tribuneship. Now if these two things are very possible, why may not we say, that Cicero has spoken of the one in this place, and of the other in his letters to Atticus? I find more difficulty in the word censoribus, which has been put instead suo loco ea de re of consules, in the passage of his letter to Atticus; for as Cicero chiefly wanted to know in what year such and such had been either tribunes of the people, or pretors, &c. (8), without doubt he enquired under & hunc pro illo what consulship they had exercised those offices. The censures were renewed but every fifth Year, and so he could not have known the year of a tribuneship, if he had only known under what censor such or such a man had been tribune of the People.

(7) It is made by Corradus. These as, son of Marcus, was tribune of the people. If I are his words in Brutus Cicero, pag. 187, Vide & L. Mummius were. But I do not find that that later Cicero's criticism (7) is well grounded; for it is very possible diversely tunc Fannius, the son of Marcus, was tribune during the censorship of Scipio Africanus, and that Fannius, quoniam libro the son of Caius, followed Scipio Africanus's counsels decimo sexto ad in the discharge of his tribuneship. (8) See the fifth letter of the second book to Atticus.

FANNIUS, (CAIUS) son to Marcus, and cousin-german to the fore-going, was questor in the year of Rome 614, and pretor two years after. He bore arms in Africa under Scipio Africanus the younger (a), and in Spain under Fabius Maximus Servilianus (b). He was disciple of Panætius (c) a great Philosopher of the sect of the Stoics, and married the younger daughter of Lælius. He composed annals which were in esteem esteem [A]. He resented his father-in-law Lælius's bestowing the office of Augur upon Quintus Mutius Scævola his other son-in-law; nor would he admit of Lælius's excuses [B]. It will not be amiss to observe, that Cicero having said that Fannius the historian was son-in-law to Lælius, he was confuted by Pomponius Atticus in a demonstrative manner [C], tho' at the same time he was not mistaken. The Reader will see, in one single remark, the mistakes of some authors in relation to the Fannii [D].

[A] He composed annals which were in esteem.] Cicero speaks pretty honourably of them (1): 'Ejus omnis in dicendo facultas ex historia ipsius non inegant scripta perspicui potest, quæ neque nimis est infans neque perfecte diserta. — All his skill in oratory may be seen in his history which is not ill wrote, being neither too puerile, nor altogether elaborate.' Brutus made an abridgment of them, as we learn from one of Cicero's letters to Atticus (2), where we read these words, Conturbat me epitoma Bruti Fanniana, an Bruti epitoma Fannianorum. Vossius (3) observes, that Manutius has ill explained that Latin in his commentary. He thought, says he, that that work of Brutus was either a short history of the Fannian family, or of the memorable actions done by the Fannii. Manutius says no such thing in his commentary, but has understood the thing rightly. 'In Bruti epitoma Fannianorum, that is according to him, quam confecit Brutus annalium Fannianorum, id est historiae à Fannio conscriptæ (4). — In Brutus's epitome of Fannius, that is, according to him, of the annals of Fannius, or the history which Fannius wrote.' Instead of accusing Manutius of that fault, it ought to have been laid upon Corradus (5). As for the rest, if Fannius's annals came short of being a masterpiece of eloquence, they had however an excellence better than a fine style, which was sincerity; for that is the character Sallust gives of Fannius. 'Cum aliis Historiographis singula tradidisset (Sallustius) in libro primo historiæ, Catoni brevitatem, Romani generis disertissimum, paucis absolvit; Fannio vero veritatem (6). — Sallust, in his first book of history, gives each historian his particular character: to Cato brevity, to Fannius's truth.'

[B] Nor would he admit of Lælius's excuses.] He had married Lælius's younger daughter: the elder was married to Scævola. But Scævola being younger than Fannius, the latter pretended that his birthright ought to incline Lælius to prefer him before the other in the disposal of the augurship. Lælius excused himself, by saying, that he had not preferred the younger of his sons-in-law to the elder, but the elder of his daughters to the younger: but Fannius would not be satisfied with that distinction. 'Is focerum quia cooptatus in Augurum collegium non erat, non admodum diligebat, præsertim cum ille Q. Scævolam sibi minorem natu generum prætulisset, cui tamen Lælius se excusans non genero minori dixit se illud, sed majori filia detulisse (7).' This passage of Cicero does not altogether agree with his dialogue of friendship, wherein he introduces Fannius speaking to his father-in-law, as if he was very well pleased with him, and as being his colleague in his dignity of augur.

[C] Cicero was confuted in a demonstrative manner.] I do but translate Cicero's words, Sed tu me γεωμετρικῶς refelleras (8). I am mistaken if there be not some irony in it. Cicero would insinuate to his friend, who was a man consummate in the knowledge of families, that we ought not always to trust our memory; and that we may sometimes take for invincible reasons, what at bottom is but a meer illusion. You proved geometrically to me, that I had falsely advanced that Fannius was son-in-law to Lælius. This I had from Hortensius, who is very credible in those things; however, I was fain to yield to your geometrical proofs: But here is Brutus, who confutes you in the abridgment he has made of Fannius's history; get you out of that plunge as well as you can. 'Scripti quod erat in extremo: idque ego secutus hunc Fannium qui scripsit historiam, generum esse scripseram Lælii: sed tu me γεωμετρικῶς refelleras: te autem nunc Brutus & Fannius. Ego tamen de bono auctore Hortensio sic acceperam, ut apud Brutum est. Hunc igitur locum expedies (9).' Thus Cicero (9) Id. ibid. speaks to his friend Atticus. It is visible he is upon the jeering strain, when he gives the name of geometrical demonstrations, to the pretended reasons of Atticus. Note, that Cicero's words prove, 1. that Fannius had said in his history, that he was son-in-law to Lælius. 2. That Cicero learned only, from the abridgment of that history published by Brutus, that Fannius had said such a thing; for if he had known it otherwise, he would not have alleged, as his only proof, the single authority of Hortensius. If Mezerai had said in his history, that he had married the daughter of such one, those who should mention that marriage, and should remember what the historian had said about it, would not quote an hear-say; or if they did, they would deserve to be laughed at.

[D] See the mistakes of some authors in relation to the Fannii.] Let us begin with Mr Lloyd. I. He places in the 508th year of Rome, the passing of the law Fannia, and quotes the fourteenth chapter of the second book of Aulus Gellius, instead of quoting the twenty fourth. He also quotes the seventeenth chapter of the third book of Macrobius's Saturnalia, instead of quoting the twelfth chapter of the second Book. II. He says, that Caius Fannius, son to Marcus, and son-in-law to Lælius, was more famous than Fannius his cousin, both by his morals and his eloquence, moribus & ipso dicendi genere clarior. That is a notorious falsehood; for Cicero, to whom he refers us, is very far from saying any such thing (10). III. As for the poet Fannius, he says, that his poems were carried with his image into the temple of Apollo and the Muses, or into some other library: which fault he has copied from Vossius (11). IV. He applies to Fannius Cæpio an epigram of Martial (12), which he does not transcribe right; for he says,

Hic rogo non furor est ne moriari mori?*

These two verses have no manner of sense. The word peteret, put instead of fugeret, blunts the point of the epigram; and if you leave fugeret in it, it will not hit upon Fannius Cæpio, the head in a conspiracy against Augustus. I do not quote Macrobius (14), who relates the great fidelity of one of that Fannius's slaves towards his master, and who acquaints us, that Fannius shunned death with all the caution imaginable: I do not quote, I say, Macrobius, who does not say, that Fannius was at last weary of shunning death; but I quote Dion, who says positively that Fannius was killed (15), and betrayed by one of his servants (16). Is not this a proof that he did not kill himself. Let us pass on to Mr Hofman. He has committed the four faults of Lloyd, and some of those of Moreri. He has quoted the ninth letter of the fifth book of Pliny, which has no reference to any of the Fannii. He says, that Fannius Strabo was twice consul; first with Valerius Messala, and then with Domitius Ænobarbus. He adds, that the law Fannia was made under the first consulship of Fannius; and refers us, for that matter, to his article Fannia, where we find that that law was made in the year 508. He therefore places the first consulship of Fannius Strabo, in the year 508, whereas it ought to have been placed in the year 592 or 593. Before he spoke of Fannius Strabo, he had made an article of Caius Fannius, consul with Domitius; and so of one man he has made two.

(10) He says, Moribus & ipso genere dicendi clarior. Idem, in Bruto, pag. 183.

cotemporary of that Fannius, has spoken of him with much contempt, and has reflected on him as a parasite (d). That is the common character of bad poets.

Mr Dacier understands these words in the following manner: 'That Fannius, says he, though a bad poet, made a shift, by his intrigues, and by a sort of cabal he had raised by reading his poems in all places, and to all comers, to get leave, against all manner of justice, that he himself should be permitted to carry both his composures and his picture into the library which Augustus had dedicated: and this is what Horace ridicules very wittily. . . . Fannius, by making daily assemblies where he read his works, had got a vast number of admirers, who cried up his verses, and dispersed copies of them every where: whereas the verses of Horace, who would be indebted to no body but himself for his reputation, and who communicated them but very seldom, to very few people, were almost unknown, and did not make a quarter part of the noise the foolish works of Fannius did: for at that time, as well as now-adays, fiction often prevailed over merit. This is the true sense of that passage, which has not been well understood: for what Acron says, that the senate had done that honour to Fannius, to be rid of his importunities; or that some people that hankered after the estate of Fannius, who was childless, in order to curry favour with him, and become his heirs, had carried his writings and his picture into the public library; all that, I say, is a meer fancy, which has no manner of ground. I put in the margin (2) the words of the old interpreter, which Mr Dacier condemns. I have said somewhere (3), that satires want to be commented upon, either by the author himself, or by some cotemporary writer. Here is a passage of Horace which confirms my opinion. We know not the true meaning of it, we only guess at it; and how happy soever our conjectures be, there are still some doubts behind. We should not be at that loss if Horace had commented upon his own satires, or if some writer of Augustus's age had writ commentaries upon them: but because one of the perfections of that kind of composures consists in a thousand strokes of raillery, exprest by obscure hints, and which allude to some adventures not known to every body, I believe a satirical author does not much care for commentaries. The modern Theophrastus (4) was not pleased, to see that people made him enemies by applying his characters to such and such persons.

FANNIUS (Caius), a Latin author, who lived in Trajan's time, and had a great share in the esteem and friendship of Pliny the younger. Though he was busy in pleading causes, yet he found time to make a collection of Nero's cruelties; that is, he composed the last dying words of those whom that wicked prince had either put to death, or banished. He had published three very exact and polite books upon that subject [A]; and he bestowed the more pains upon the sequel, because he saw that the first parts were read with applause: but death prevented the finishing of that work. He had himself a fore-sight, occasioned by a certain dream, that he should die before the publishing of the fourth book (a).

[A] He had published three very exact and polite books upon that subject. Nothing was more proper than a work of that nature, to render the memory of Nero odious: for it was a kind of martyrology; and it is well known, that satires, though most nicely written, do much less prejudice to a tyrant than a martyrology unskillfully compiled. The last dying words of the persecuted recommend them by two powerful reasons: the one is, the miserable condition to which they are generally reduced; and the other, the patience and fine discourses that usually accompany their conflicts, at least in relations: which make us forget those passages of their lives which might hinder the effects of compa-sion and veneration. Judge you what coals of fire all these things heap upon the head of the persecutor and tyrant: and I leave you to think, whether that work of Fannius was not very proper to make Nero's memory detested; for it contained the last dying words of a great many illustrious persecuted persons, written with great clearness. Let us hear Pliny speak: 'Pulcherrimum opus

' imperfectum reliquit. Quamvis enim agendis causis
' distringeretur, scribat tamen exitus occisorum aut
' relegatorum à Nerone: & jam tres libros abfolverat,
' subtiles, & diligentes, & Latinos, atque inter sermo-
' nem historiamque medios. Ac tanto magis reliquos ' perficere cupiebat, quanto frequentius hi lesitaban-
' tur (1). — He left a most beautiful work imper' fect. For though he was engaged to attend almost ' constantly at the bar, yet he wrote the last words of ' those who were either put to death, or banished by ' Nero, and had already finished three books, wrote ' with the greatest art, elegance, and purity, keeping ' a mean between history and familiar style. He was so ' much the more desirous to have completed the rest,
' as he found that those which he had done were greatly ' admired.'

FAREL (WILLIAM), one of the most eminent ministers of the reformed church, was son of a gentleman of Dauphiné, and was born at Gap, in the year 1489 (a). He studied at Paris with great success: he learnt there philosophy (b), the Greek and Hebrew languages (c), and was some time a teacher in the college of cardinal de Moine (d). James Faber Stapulensis procured him that employment (e), and, as I believe, also the invitation which William Briçonnet, bishop of Meaux, sent to him. That bishop was a little inclined to the reformation, and upon that account he invited into his diocese, some persons who had relished the new opinions. Farel, among the rest, was called to preach to them there in 1521 (f). The persecution which was begun at Meaux, in the year 1523, against those they called heretics, obliged him to provide for his safety elsewhere than in France (g): whereupon he retired to Strasburg [A], where he received the band of fellowship from Bucer and Capito (h), as he did afterwards from Zuinglius hatred and ill offices of his countrymen. Thereupon he retired to Basil, where he publicly defended a thesis: which having exposed him to great dangers, he retired to Strasburg, where he was received with open arms by Bucer and Capito, and where he preached the truth to the refugees from France, till, in the year 1527, he removed to Montbéliard in order to promote the reformation (3). This last assertion is very false; for we shall shew presently, that Farel preached the gospel in the country of Montbéliard in 1524.

Being found very proper to gain profelytes, he was advised to undertake the reformation of Montbeliard; in which enterprize he had very great success, through the favour of the duke of Wirtemberg, the lord of that place (k). He abated somewhat of his zeal, according to Oecolampadius's advice [C]. He had the like success in the year 1528, in

[B] He received the hand of fellowship . . . from Oecolampadius at Basil.] I add the name of that city to the account of my author, because that omission is illusory, and seems to intimate that Oecolampadius was minister of Bern. These are Mr Ancillon's words: 'In the year 1524 Zuinglius, the burning and shining candle at Zurich: Haller, the vessel of election at Bern; Oecolampadius, the lamp of the house of God, embraced Farel (4).' I find in his narrative another omission of more consequence; for he says nothing of a famous dispute which Farel maintained at Basil in the year 1524. I know very well that he has mentioned it in another place (5); but besides that he has not rightly set down the time of it (6), he has not mentioned it in the right place, that is, when he related (7) historically, and according to the order of chronology, all the labours of Farel. Let us therefore supply what he has omitted. Farel being arrived at Basil, in the year 1524, addressed himself to the faculty of divinity, to whom he declared, he desired to defend a thesis publicly. The divines of Basil, particularly Lewis Berus, provost of St Peter, refused him their permission for it, under pretence that his positions were agreeable to the new doctrine. The senate having notice of that refusal, gave leave to Farel to maintain his assertions; which Farel caused to be posted up at the gate of the college. The grand vicar, the rector of the university, and the professors, published a prohibition to be present at that disputation, under pain of excommunication: which the senate looking upon as a manifest encroachment upon their authority, ordered all divines, curates, and scholars, to assist at that disputation, upon the forfeiture of the use of mills and ovens, and of the liberty of buying their necessities in the market (8). By that means Farel had all the advantage he could have wished, and defended his thesis in the presence of an infinite number of persons, both ecclesiastics and laics, on the fifteenth of February 1524: but nevertheless the popish faction was so prevalent, that he was soon after obliged to quit Basil (9).

[C] He abated somewhat of his zeal, according to Oecolampadius's advice.] These are Mr Ancillon's words: 'Farel, according to the caution given him by Oecolampadius, moderated his ardour, managed his zeal, and proportioned it to the temper of his hearers, whom he drew all to the communion of JESUS CHRIST (10).' This relates to Montbeliard. Others say, that having shewed too much passion in those parts, he was advised by Oecolampadius to join prudence with zeal in another place, whither he went to preach the gospel. 'Basilea exactus in monte Bellicardi Evangelium Christi aliquandiu docuit: post & in aliis Gallici idiomatis peritis vicinisque locis: tanta animi contentione tantoque ardore, ut divinitus illum ad munus ejusmodi excitatum res demonstraret: quanquam alicubi moderationem in eo quidam desiderarint, ut dicemus. Circa annum vicesimum septimum iterum annunciandi verbi locum invenit, in quodam oppido, cui Ælin nomen: ubi ut fortiter & prudenter ageret, Oecolampadius submonuit. — Being obliged to quit Basil, he preached the gospel for some time at Montbeliard, and after that in other places which lay near France, whose inhabitants spoke French, where he behaved himself with such zeal and resolution, that he appeared to have been commissioned by heaven for that purpose: though some, as I shall hereafter observe, complained of his want of moderation. About the year twenty seven he found another place to preach the gospel in, namely a town named Ælis, where Oecolampadius advised him to mix prudence with his zeal.' The author, from whom I borrowed this Latin, recites (12) the words which Oecolampadius made use of when he exhorted his friend not to be so violent. 'Ita Oecolampadius alicubi: Qui hic tibi & evangelio favent, ne quid ardore zeli inter initia attentes, timent. De quo satis monui ante, quam abires: nunc non item. Neque enim excidisse animo crediderim, quomodo inter nos convenerit: nempe ut quanto propensior es ad violentiam, tanto magis te ad lenitatem exerceas: leoninamque magnanimitatem columbina modestia frangas, Duci, non trahi, volunt homines. Unum spectemus; quomodo lucrificamus animas Christo: & quomodo ipsi doceri vellemus, siquidem adhuc teneremur in tenebris & captivitate Antichristi. Vide ut Christum etiam vita exprimas, exemplo inquam docendi. Et alibi: apertius: Rogavi ex N. super mansuetudine tua: qua nihil magis Christianum, nedum Apostolum decet. Is cum mire extulisset sedulitatem insatigabilem, ardoremque inextinguibilem, & satis felicem successum, subdidit, quod in sacrificios imbres effundas convivium. Non ignoro, quid illi mereantur, & quibus coloribus depingi debeant: pace tamen tua dixerim, amicus & frater patri: non videris per omnia officii tui remissi. Evangelizatum, non male dictum missus es. Condo, imo laudo zelum: modo ne desideretur mansuetudo. Da operam, mi frater, ut spiritum meum exbilares etiam hoc nuncio: quod in tempore suo vinum & oleum infundas: quod Evangelistam, non tyrannicum legislatorem præstes. — Thus Oecolampadius in one of his letters: Those here who wish well to you and the gospel, are under some apprehensions lest your zeal should, at your setting out, transport you too far; on which head I gave you my advice in full before your departure; and for that reason shall be as brief as possible. For I can by no means imagine you should have forgot our agreement: that the more prone you are to passion, the more you should compose yourself to meekness, and temper the lion's courage with the meekness of the dove. Men may be lead, but will not be driven by force. Let us have this only in view, how to win souls to CHRIST, and how we ourselves should chuse to be instructed, if we were still in darkness and slaves to Antichrist. Let your conversation and method of doctrine be an imitation of CHRIST. And in another of his epistles more openly: I enquired of N. concerning your meekness, than which nothing is more becoming to a christian or an apostle. He wonderfully extolled your unwearied industry, your boundless zeal, and happy success, but added that you were apt to pour an inundation of the bitterest expressions on the priests. I am not ignorant what they deserve, and in what colours they ought to be exposed: but give me leave, as a friend, and as a brother to a brother, to say, you do not seem in every respect to remember your duty: you were sent to preach and not to rail. I excuse, nay I commend your zeal, so that it be not without meekness. Endeavour, my brother, that this advice may have its desired effect, and I have reason to rejoice that I gave it. Pour on wine and oil in due season, and demean yourself as an evangelist, and not as tyrannical legislator.

Here follows an instance of his too passionate zeal: upon a procession-day Farel wrestled from the hands of a priest the image of St Antony, and threw it from the bridge into the river. He would have been knocked down dead, if God had not prevented it by striking a panic terror among the populace. It is thus, at least, a minister I quote saves Farel: 'Cum vero Favellus noster aliquando, publica occasione gloriæ diviniæ asserendæ oblata, Antonii idolum, magna cum pompa per urbem circumgestatum, sacrificulorum manibus excussum in subiectum flumen & ponte præcipitasset, Pentheus alter haud dubiè futurus erat, nisi mira Dei providentia furibundæ plebis ora & manus in injecto terrore panico præter spem compescuisset (13).' It is dated the 26th of Decemb. 1524. From whence it appears that Farel went that year into the country of Montbeliard. See also the 14th letter of the 36th book; but we must remember, that he thought himself injured in some writings of Farel: 'Supereit Pharellus, bone Christe, quam pius, quam innocens vir! in the town of Aigle, and soon after in the bailiwick of Morat (1) [D]. He went afterwards to Neufchatel, in the year 1529, and there combated the Romish party with so much vigour and efficacy, that this city established the reformed religion the fourth of November, 1530 (m). He was (n) deputed to the synod of the Vaudois, in the valley of Angrogne, and came afterwards to Geneva, where he disputed against Popery; but the great vicar, and other ecclesiastics, opposed him with so much violence, that he was forced to retreat from thence. He was recalled thither in the year 1534, by the inhabitants, who had renounced the Romish church, and was the principal instrument of the entire suppression of Popery, which happened in that city the next year. He was banished from thence, with Calvin, in the year 1538 (o), and retired to Basil, and afterwards to Neufchatel (p), where he exercised his ministry till 1542; at which time he went to Mentz (q), where there was a hopeful appearance of a spiritual

Si nunc est conversus ad meliorem frugem, gratulor homini. Qualis olim erat, mihi valde displicuit, fedditiosus, acida lingua, & vanillimus. Sic rem gessit in monte Pellicardi ut bis inde profugerit. Basiliensis senatus, quum cuperet civitatem esse tutam à seditione, iussit Pharellum ire exulatum. Oecolampadius cujus mensa tum utebatur non semel objurgavit hominem, quod obtestandi nullum faceret finem, testatus se non posse ferre in convivio tam amarulentas obtestationes. Id mihi narravit qui in eadem mensa accubebat, vir integritatis rarissimæ. Appellat me Balaam, hac de causa cum illo expostulanti, nihil certi respondit, sed sic elapsus est, ut diceret negotiatorum quendam Dupletum hoc dixisse, se enim jam abierat; & fieri potest ut dixerit, sed à Pharello doctus. De colloquio nostro scripsit epistolam ad fratres Constantiam, in qua sæpe in decem versibus non erat unum verbum verum. Omitto jam leviora. Talem expertus, si talem depinxit, nihil mirum. Nunc qualis sit nescio (15). — There remains still one Farel, O heavens, how religious and innocent a person is he! They do not say what I have wrote against him. I should be well pleased to hear of his reformation. As he was formerly I could by no means admire him, conceited, virulent, and seditious. He behaved himself at Montbeliard in such a manner that he was twice obliged to quit the town. The magistrates of Basle, to prevent sedition, expelled him the city. Oecolampadius, at whose table he was then fed, more than once reprimanded him for his endless insolence, declaring he could no longer bear such ill manners in his company. This I know from a person of uncommon integrity, who sat with him. He had called me Balaam. When I expostulated with him on this head, instead of giving an answer he had recourse to a mean subterfuge, and said he had it from one Duplet, a correspondent of his, who was dead. It is possible he might have said it, but he had it from Farel. He wrote an epistle concerning our conference, in several parts of which there was not one word of truth for ten sentences together. I pass over things of less moment. It is no wonder I should represent him such as I found him. What he may be now, I know not. Since Erasmus was personally offended, we are not obliged to believe, that he has here drawn Farel's character to the life: but, however, we may rest persuaded, that our Farel was one of those who have more need of the bridle than the spur. The natural temper is almost always the first and principal spring, even in persons who are God's instruments. Some pretend, that it was necessary for Luther, Calvin, Farel, and some others, to be hot, passionate, and violent; else, say they, they could not have overcome all opposition. The church was then in the same circumstances, as when Jesus CHRIST said, The kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent take it by force (16). See Mr. Claude's thought, in remark [T], of the article

[D] He succeeded . . . in the town of Aigle, and soon after in the bailiwick of Morat. According to Mr. Ancillon, he did not go to Neufchatel till after he had reformed the town of Aigle and the bailiwick of Morat; but Mr. Spanheim, the father, makes him go from Montbeliard to Neufchatel, and then to Aigle, &c. His narrative is curious enough, to deserve being cited at length; the reader will find in it the undauntedness of the reformer, and with what vigour he surmounted the opposition of the priests, who caused the bells to be rung to drown his voice: they also practised the wile of which Ulysses made use, to prevent the ill effects of the Syrens songs; that is, they stopped their ears with flakes of silk. This is what they opposed to

Farel's thundering eloquence; tho' at last they hearkened to reason, and heard him favourably. Inde, that is, from Montbeliard, Neocomum delatus Farelus, sed & ibi duriter habitus Aquileiam Bernatum oppidum Valesii conterminum incolere cepit, & ludum aperire erudiendæ juventuti in speciem, revera docendæ veritati. But here he was molested by the priests, and obliged to move his quarters. He chose Morat, a town famous for the battle won there by the bravery of the Swisses. But neither could Farel there be at quiet: being driven therefore to the district of Biel, by the providence of GOD he entirely converted it, and notwithstanding the difficulties he met with, and the severities which were practised to deter him, he banished all the arts of the devil, and the priests, and established the reformed religion. Orbe and Granfon soon followed. Farel's undaunted courage despised the roarings of satan, and the attempts of the priests. At last when they saw his heroic soul was proof even against drawn swords, terror and amazement seized them to that degree, that the very clergy, who by continual ringing of bells, and stopping their ears with silk, had endeavoured to frustrate his preaching, came afterwards to hear him, with open ears, and more favourable sentiments. You do not find Lausanne in this catalogue of the towns wherein Farel planted the reformation; though he planted it at Lausanne also, if we may believe Theodore Beza (18), and the inscription of his picture. Note, I beseech you, that, during the first sermon he preached at Metz, the Dominicans had recourse to their bells, as a sovereign remedy; but their peals were not able to interrupt the zealous preacher. He contended with the bells who should best be heard, nor did he suffer himself to be overcome. Primam concionem in cœmeterio Dominicanorum habuit. Then Farel strained his voice, till he was hoarse, being resolved to vanquish. His voice was like thunder; and it may be applied to him what Frederic Spanheim has said of a monk who preached against Lutheranism. harvest. Some months before, he had received a great affront at Neufchatel, for which he had such satisfaction made him [E], that it cannot be said he was forced to go to Metz. He had a thousand difficulties to struggle with in that new-born church, and was forced to retire, with the faithful, into the abbey of Gorze (r) [F], where the count of Furstemberg sheltered them under his protection; but they could not be secure there; they were besieged, and forced, at last, to surrender upon terms (f). Farel happily made his escape [G], and endeavoured to procure their restoration by the means of the protestant princes, and states of Germany (t). He went and resumed his ancient post of minister of Neufchatel, from whence sometimes he took a journey to Geneva. In the journey he made thither, in the year 1553, he was informed that he was very odious to some persons in that City [H]. He assisted then at the execution

(20) Spanheim, ubi supra, p. 56. catque tubas, in Lutheranism nomen invehebatur, à Petro Roberto Olivetano . . . publicè increpitus & correptus (20). — A monk of the Dominican order, who in his sermon in the Palatine monastery, declaimed most furiously against Luther, in a tone that would have drowned the trumpet and the clarion, was sharply and publicly reprimanded by Peter Robert Olivetanus.

[E] He received a great affront at Neufchatel, for which he had satisfaction made him. Farel having made it his business to establish order and decency in the church of Neufchatel, was constantly employed in reforming manners, correcting abuses, removing scandals, and opposing vice with all his might. This strictness, in causing discipline to be observed, rendered him odious, and even insupportable to the vicious and libertines. It happening one day, that a woman of noble extraction went away from her husband, Farel exhorted her not to put asunder what God had joined together, and alleged other powerful reasons to bring her back to her duty. But that woman refusing to hearken either to private admonitions, or the remonstrances of the consistory, or even the solicitations of the magistrates of Neufchatel, Farel thought himself obliged to blame and condemn that disobedience in another manner, and that from the pulpit he ought to remove that scandal. Therefore upon a Sunday morning, being the last day of July, he spoke with his usual heat, both against that contumacious woman, and against those who encouraged her in her perverse humour. The persons who interested themselves for the guilty lady, took his public reprehension very ill, and that very day formed a party against Farel, and prevailed so far with the people, that they got together, at two of the clock in the afternoon, in the field near the church and the castle, to consult what they should do with Farel. The people were divided; some being for Farel, some against him: But at last it was carried by the majority, that in two months he should quit Neufchatel. The prudence of the governour, and of the council of state, as they call it, was such, as prevented any sedition, or effusion of blood. Farel having no other motive or aim but the glory of God, and the honour of his church, was neither surprized at, nor shaken by that popular emotion, but continued the exercise of his office without any remissness. The magnificent lords of Bern were no sooner informed of the tumult raised by the friends of that lady, than they wrote about it to the governour and council of Neufchatel, that they might prevent the mischief, and stifle it in its birth. This letter they sent by two eminent members of their council, who being arrived at Neufchatel, remonstrated both to the four ministers, to the council, and to the burghers, the great wrong they did to Farel; and how ill they acknowledged the great services he had done, and the graces of God which had made him the instrument towards them. Whereupon the twenty eighth of November the council made a decree, ordaining, that all misunderstandings should be removed, all factions stifled, all jealousies terminated, and all feuds extinguished: that Farel should continue the exercise of his function, as being blameless both in his doctrine and morals, and one to whom the church was very much beholden: that whoever should speak against Farel, should pay a great fine; Farel being truly the bulwark and ornament of Neufchatel, by his piety, probity, and capacity. The fourth of January, 1542, according to the advice of the lords of Bern, by the majority of votes of the burghers of Neufchatel, Farel was continued, to the great comfort of all good men, and confusion of his enemies, whose mouths were stopped, and their hands and feet tied; whereas Farel with new vigour thundered more fiercely than ever against the depravation of manners (21). We must observe, that this minister maintained with so much zeal and vigour the severity of church discipline, that he subjected to public penance those sinners that had given scandal. Here follows the substance of a letter written to the clark of Neufchatel, by the ministers of Basil, the twenty eighth of July, 1554. 'They say, they commend the zeal of Farel, who made it his business to cause the church-discipline to be religiously observed, vice suppressed, and the sacraments devoutly received: adding, that they approved Farel's opinion, that those, who by their open sinning gave offence to the church, should make a solemn confession of their faults, give a public testimony of their repentance, and by an extraordinary humiliation make reparation for the scandal they had given (22).'

[F] He was forced . . . to retire into the abbey of Gorze. The women were like to have pulled him to pieces, if we believe Mr Madanre (§ 2). 'He accuses him of having confidently affirmed, that it is false that the virgin Mary remained a virgin after she was brought-to-bed (23): the women of Gorze, adds he, astonished at that blasphemy and impudence, rushed upon him with their nails, and plucked off his hair and beard; and worried him in such a manner, that he could never have escaped from their hands with his life, if captain Henry Frank had not rescued him.' Mr Ancillon shews that this is but a fable.

[§ 2] Mr Bayle is mistaken in this and the following remark, by taking the name of a city, of which the person he means was titular bishop, for the name of a man. This man was called MARTIN MEURISSE: he was a Franciscan, bishop of Madaur, suffragan, and administrator of the bishopric of Metz. These are the titles he takes at the head of his works, and particularly at the head of that which is here quoted by Mr Bayle, which is intitled Histoire de la Naissance, du Progrès, & de la Décadence de l'Hérésie dans la Ville de Metz & Pays Messin: a title which seems to have been copied from that of the history of Florimond de Remond. Probably what deceived Mr Bayle was the manner of Mr Ancillon's quoting this author in the life of Farel: he commonly calls him the Sieur de Madaur; and that expression is as inaccurate, as if one quoted Coeffeteau by the name of Sieur de Dardanie or de Marseille, or cardinal du Perron by the name of Sieur d'Ereux or de Sens. Meurisse's book, which occasioned this note, was printed at Metz, by J. Antoine, in 1642, in 4to. His other works may be seen in Waddingi Scriptores Ord. Minorum, and in the Bibliotheca Telleriana, page 115, 192, and 294. REM. CRIT.]

[G] Farel happily made his escape. Theodore Beza having related (24), that this abbey was besieged, and at last surrendered upon articles, adds, and though a strict enquiry was made after Farel, yet he escaped their hands, having been put in a waggon among the lepers. Mr Madanre pretends, that Farel was saved by being put in a waggon full of lepers, having his face daubed with meal, with a leazar's chicken in his hands (25). But Mr Ancillon has answered, that his being daubed with meal, and the chicken, are both of Mr Madanre's invention. He grounds himself on Theodore Beza's silence, which ground is not very solid; for Beza's business was not to relate the circumstances, but only the material part of that adventure.

[H] He was very odious to some persons at Geneva. They indicted him as a criminal, and he was obliged to appear before the judges; for the senate of Geneva wrote to the magistrates of Neuchâtel, to desire them to order that the accused person might come to answer to the charge that was brought against him. As soon as the senate had notice that Farel was arrived, they let Calvin know that he should not be suffered to ascend the pulpit. Calvin does not acquaint us with the sequel of this affair, but contents himself to say, that he wished he could with his own blood wipe off the disgrace those of Geneva had cast upon themselves by that ungrateful proceeding. Here is the whole passage: 'Nunc ad summum pervenit nequitia, ut omni pudore excusso, templum Domini in lupanar convertere obstat cupiant. Atque ut sciat, quam fœda sit deformitas, cum hic nuper esset frater noster Farelus, cui se totos debent, ut satis nostis, & pro jure suo eos libere moneret, tantos in eum furor exaruit, ut capitale judicium in eum intentare non sint veriti. bas now reached it; meridian, and men, devoid of all shame, obstinately endeavour to convert the temple of the Lord into a brothel-house. That ye may have a just idea of this monstrous baseness, know then, that our fellow-labourer, Farel, one, to whom they owe even themselves, as ye are not ignorant, being here lately, and agreeably to his character, taking the freedom to admonish them without reserve, their fury against him was kindled to that degree, that they scrupled not to prosecute him for capital offences. I allow, it ought not to seem strange, if in a free city there should be persons that delight in faction, and raising tumults. But the blindness of our senate is surpris-ing, in demanding the inhabitants of Neuchâtel to deliver up the father of their liberty, and father of this church as guilty of a capital crime. I am obliged to proclaim the dishonour of this city, which I could wish to wipe away with my blood. Farel came; before he entered the city, the marshal of the court de-livered orders at my house not to permit him to mount the pulpit. I shall proceed no farther: let it suffice to give you a taste of their ingratitude, which will raise a just aversion in all men of probity and honour. But because I have many reasons which binder me from publicly deploring our calamity, take it briefly thus. Unless satan be chained up by you, he must be let loose.

[1] He married, being sixty nine years old.] 'It appears by a writing under Farel's hand, that he married a maid advanced in years, named Mary, the daughter of Alexander Torel, of the city of Roan; that that maid having retired to Neuchâtel, upon the account of religion, had been brought up in the discipline of the Lord by her mother, who was a true widow, and who feared and served God: that this maid was wise and virtuous, and her life and conversation regular and edifying. The bans of marriage between Farel and Mary Torel are found written with great plainness by Farel's own hand. They were published the eleventh and twenty first of September, and the second of October, 1558 (27). Let us see how Mr Ancillon justifies that marriage (28): 'Farel did not marry till he was sixty nine years old, and, as his friends said, till he had already one foot in the grave. Farel's friends thought his marriage very strange, and unreasonable; but neverthe-less he convinced them of the reasons he had to in-gage in a conjugal society in an age so very much ad-vanced. The general opinion has hitherto been, that Farel was prompted to marry by a secret inspiration and extraordinary impulse. Whatever it be, it is well known, that, by marrying, he meant to provide for the infirmities of old age by the means God himself has ordained, and taking a help to piety to entertain himself in it: a help to civil society, that it might not grow tedious to him; a help to husbandry, to ease himself of the cares of this life; and lastly, a help for infirmity, to possess his own vessel in sanctification and honour. It is well known that Farel married to shew, that, contrary to the opinion of those of the Romish church, celibacy is neither meritorious nor satisfactory; and to justify, that the gift of perpetual continence is neither given to all, nor for ever. The end of this apology will surprize all superficial wits, and many others also; for they will not easily conceive how the gift of continence, preserved till the age of sixty nine years, can disappear and vanish on the sudden. The most sensual and lascivious do generally lose at that age, and even before, their incontinence; and even those who have not abused the excessive heat of their constitution, find their strength exhausted before they reach the sixty ninth year of their age; and here is a man who begins then to be incontinent. The thing is undoubtedly very singular, but nevertheless let us not look upon it as a fable. Let us consider, that the impres-sion of some objects upon our brain are independent upon our soul. It is not because we would have it so, that certain objects please us; but because they move, in a certain manner, the fibres of our brain, and open some valves that were shut. This alteration produces others, almost ad infinitum, in our machine; and from thence spring desires, and prelibations of pleasure, and an hundred other innovations, which de-stroy continence. Thus Mary Torel altered the course of animal spirits in that good old man: she pleased him; she had that proportion of the object to the fa-culty which excites sentiments of love, &c. And that was enough. Do not tell me, that maid was not young, she is not represented as handsome: No matter for that. The proportion here in question, that great spring, that great mover, neither consists in youth, nor in beauty: It is something, I know not what, which lies in some insensible particles, whose efficacy we feel without being acquainted with the manner of their acting (29). There is many a man, who for twenty years has conversed with an infinite number of women, without having a mind to marry: the same man will meet by chance, either in a boat, at a feast, or visit, a woman, with whose beauty he shall be so smitten, that he will be ready to marry her instantly. She is, per-haps, neither so young nor so handsome as those that could not please him; and, on the other hand, she has conversed with men more susceptible of love than he, without wounding their hearts. The proportion of the object to the faculty was wanting; which being found in this particular case, a match is soon conclud-ed. It may also be affirmed, that a man advanced in years, who, after a long train of reasonings, concludes that he ought to renounce celibacy, does thereby dis-pose himself to incontinence: he grows easy to be struck in that part of the brain which stirs up love; the object which strikes him in that place pleases and charms him, he continually thinks upon it, he has a mind to enjoy it. This robs him of that fine gift of continence which nature had given him; he finds himself in a burning condition, and so marries, ac-cording to St Paul's advice. Therefore there is no-thing improbable in the apology I have made for the marriage of our old man; and we rather find in it a remarkable instance, to prove, that there is nothing more rash than the vow of celibacy. The gift of con-tinence is not a thing on which a man may depend. He has, you will say, been proof against a thousand most lovely objects for a great many years: well, does it follow that he will be so eternally? Can you answer that at last you will not see some other object bet-ter proportioned to the fibres of your brain? Love comes as a thief in the night, when you least expect him. Keep therefore your liberty always; possess your gift as not possessing it; think that you may lose it, and that you will lose it, perhaps, when you least to come and reap the fruit of the seed he had sown in their hearts (y). The next day after his arrival (z), he preached in the church of the retrenchment. think on it: It is but meeting a person who may create love in you. This will be the sponge of your continence.

Yet, after all, it is somewhat surprizing that our Farel remained a bachelor to his old age. One would think, that his constitution, which was so brisk and vigorous, that at the age of seventy five years (30) he got a son, tho' his wife was then old, should have induced him to marry before. The efficacious eloquence, with which he opposed the validity of monastical vows, required no less his marriage: since at that time, to avoid being suspected of heterodoxy, a man was obliged to preach by example (31). Erasmus, speaking of the progress which the reformers made, says, among other things, that many friars and nuns married. He had said, but just before, that Farel preached in the country of Montbeliard: 'In montem Bellicardi vocatus est Pharellus ad prædicandum Evangelium hoc novum, cujus hic mirus est successus. Jam multi repudiaverunt Baptismum, & revocarunt Circumcisionem. Missam abominantur plurimi: sunt qui publice doceant in Eucharistia nihil esse nisi panem & vinum: Velum & Cuculla deponitur passim. Nubunt & ducunt uxores monachæ & monachi (32). — Farel was called to Montbeliard to preach this new gospel, the success of which is surprizing here. Multitudes have now renounced baptism, and recalled circumcision. Great numbers abhor the mass: there are some who publicly teach that there is nothing in the eucharist but bread and wine. The veil and the cowl are discarded by many. Monks and nuns marry, and are given in marriage. Mr Maimbourg observes, that Farel's sermon to the nuns of Geneva was full of exhortations to marriage. 'The sisters of St Clare, who were the only nuns of Geneva, were obliged to go from thence, tho' no violence was offered to those holy virgins, save only, that the most prevailing arguments were used to persuade them to quit their veils, and to accept of such as offered to marry them: and they were compelled to hear a tedious and ridiculous sermon, which the minister Farel preached in their monastery, in the presence of their syndics, on this text of the gospel, Exurgens Maria abiit in Montana, to prove to them, that, in imitation of the virgin Mary, who went to visit her cousin Elizabeth on the mountains of Judea, they ought not to be recluses, and were obliged to live in the world, and to marry like other people (33). I shall say, by the way, that those who think that the reformed ministers laboured too much at that time, to shew the excellence of marriage, and to thunder against vows of continence, do not consider the circumstances of the time. It must be remembered, that the celibacy of priests had been for some ages an unexhausted source of scandalous impurities which dishonoured the christian name. It was therefore necessary to put the ax to the root of the tree, and to drain that source by the abolition of vows. It was necessary manfully to confute that pernicious tenet, that a whoring priest committed a less sin than a priest that married. That tenet is a necessary consequence of the law of celibacy: for, according to the principles of the Romanists, a clerk, who marries after the vows of continence, engages himself by oath to violate all his life-time an inviolable law; and therefore he is more guilty than if he should fall sometimes into the sin of fornication. This is but a transient fault, and does not hinder him from acknowledging his fall, and repenting of it, or from returning to the observation of his vow; but if he marries, he runs himself into the necessity of violating it without remorse, and without return. It was therefore necessary vigorously to preach up the honesty and dignity of marriage, and against the audaciousness of those who disparaged it so far as to prefer fornication to it. Besides, it was to be feared, that if the priests and monks who renounced popery should abstain from marriage, the same impurities might soon creep into the reformed church, which had exposed the Romish clergy to the detestation and contempt of honest men. In order therefore, to prevent that great disorder, it was necessary to encourage those gentlemen to marry, in case they wanted encouragement; and so the most eminent men were obliged to shew them the way, and served for an example. We must do the great men of the primitive church the justice to own, that they were led by excellent motives to recommend celibacy; for nothing is more proper to make the gospel spread and fructify, than the belief, that those who preach it have mortified their flesh, and debar themselves even of those pleasures which worldly men may enjoy without sin. They considered that marriage was attended with a thousand earthly and sensual cares, which made too much diversion from the sacerdotal functions; and, in short, being dazzled by the fair outides of celibacy, they went so far, at last, as to turn it into a law. But it may be said, that the promoters of such a law had not sufficiently studied human nature; for if they had been thoroughly acquainted with it, they would never have imposed so heavy a yoke on the necks of the ministers of the altar. Every one of them ought to have said to the other, we go no deeper than the bark; the shining superficies deceives us.

ROSCOMMON.

If they had foreseen the consequences of that law, they would, in all probability, have looked upon their fine notions as a snare of the tempter.

Note, that Florimond de Remond affirms, that Farel had had a former wife, when he married so old. These are his words: 'Farel having quitted his place to him, to make himself minister at Neuchâtel, where at a decrepit age of seventy years, having the stone and gout, (the usual lot of old age) he married again with the daughter of his house-keeper, full of last, like an old stag; lamenting in vain his youthful vigour, more idle and unprofitable in her arms than among his books (35).'

[K] He was not at that time so old as it is reported. Beza affirms that Farel went to Metz in the year 1565, notwithstanding his extreme old age, which was above fourscore years (36). But he has better set down Farel's age in another book (37), where he allows him only seventy six years. Mr Ancillon should not have copied this mistake of Theodore Beza, since he had placed the birth of Farel in the year 1489 (38). Thus you see how authors forget in one place of the same book what they have said in another. God, says he (39), put it into the heart of Farel, who was then above eighty years old, to take a journey to Metz where he arrived the twelfth of May, 1565.

ti nominatim traducti? & tamen ipse solus non appoint nomen suum. Idem ut audio auxit stolidum Alberi judicium, quod nondum videre licuit. Vixi sunt Constantiæ & alii duo libelli quos in me scripsit. Et profectur novum dogma, sic traducendos qui obstitunt Evangelio, inter quos me numerat, & Balam passim appellat. — I have had a short encounter with Farel: he wrote his life to a correspondent at Constance: a copy was privately conveyed to me. I never saw any thing more vain, or virulent. There are sometimes ten sentences together without one syllable of truth. He published a treatise de Parisiensibus & Pontifice. What a heap of unmeaning trash, and insipid malice is there. How many has he expressed by traduced? He does not however put his name to it. He has, as I am informed, enlarged Alber's foolish judgment which I have not yet had an opportunity to see. Two other pamphlets have appeared at Constance which he wrote against me. He has therein breached a new doctrine, that all should be used after the same base manner, who oppose the gospel, of which number he makes me to be one, and often compliments me with the name of Balaam.

[M] By marking the mistakes of Moreri, we shall shew the errors of some other writers. I. Moreri says, that by Farel's means heresy made also the greatest progress in Dauphiné. He is mistaken; for all the share Farel had in the conversion of that province, is contained in these words of Beza (44): 'It happened in the mean time, that William Farel going from his church of Neuchâtel in Switzerland to Gap, his native place, and passing through Grenoble, he made a lively and ardent exhortation; he being a man full of zeal for God beyond any in our days, and having disposed them to do well, he left there, for their minister, Aynard Pichon, to encourage them.' II. Farel, I confess, was minister at Neuchâtel after he went from Geneva; but before he had been minister at Geneva, he had exercised the same office at Neuchâtel; and consequently Moreri has not followed chronology. III. He falls into the like error, when he says, that this minister, having been somewhat hardly used by those of Geneva, taught his doctrine afterwards at Metz, Montbelliard, Lausanne, and elsewhere. After his banishment from Geneva, he only taught it at Neuchâtel and Metz. His first seats at arms, if I may so speak, was the reformation of Montbelliard; and what he did at Lausanne preceded his ministry at Geneva. IV. He should not have quoted the annals of Sleidan; for the history of that author is not so called. V. According to Moreri, Farel was charged with reviving the heresy of Paulus Samosatenus, and those of the Eleutherians; which appears by a letter he wrote to Calvin, which begins thus: Literas tuas quæque est, &c. (45). and which is the seventy eighth among Calvin's letters. I could not yet find out the ground of all this: I have only discovered (46), that one Peter Caroli, formerly a doctor of the Sorbonne, retired to Geneva about the year 1535; and being known to be a trimmer in matters of religion, and too great a lover of women and good cheer, it was not easy for him to find a good church: he aimed at being minister of Neuchâtel, but could not compass it. Farel was undoubtedly the cause of it, and Calvin and Viret were also against him; which, in all appearance, is the true reason that prompted that Caroli to accuse them sometimes of Arianism, and sometimes of Sabellianism. A synod was thereupon called at Lausanne, where he produced all the proofs he could possibly get together to maintain his accusation. But the accused defended themselves so well, that his proofs were declared null, and they obtained a sentence declaring them orthodox; and as for him, the synod adjudged him unworthy of the ministry (47). Caroli was not thereby disheartened: he appeared with his bag full of accusations, swelled with new pieces, in a synod of Bern, and endeavoured to obtain a declaration, that the accused had at least given occasion to suspicions. They confuted him fully as to that, and were absolved in that particular, as well as in relation to heresy (48). 'Ubi à nobis excussa omnia fuerant quibus suspicionem aliquam de tempore præterito injicere conatur atque hac ratione, cui non satisfaceret, nemo præter ipsum repertus est. Fratres ut dignum erat fidei Christi Ministris nos iniquissime in suspicionem aliquam (49) adductos sibi videri pronuntiarunt. — Having refused all his arguments, by which he endeavoured to shew there had been sufficient room for suspicion formerly, there was none besides himself who were not satisfied with the answer. Our brethren, as became faithful ministers of CHRIST, declared we had been most iniquitously prosecuted upon groundless surmises.

By Calvin's letter, out of which I borrow those words, it appears, that the abstracts of Caroli's accusations being spread every where, had caused very ill impressions against those accused ministers: so true is it, that man is apt to be wrought upon by the assurance of an impudent calumniator! Caroli would not yield to the authority of the synod, but persisted alone in maintaining his accusation (50). It is the character of pragmatical, proud and revengeful spirits, never to own they have rashly defamed their brethren. 'Dum hæc geruntur, afferuntur à Myconio literæ publicæ ad conventum scriptæ. Aliæ rursum à Capitone ad Farellum generatim missæ, quibus utrisque intellectum est, horrendum longe lateque rumorem de nostra controversia pervagatum esse. Denique ad excitandam erga nos gentium omnium invidiam maliciose à certis hominibus fibrefactum. Quod autem homo nihili fuilissima sua vanitate tantum proficere potuerit, ut tot ecclesiis finitram de nobis opinionem injiceret: id vero est, quod nos vehementer perturbavit. — Whilst these things were carrying on, a letter came from Myconius to the synod, another from Capito to Farel; from both of which it appeared, that a dreadful rumour had been spread far and near concerning our controversy, and that certain persons laboured to draw upon us the hatred of all people. That a worthless man by his ridiculous vanity should be able to effect this, made us really uneasy.' Calvin observes, that Caroli was condemned to banishment (51). Note, that by all this it does not appear that William Farel was charged with Samosaténianism. I know very well what Lindanus observes, that this minister taught, that the Holy Ghost was nothing but the motion God imprinted upon the creatures (52). I know also, that, to make good his assertion, Lindanus quotes a letter from Caroli to the cardinal of Lorraine (53), but I am certain there are here a great many frauds. He falls into a blunder, which I shall not pass over in silence. Those of Basil, says he (54), dreaded so much Farel's mutinous spirit, that, having been informed of his two escapes from Montbelliard, they banished him. He quotes Erasmus. epist. ad Prin. Infer. Germ. It is easy to convict him that he examined very slightly the authors he quoted: for Erasmus's letter, on which he grounds himself, is not directed ad Principes, but ad Fratres inferioris Germaniæ; neither does Erasmus say, that those of Basil did banish Farel since his two flights from Montbelliard, well knowing that Farel did not go to Montbelliard till after his banishment from Basil. Prateolus (55) adopts all the faults and phrases of Lindanus: and they talk both of a chimerical sect of Farellists, which never existed but in the fancy of the impertinent makers of catalogues of heretics. Gaultier the jesuit brings that same sect upon the stage, and quotes Prateolus. He says, that Farel (56) revived the whole heresy of Paulus Samosatenus, and renewed the doctrine of the Eleutherians. He pretends to prove it by a letter, wherein he supposes, that this minister does not declare those to be damned who dissemble their faith in time of danger, provided they do not openly profess idolatry. 'Dicens nolle se eos damnare qui periculum formidant adducti fidem suam dissimulant modo idololatram exterius non profitentur (57). He quotes Farel. ep. ad Caler. cujus initium, Literas tuas, quæque est 78. inter epistolas Calvini (58). We have seen before, that Moreri founds himself on the same quotation. I have Calvin's letters, printed at Hanaw in the year 1597. The seventy eighth is from Butler to Calvin. None of those of our Farel begins with Literas tuas, nor favours the Nicodemites; and I find in his life, composed by Mr Ancillon (59), a

* that it is to the letter he wrote to Calvin, the second of November 1544, we owe that excellent work of Calvin against the Nicodemites, which we have in his Opuscula from page 789 to 803. Here follows an evident lie of father Gualtier. He supposes that Calvin took Geneva from Farel, qui tamen eam (Geneviam) illi postea eripuit, adeo ut deinde Nescomensis minister creatus sit (60). It is most certain that those two ministers were driven out of Geneva at the same time, and for the same cause; and that when Calvin was recalled, they would also have recalled Farel, who notwithstanding Calvin's earnest intreaties (61) would never comply to this new invitation of those of Geneva.

This lie of father Gualtier is more pardonable than that in Prateolus, who assures us that the archers surprized Farel at Basil, in a house of prostitution, upon a Holy Friday (62)

FARNABY (THOMAS) was a learned philologist of the XVIIth century. His notes upon the greatest part of the Latin poets have been of great service to the youth. They are short, and full of learning, tending chiefly to explain the text. He lived at London (a), and applied himself to teach children of figure and quality, and found a good account in it for the maintenance of his family (b). I believe also his epistles dedicatory brought him in some profit, tho' he says, somewhere, that the time was over for making much that way [A]. He dedicated his Horace to prince Henry, eldest son to king James I, and afterwards his Juvenal and Persius. He was very graciously received by the young prince (c), when he had the honour to present the latter book to him, and he gave him a kind of order to make a like commentary upon all the Latin poets; but he was so sensibly touched at certain criticisms made upon him, that he resolved out of indignation and against the bent of his own genius to discontinue his work. Some time after he was persuaded to change his mind (d). He had a country house twenty miles from London, whither he retired in the year 1636 (e). Charles I commanded him to compose a Latin grammar for the use of all the schools; he received, I say, this order when there was a necessity to reform that grammar which had been established by authority, and which had been very much complained of (f). He died in the year 1647 (g). A French Dominican has bestowed great encomiums upon the writings of this author [B]. See also what is said concerning his notes upon Martial, in a book of the jesuit Vavasseur de Epigrammate (h).

[A] He says somewhere that the time was over to get much by epistles dedicatory. He applies to this purpose a particular related by Valerius Maximus, which is, that though they did not consult, as formerly, the flight of birds at marriages, yet they invited to the wedding the persons appointed to take those observations, retaining, at least in name, some footsteps of the ancient ceremony. 'Quod antiquis, apud quos nihil nisi auspicio prius sumpto gerebatur factitatum, ut ex more, nuptiis auspices interpositi, quamvis auspicia defissent (Val. Max. lib. 2. cap. 1.) ipso tamen nomine veteris consuetudinis vestigia usurparent: hoc plerisque nostrum quos vexat insanabile hoc scribendi cacœthes, usu venit ut quamvis patronorum exoleverit cum autoritas tum benignitas, non citra ambitionem tamen summis & gravibus viris perituræ chartæ tutelam obtrudamus (1). — As the ancients never engaged in any enterprise, without first consulting the omens, for which reason the soothsayers were applied to in marriage, and tho' that custom was laid aside, there still remained some marks of it: so most of us moderns are infected with an incurable itch of scribbling, though the authority and benevolence of patrons is out of date, and still obtrude our shortlived labours on persons of the greatest merit and distinction.' His meaning is, that though the real benefits of epistles dedicatory is lost, yet the custom of dedicating is not given over.

[B] A French Dominican has bestowed great encomiums upon the works of this author. It is in the place where he undertakes to shew that the jesuits are inferior to abundance of other writers, who have shone in polite learning (§a). 'Doleo, continens he (2), meo tempore, cum literis humanioribus studerem, defuisse nobis illud subsidium ad rem litterariam maxum, quod suppeditarunt à paucis annis Farnabius & alii; Poëtis omnibus commentariis marginalibus ita clarè explicatis, ut mediocribus grammaticis possit etiam difficillimos inoffenso pede locos decurrere. Hæc non possunt expectari aut parari adjumenta, ad auctorum peritiam, ab iis, qui per tres aut quatuor annos literas humaniores docent, & ad Theologiæ conscendunt vel philosophiæ cathedram, sed ab his, qui consensescunt & immoriuntur Grammaticæ, aut rhetoriæ scholis; quales non dubito fuisse illos, qui adeo utilem & necessariam opem contulerunt bonarum litterarum studiosis, Commentatores marginales. — I am sorry that during the time of my study we had not those helps to learning, which Farnaby and others have of late years given. All the poets are so clearly illustrated with marginal notes, that a mean grammarian may with ease get over the greatest difficulties. Such helps as these cannot come from those, who teach polite learning for three or four years, and then step into the chair of divinity or philosophy, but from those who grow old in the schools of grammar or rhetoric. Such I do not question those to have been, who by their marginal comments have bestowed on all lovers of learning, a most useful and necessary work.'

[§a] I believe the author of this observation is Cæsar Cremoninus, in his harangue pronounced in 1591, for the university of Padua, against the jesuits. Mr Antony Arnaud quotes the place, page 6, and 7, of his Franc & véritable discours, &c. edition of 1662, and the piece itself is to be found in page 445, of the Mercurie jésuite, edition of 1626. (1) Pag. 339, cited by Desjardins, Remarques sur l'Etat présent de l'Empire Ottoman par Ricaut, Tom. 1, pag. 74.

[A] Some accounts say she is the great saint. . . . at Com.] Herbert, in his Persian travels, having said that the mosque at Com is magnificent, adds (1): The devotion they have for this place has enriched it with many great presents brought to the sepulchre of Fatima the wife of Mortis Ali, and daughter of Mahomet, the great prophet of all the Mussulmen, who is buried here. The building of the mosque is round, and made after the Epirotic manner. The tomb of the pretended saint is raised twelve feet from the ground, and lers are of another opinion. Some say the faint at Com is the daughter of Ali and Fatima [B]. According to Peter della Valle she is their grand-daughter [C]. Others say, she is the daughter of Mousa the son of Dgafer. This latter opinion is supported by one authentic Proof, viz. the titles they give the faint at Com in the solemn prayers the pilgrims direct to her [D]. These are forms of prayers, and consequently they furnish us with a good proof how little exact travellers are, since some of the most celebrated of them relate so ill the titles of such a faint. It appears by this formulary of prayers that Fatima, the daughter of Mahomet, the wife of Ali, and mother of some children, is nevertheless venerated as a virgin [E].

[B] Some say she is the daughter of Ali and Fatima. This appears in Figueroa's narrative: they informed me, says he (2), that at Com there was a famous mosque, dedicated to the memory of a great saint named Lela, grand-daughter of Mahomet, and the daughter of Ali and Fatima. The Sieur Belpier advances a conjecture which is very probable: The name of Lela, says he (3), is commonly given to the great ladies of Africa, and it is also the title of honour which they give there to the Blessed Virgin, mother of our Lord JESUS, for whom the Mahometans have a great deal of respect and veneration, as well as for her son. He cites Diego de Torres, who assures us (4) that they call the Holy Virgin, Lela Mariam, which signifies, the Lady Mary, and that (5) all the daughters of the cherif took the title of Lela, and he names them all four, viz. Lela Mariam, Lela Aya, Lela Fatima, and Lela Lu. After this Belpier adds, that he is inclined to think that Lela was not the proper name of the faint mentioned by Figueroa, but only the title of honour preceding it, and that she had another name which Figueroa has omitted, or was not informed of. The inhabitants of Com, who held that maid for a saint, were content with calling her Lela, or The Lady by way of excellence: much after the same manner, as most christians now call the Virgin Mary Our Lady.

[C] According to Peter della Valle, she is their grand-daughter. There is a fine bridge at Com, and near the bridge a magnificent mosque, in which they told me that a sister of Iman Riza, whom they have a veneration for, and who was one of the most esteemed successors of Mahomet, is buried, whom also they look upon as a saint in their way: so that they have a great respect and veneration for the place of her burial (6). Iman Riza was the son of Houssein, who was Fatima's son (7): let us say therefore that the sister of Iman Riza is the grand-daughter of Fatima. Tavernier's relation agrees here with that of Peter della Valle. What is most remarkable at Com is a great mosque . . . where are seen the sepulchres of Cha-Señ and Cha-Abas the second, and that of Sidi-Fatima the daughter of Iman-Hocen, who was the son of Ali, and of Fatima Zuhra, Mahomet's daughter (8).

[D] The solemn prayers which the pilgrims direct to her. Mr Chardin (9) has copied the two chief prayers they make the pilgrims repeat at Com. The first begins thus: I vish my lady and mistress Fatimé, the daughter of Mousa, son of Dgafer, upon whom be salvation and peace for ever. There is one remarkable thing in these prayers, which is, that therein they recommend themselves to the intercession of this faint, and make vows for her. We have seen already that they wish her peace and eternal salvation: here is another part of that formulary: I wish thee eternal salvation, O Fatimé daughter of Mousa, virgin, holy, virtuous, just, director of truth, pious, sanctified, worthy of all our praises, who supremely lovest the faithful, and art supremely beloved by them: Virgin without spot, and free from all impurity. May GOD take his greatest delight in thee, be always well pleased with thee, and establish thee in paradise, which is thy eternal refuge and abode (10). But immediately they recommend themselves to her prayers in the following manner (11): I am come to seek thee, O lady and mistress of my soul, with a view of approaching by this pious act to the most high GOD, and to his apostle and his children. May the mercy of GOD be upon him, and them for ever. I detest and abhor my sins, the load of which miserably oppresses me, and I do my endeavour to break the yoke of hell. Vouchsafe me thy intercession, O holy Virgin, in that day when the righteous shall be separated from the wicked. Be then propitious to me; for thou art descended from parents who will suffer none of those that love them to fall into trouble, who refuse nothing to those that pray to them, who divert all kinds of evil from those that cherish them, and whose enemies on the contrary can never prosper. Chardin informs us (12) that the tomb of this Fatimé has been three times rebuilt: Her father, continues he, carried her to Com on account of the persecution which the califs of Bagdat raised against his family, and all that held Ali and his descendants for the only lawful successors of Mahomet. She built several fine houses in this city, and died there. The people believe that GOD took her up into heaven, and that her tomb has nothing in it, being only a representation. The Romish church then is not the only one that honours the assumption of virgins. We have seen that the immaculate conception, and the virginity of a mother, seem to be two doctrines of the Mahometan religion. One thing is wanting in Mr Chardin's narrative. He should have told us in what time Mousa the father of Fatimé lived.

[E] Though the wife of Ali, and mother of several children, she is nevertheless venerated as a virgin. The pilgrims are obliged, according to the formulary of prayers, among other things, to say thus: 'I wish thee eternal salvation, O virgin most pure, most just, and immaculate, glorious Fatima, daughter of Mahomet the elect, wife of Ali the well beloved, mother of twelve true vicars of GOD, of illustrious birth (13).' 474.

FAUCHET (CLAUDE) a Parisian, and first president of the court of the mint at Paris, published some books which gained him the reputation of a learned man [A]. He died very old in the year 1601. Lewis XIII was not pleased with his way of writing (a). The Sieur Sorel, in his French Bibliothèque, makes a parallel between him and Scipio du Pleix (b). It deserves to be read.

[A] He published some books, which gained him the reputation of a learned man. He has translated with great labour and learning the history of Cor. Tacitus, printed at Paris by Abel l'Angelier in 1582, 1583, 1584, in folio, in 4to, and 8vo, without putting his name to it, no more than to his book of Gallic Antiquities . . . so little does he thirst after fame, only desiring to benefit the public (1). Thus la Croix du Maine spoke in the year 1584. Mr Baillet does not mention this translation as an anonymous work. Claude Fauchet, says he (2), has translated into our language the works of Tacitus, which were printed under his name in divers forms, but the first five books are translated by Stephen de la Planche (3). Fauchet published a Collection of Gallic and French antiquities in two books, in the year 1579;

in 4to. Twenty years after he gave a second edition of it in 8vo, and carried it down to the end of the first race of the kings of France. He published the sequel of it, in 1601, in 8vo: it is intitled, Flur de la maison de Charlemagne . . . contenant les faits de Pepin & ses successeurs depuis l'an 751, jusques à l'an 840 de JESUS CHRIST. He died while they were printing, Declin de la maison de Charlemagne . . . contenant les faits de Charles le Chauve & ses successeurs depuis l'an 840, jusques à l'an 987 de JESUS CHRIST & entrée du regne de Hugues Capet. This volume came out in 1620, in 8vo. As to the work des Origines des Chevaliers, Armoiries, & Héraux, ensemble de l'ordonnance, armes & instrumens desquels les François ont anciennement usé en leurs guerres, it was printed at Paris in the year 1600, in 8vo. His Recueil de l'origine de la langue & poésie Française, Rhyne & Romans; plus les noms & sommaire des Oeuvres de 127 poètes Français, vivans avant l'an 1300, was printed at Paris in 4to, in the year 1581. The edition of his works done at Paris in 1610 (4), which Morel mentions, was reprinted at Geneva the year following. (4) It is in 4to.

FAUCHEUR (a) MICHAEL LE) was an illustrious minister among the protestants of France in the XVIIth century. Preaching was his great talent [A], in which indeed he excelled. He made himself admired in this way in the church of Montpellier [B]; and as his reputation increased, and the church of Paris used to appropriate to herself the greatest preachers of the provinces, he was called up thither. He was not sorry of an opportunity to undeceive those who thought his capacity was confined to the making a good sermon and delivering it well. Wherefore he engaged in a larger work upon the eucharist against cardinal Perron. They were agreeably surprized to see a large folio come from his pen, full of Greek and Latin quotations, and all sorts of erudition relating to that controversy. His other works are several volumes of sermons, and a treatise of the action of an orator [C], which was lately reprinted in Holland. I have seen a latin manuscript letter of his, in which he gave very good advice to the great du Moulin upon his book of the Salmurian controversies. Le Faucher died at Paris the first of April 1657 (b).

[A] His talent was preaching. I have heard that one day he preached with so much eloquence against duelling, that the marshal de la Force, who was present at the sermon, protested before some men of the sword, that if a challenge was sent him, he would not accept it.

[B] He made himself admired in the church at Montpellier. The sermon, he preached there upon a fast-day in the year 1618, was several times reprinted. It is a most solid and pathetic piece.

[C] He wrote a treatise of the action of an orator. It was printed at Leyden the year 1686, and falsely attributed to Mr Conrart; whether they believed he was the author, or designed to make the book sell the better, by putting the name of a man to it who was celebrated for his politeness. The journalists of Leipzig give a very exact abstract of it, in their Journal of the month of January 1687 (1). They did not forget the place where the author speaks of a preacher, who made himself a rule to cough exactly at such and such a period; and least he should forget, he made marks in his notes wherever he proposed to cough. In those places he wrote hem, hem, as was seen in the original after his death. The advice given by these journalists was followed by a professor of Helmstadt (2), who translated that treatise into Latin. This translation was published in the same city in 1690. They make mention of it (3), informing the public that the translator had restored that work to its true author. Their supposition that this book, having been printed at Lyons without the author's name in 1676, was published at Paris ten years after under Mr Conrart's name, and that the Holland edition, in imitation of that of Paris, also ascribes it to Mr Conrart, wants to be corrected. I. The anonymous edition of Lyons in 1679 is not the first. I remember to have seen this book ever since 1666. II. They did not print it at Paris in 1686, with Mr Conrart's name to it. Those words ad exemplar Parisi 1686, which those gentlemen quote (4), signify, not that it was printed from the edition which came out at Paris in 1686, but that it was printed in 1686 according to the Paris edition. And so they do not give the date of the Paris edition.

FAUSTA, daughter of Maximian Herculeus (a), was wife to the emperor Constantine. She was bestowed upon him with a design to deceive him (b); but she discovered Maximian's treachery to her husband (c). They say that Constantine suspecting that Crispus, a son he had (d) by a concubine (e), had an unlawful commerce with Fausta, caused him to be put to death; and to comfort his mother Helena, who was infinitely grieved at the death of that young man, he ordered Fausta to be smothered in a very hot bath. This is affirmed by Zosimus (f). Some say that Fausta, falling in love with Crispus, discovered her passion to him; but not being able to prevail upon him, she complained to Constantine that he would have attempted her virtue. They add, that Constantine believing Fausta's calumny, put Crispus to death; but afterwards, being convinced of his son's innocence, he ordered her to be executed [A]. Cardinal Baronius

[A] Some say that Fausta falling in love with Crispus Constantine put Crispus and that woman to death. This tragical event is related a thousand different ways by authors, and almost always curtailed of some of the most essential circumstances. Zosimus

(1) pretends that Constantine suspected Crispus had to do with Fausta; and yet he assures us that the emperor put Crispus to death without inflicting any punishment upon the empress; for he says she was stifled in the bath, only because it was found necessary to do so, to comfort Constantine's mother. Such a relation deserves much to be censured. Crispus could not be suspected as guilty of incest with Fausta, without Fausta's being suspected of the same crime. How comes it to pass then that Constantine punished none but Crispus? this is an objection Zosimus ought to have foreseen and obviated, and yet he has taken no manner of precaution against it: therefore he has not given an exact account of Constantine's behaviour in this affair. According to the latter part of his narrative, it should have been been said in the first, that Crispus was suspected, not of committing incest with Fausta, but of having attempted her chastity in vain. Then the consequence would have been natural, and every body would have easily conceived that Constantine sacrificed the innocence of his wife to his mother's grief, or that by certain artifices they had persuaded him that the empress's conduct had not been faultless. To have a full account of this event we must have recourse to Metaphrastus: I confess he is not an author very worthy of credit; but yet he leaves the fewest chasms, he is one that puts the circumstances into good order. Crispus accused by his mother-in-law is punished: his father looks upon him as the only criminal. No wonder then that Fausta suffers nothing. Afterwards she is convicted of being a false accuser, and is punished on that score. Note, Metaphrastus supposes that Artemius the martyr relates this to justify Constantine, and answer the objections of Julian the apostate. Read the following passage of Baronius (2): 'Artemius præfectus Augustalis, idemque martyr, cum christianitatis reus causam ageret coram Juliano Apostata, deroganti illi Constantino, multaque in eum obijcanti, ac præsertim propinquorum necem, hæc tunc in eum pro Constantino respondit: 'Ille autem (inquit) uxorem Faustam juste admodum interfecit, ut quæ pristinam Phædræ esset imitatrix, ejusque filium Crispum calumniata, quod ejus amore captus esset, et vim ei conatus esset asferre, sicut etiam illa Hippolytum Thesi filium. Atque primum quidem qui sic in matrem insaniat (ut volebant ejus verba) ille cum esset maritus, punivit. Postea autem cum scivisset esse mentiam, ipsam quoque occidit, in eam ferens sententiam omnium justissimam. Hæc Artemius ad Julianum. — Artemius the emperor's lieutenant, and a martyr, being accused of christianity, and obliged to appear on his trial before Julian the apostate, who inveighed against Constantine, laying several heavy things to his charge, but more particularly the murder of his nearest relations, made this answer in defence of Constantine. He killed, says he, and that most justly his wife Fausta, because like another Phædra she had falsely accused his son Crispus of having fallen in love with her, and attempted her honour, as the first had done to Hippolytus son of Theseus. In the person of a husband he punished the son, who, according to his wife's insinuation, had been transported with so unjustifiable a passion. But when he was afterwards convinced of his wife's perfidy: he put her likewise to death, making her undergo a sentence, than which none could be more just. Thus Artemius replied to Julian.' Sidonius Apollinaris tells us, that Ablavius the consul made a distich which was fixed upon the palace gates, containing a stinging satire upon Constantine's cruelty. 'Ut mihi non figuratus Constantini domum vitamque videtur vel pupugisse veru gemello consul Ablavius, vel momordisse disticho tali clam palatinis foribus appenso:

Quia scilicet prædictus Augustus iisdem ferè temporibus extinxerat conjugem Faustam calore balnei, filium Crispum frigore veneni (4). These words of Sidonius Apollinaris say nothing of the cause of Constantine's proceeding; they only inform us that this prince put his wife Fausta to death by the heat of a bath, and his son Crispus by the deadly cold of poison. Most writers say that Crispus was killed, not poisoned. 'Ad Ilium duxit prope oppidum Polam, ubi quondam PEREMPTUM Constantini filium accepimus Crispum (5). — To Ithra near the town of Pola, where, it is said, Crispus the son of Constantine was killed.' St Jerom's expression is: 'Hic (Laetantius) extrema senectute magister Cæsaris Crispum, filium Constantini in Gallia fuit, qui postea à patre INTERFECTUS est (6). — Laetantius in his old age was preceptor to Crispus, son to Constantine, in Gaul, who was afterwards slain by his father.' We read in Eusebius's chronicle, that Crispus the son of

Constantine, and young Licinius the son of Constantine's sister, were barbarously murdered, CRUELISSIMÉ INTERFICIUNTUR, the first year of the CCLXXVth Olympiad, that is in the year 325; and that Constantine put his wife Fausta to death the fourth year of the same Olympiad. Orosius says nothing of Fausta; but he says that Constantine, about the time that the Arian heresy was condemned in the council of Nice, put to death Crispus his own son, and Licinius his nephew, without any body's knowing the reasons of his being thus exasperated against his own blood. 'Sed inter hæc latent causæ, cur vindicem gladium & destinam in impios punitionem Constantinus imperator etiam in propriis egit affectus. (7). — It is not well known what should induce Constantine to draw his vindictive sword, and to inflict the punishment destined for beasts on his own family; for he put to death his own son Crispus, and his sister's son Licinius.' It is very strange this historian should never have heard what is attested by so many others, that Crispus was put to death upon suspicion of a criminal love to his mother-in-law; but perhaps Orosius had heard that, and other reasons also, but judged from the diversity of opinions that the true causes of it were concealed. Aurelius Victor, who says that it was believed Constantine made away with Crispus at Fausta's instigation, does not add the motive which she suggested to her husband. But he however agrees with Zosimus concerning the cause of Fausta's death; he says that Constantine ordered her to be put to death in a bath, because his mother Helena, exceedingly afflicted with grief for the death of Crispus, reproached him with it. 'Fausta conjuge, ut putant, suggerente Crispum filium NECARI jubet. Dehinc uxorem suam Faustam in balneis ardentibus coniectam interemit, cum eum mater Helena dolore nimio nepotis increparet (8). — He caused his son Crispus to be put to death upon the suggestions, as it is believed, of his wife Fausta. Afterwards he put her also to death in a hot bath, moved thereto by the complaints if his mother Helena, who extremely regretted the loss of her grandson.' Nothing is more surprizing to me than that Eutropius should enlarge upon Constantine's cruelty, without touching upon the death of Crispus, though he did not forget to mention particularly that of young Licinius, and Fausta (9). It is pretended that St Chrysostome, without naming any celliuidines peccatorum, has related this action of Constantine; but he supposes that this prince, suspecting his wife of adultery, ordered her to be bound upon the top of a mountain, to be devoured by wild beasts. He adds that the son of that prince was killed by his own father, or rather by his brother (10). Gregorius Turonensis affirms that Constantine put his son Crispus, and his wife Fausta to death, for high-treason (11). Philostorgius says that Constantine being prepossessed by the calumnies of his wife, Crispus's mother-in-law, ordered him to be killed, and afterwards having discovered that she committed adultery with a courier, he caused her to be sufficed in the bath (12). Besides the authors I have named, the reader will do well to consult Suidas (13) pag. m. 58. and Zonaras.

I have produced all these authorities, that the reader may see the defects, variations, and want of exactness, in ancient historians. Note also, that having so many authors to cite upon this subject, it is strange that no body should be quoted in Moreti but Ammianus Marcellinus, who says nothing, either of Fausta, or of the reason why Crispus was put to death. We have seen before (14) all that is to be met with in this writer concerning this matter.

I cannot omit the liberty Caussin the Jesuit has taken to add abundance of things of his own invention to the account of this adventure. This would be tolerable in a piece of poetry, or a romance; but in a serious work, and which is intitled The holy court, such rhetorical decorations are not to be allowed. Nothing is more delightful than this to young scholars, or more insipid to persons advanced in age, and judgment. They cannot behold without indignation a long description of the beauty of Crispus, the rise and progress of Fausta's passion, the manner she made her passion known, her rage to be denied, her contrivance to be revenged, her sorrow for the death of Crispus, &c; they cannot bear, I say, the representation of all pressed these facts, or have even endeavoured to confute them [B]. He places the marriage of Constantine with Fausta in the year 307 (b), and the death of Crispus and that empress in 324. Nothing could have been more dangerous to this son of Constantine, than to have his mother-in-law in love with him, for which way soever he acted, he was sure to be ruined by it. A compliance had exposed him to the wrath of God; and besides, if it had been known, he could hope for no favour from Constantine; his refusal was no less fatal, for this was what exposed him to the indignation and rage of an empress [C]. Some say that (i) Fausta brought back Constantine to worship false deities, all these things, though they are not derived from any history. As to the last particular, the author says as follows. 'As soon as this news (15) arrived at court, the wicked Fausta knowing it to be the effect of her own perfidy, and having before her eyes the image of the poor prince whom she had so passionately loved before, but now safely butchered in the bloom of beauty, and at an age, most to be lamented, and of so sweet a temper as would have excited compassion in lions and tigers; all her passion and hatred was turned into outrageous grief, which forced her to cry and howl at her husband's feet, confessing she had murdered the chaste Crispus by her abominable calumnies; that she had solicited him to wickedness; but had found him, like Joseph, armed with invincible chastity, abhorring her sin to the degree it deserved; whereupon, stung with rage, and fearing to be prevented, she had invented that calumny against him; for which reason she was unworthy to live any longer, after having destroyed the most innocent prince in the world, and stained his own father with his blood (16).' What boldness this! An author of the XVIIth century pretends to give us the particulars of a thing which happened in the IVth, and all out of his own head. No ancient author has informed us how Constantine came to know his son's innocence, much less that it was Fausta herself who discovered it to the emperor.

(16) Cassius, Hist. Court. Tom. II, pag. m. 56.

[B] Cardinal Baronius justly complains of the writers . . . who have suppressed these facts, or who have even endeavoured to confute them. He attacks on this head three historians; Eusebius, Sozomen, and Evagrius. The first is silent: the other two dispute against those who have spoken. Eusebius keeps a profound silence concerning this matter in his life of Constantine, but not in his chronicle. Sozomen durst neither positively acknowledge, nor deny the death of Crispus; he (17) is content to refute the Pagan authors, who had said that Constantine finding no way in Paganism to expiate such execrable murders, but finding a method to do it in the christian religion, forsook the religion of his fathers, and turned christian. Evagrius (18) absolutely denies these two things; first, that Constantine put Crispus and Fausta to death; and secondly, that he embraced christianity for that reason. Baronius (19) having condemned the silence of the first of these historians, as a base flattery, charges (20) Sozomen with incredible stupidity, who, to shew that Constantine did not put Crispus to death, only makes use, says he, of this argument: Crispus lived to the twentieth year of Constantine's reign, and enacted several laws with him. Baronius (21) still wonders more at Evagrius's behaviour: he refers him to the chronicle of Eusebius, to Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, Orosius, Sidonius Apollinaris, &c. Afterwards he confutes the arguments that Sozomen and Evagrius have opposed, the former to the Pagan authors in general, the latter to Zosimus in particular. I. We may observe in the first place that he mutilates their arguments, and that he should not have affirmed that Sozomen denied the death of Crispus (22); for that historian is satisfied with leaving the matter doubtful, and only confutes the consequences which the Pagans would infer from it. The argument, he urges against them, is much better than Baronius makes it; for if Constantine and Crispus had jointly enacted laws in favour of christianity, as Sozomen supposes, it follows that Constantine had abjured the Pagan religion before the death of Crispus; therefore he did not abjure it, because he could not find in it the necessary expiations, stained as he was with the blood of his son, as the Pagans pretended. This is Sozomen's argument: the annalist destroys the force of it, by supposing that this author only said, that Crispus had made laws together with Constantine (23). His observation was not so indefinite: he said those laws were in favour of the christians (24). Baronius does not deal more fairly with Evagrius: he charges him (25) with urging against Zosimus, Eusebius's silence; but it is certain that Evagrius goes farther: he relates (26) three passages in Eusebius's ecclesiastical history, which testify, that the emperor Constantine was always zealous for the true faith, and that his son Crispus, beloved of God, was like his father. II. In the second place let us say, that Sozomen's other arguments have been well answered by the annalist (27), who has plainly made it appear that Sosipater the philosopher was acquainted with Constantine, and ought to have told him, according to the Platonic hypothesis, that the parricides of that emperor could never be expiated: and Zosimus assures us that this was the answer that philosopher did give Constantine. But he has been confuted (28) among other reasons by this: that Sosipater could not be ignorant that the religion of the Greeks had expiatory ceremonies for the most heinous murders; witness Hercules who killed his sons, and his host, and yet found means to expiate it. Baronius (29) refutes these answers of Sozomen excellently well, by shewing a capital difference between the parricides of Constantine, and those of Hercules. The former were committed by a prince in his senses, and the latter by a madman, whose actions could not be deemed voluntary.

No doubt it will be asked, why this annalist undertakes to confirm the slanders of the Pagan authors, and confutes the ecclesiastical historians, who have answered them as well as they could. Does it become a cardinal to declare in a manner for infidels, who have affected to vilify Constantine's conversion, as if that emperor had only abjured Paganism, because the discipline of it was so severe, that there was no remedy against the terrors of his own conscience, whereas the christians offered him an easy method to wash away his guilt in the waters of baptism? we must not think Baronius does all this for nothing: he does it only to support certain traditions which are favourable to the Roman see; he (30) makes use of this to confirm the acts of pope Silvester, and to prove that Constantine received baptism at Rome, from that pope, a little before the celebration of the council of Nice. The annals of Idatius are not in his favour; for they place the death of Crispus in the year 326. Father Pagi (31) places the third consulship of Crispus in the year 324. Consult Godefroy's notes upon Philostorgius (32). After all, it is hard to imagine that, one year before or after the council of Nice, Constantine should consult a heathen philosopher upon the expiatory ceremonies for murder. Could he be still immersed in Pagan superstition after so long a profession of the true faith? note, that even to this day there are some people (33) who question whether he put his wife Fausta to death; and forgot not to compare the pagans with those who have published, and do still publish, that the reformers of the church in the XVth century, did not leave the Romish communion, for any other cause but to free themselves from the rigours of celibacy, and abstinences, and that the liberty of living without auricular confession, and without any austerities, procured them a crowd of followers.

[C] His refusal . . . exposed him to the indignation, and rage of an empress. Those, who are best acquainted with affairs of gallantry, say that it is very imprudent to play the part of a tempter, when their design is nothing more than to try the virtue of a woman; for they run a very great hazard, if they go so far as to gain her consent. The affront they do her, by neglecting the favourable disposition she is in, fills her with resentment, which puts her upon inventing a thousand ways to revenge herself: she cannot bear to remember that she has been deceived, and that the weakness she discovered, has produced nothing; she cannot, I say, think upon this without violent transports of rage, which her deceiver has reason to dread, it is much worse when a woman has declared herself first, and made advances which have met with ill success. Wo to the man she has tried in vain: she meditates nothing but his ruin. The patriarch Joseph is a proof of this (34): and besides this great example in holy writ, the history of the heroic times will furnish no less shining instances of the same: read the adventures of Bellerophon, and those of the chaste Hippolytus. The history of the following ages will also supply us with something of the like, were it only in our Fausta the false accuser of Crispus, who would not gratify her lust. Juvenal has well observed, that if the shame of such a denial inflames hatred, in that case a woman shews the greatest cruelty.

An empress, a queen, and in general, ladies of the highest rank, are especially to be dreaded when their enticements are slighted: their quality makes them more sensible of the injury, and gives them greater opportunities of revenge. To them may be well applied these words of Juno in Virgil (36):

(38) Crispus the son of Constantine.

FEITHIUS (EVERARD) was born at Elburg in Guelderland, in the XVIth century. He spent some years in the study of philosophy, after which he devoted himself entirely to polite learning, and made a great progress therein. He made himself master of the Greek, and even of the Hebrew tongue. The professors of the Academy, which the French protestants had in Berne, gave an ample testimony of it. Having been abroad a long time, he returned into his own country, where he found every body in a consternation on account of the Spanish expedition under Spinola. This made him resolve to leave his native country. He retired into France, where he taught the Greek tongue, and was honoured with the friendship of Casaubon, Messieurs du Puy, and Thuanus. As he was walking in Rochelle, attended with a servant, he was desired to go into a certain citizens house (a). It could never be known since what became of him, tho' the magistrates made the most strict inquiry. It was great pity; for if this young man had arrived to old age, he would have wonderfully improved literature. This opinion is founded upon the manuscripts he left behind him (b); one of which was published at Leyden in 1677 [A].

(b) Taken from Brumanus, Epist. Dedicat. Antiquitatum Horicarum.

[A] One of his works was published at Leyden in 1677. It is a volume in 12ves consisting of 350 pages, intitled Antiquitatum Homeriarum libri quatuor. It contains a great deal of curious and useful learning. Henry Bruman rector of the college of Swol, great nephew to the author (1), took care to publish it.

He promised also to collect Feithius's other writings which were dispersed through the negligence of his heirs. I am well informed, that they are not all lost, and that the tract De Atheniensium Republica, and that De Antiquitatibus Atticis, are in the hands of a most learned antiquary (2).

(2) Mr. Cuper.

FELIBIEN (ANDREW) Sieur des Avaux and de Javerzy, counsellor, historiographer to the king, &c. made himself remarkable by his knowledge of the polite arts. He was of Chartres, where no sooner had he finished his classic learning at fourteen years of age, but he was sent to Paris to learn the sciences and fit himself for business. But his inclination for the muses soon discovered itself. The first essays of his pen shewed the happiness of his genius, and the gracefulness of his style. The Marquis de Fontenay-Mareuil being nominated a second time ambassador extraordinary to Rome in 1647, Mr Felibien was appointed secretary to the embassy, and answered all the expectations of that worthy minister towards him. During his stay at Rome, his natural passion for the polite arts made him willingly sacrifice all his leisure time in visiting persons who excelled in them, and especially the famous Mr Poussin, in whose conversation he became acquainted with the greatest beauties which were in the statues and paintings. From the sublime ideas he then formed of the excellence and perfection of painting, he afterwards composed those learned works which have gained him so much reputation. Upon his return from Italy he went to Chartres, and as his design was to settle, he married Mrs Marguerite le Maire, daughter to the king's advocate in the Presidial, related as well as he to the best families in the city, and among others to the illustrious house of Aligre originally of Chartres. Afterwards his friends presented him to Mr Fouquet, who would have given greater marks of his favour if he had not too soon fallen under disgrace. But Mr Colbert, who loved the arts and sciences, did not neglect him. After he had made him draw certain plans for his majesty, that he might proceed upon the other works he had begun, he got for him a brevet to be historiographer to the king, to his buildings, and the arts and manufactures of France, which was dispatched the 10th of March 1666. The royal academy of architecture being erected in 1671, he was chosen their secretary. After this his majesty made him keeper of his cabinet of antiquities, and gave him an apartment in the Brion palace. He had also one of the first places in the royal academy of inscriptions and medals. Monf. le Pelletier succeeding Monf. Colbert in the direction of the finances, appointed Mr Felibien by commission to be comptroller-general of the bridges and causeways of the kingdom. Tho' he had business enough upon his hands, he did not refuse his assistance to the poor, being many years administrator of the hospital of the Quinze-vingts at Paris. . . . He died the 11th of June 1695, at the Age of seventy six years. He left five children (a) [A]. We shall see, below, the catalogue of his principal works, with the abridgment of the encomium upon them, and the character of his heart [B]. See the journal des Savans of the 28th of November 1695.

(a) Taken word for word from a memoir received from Paris.

[A] He left five children. Three sons and two daughters: the eldest son, formerly dean of the cathedral church of Bourges, is now vicar-general in that archbishopric. The second succeeded him in the office of historiographer to the king, and keeper of his majesty's antiquities. We have of his an historical collection of the lives and works of the most celebrated architects. The third is a monk, Dom Michael Felibien of the congregation of St Maur (1).

(1) Taken word for word from a memoir received from Paris.

[B] We shall see the catalogue of his principal works, with the abridgment of the encomium upon them, and the character of his heart. His chief books are the conferences upon the lives and works of the most excellent painters, ancient and modern, in two volumes in 4to, the second edition. The principles of architecture, sculpture, and painting, with a dictionary of the proper terms in those arts in 4to. Of the origin of painting together with several miscellaneous pieces in 4to. Several descriptions either of Versailles, or of the diversions given by the king, or of pictures, collected into one volume in 12ves. The conferences of the royal academy of painting in one volume in 4to. The description of the abbey de la Trappe in 12ves; and he also left some translations, as an account of what passed in Spain at the disgrace of the count duke of Olivares; translated from the Italian; the castle of the soul of St Theresa translated from the Spanish. The life of pope Pius V translated from the Italian. There appears in whatever he wrote, a solid judgment, an exquisite taste, great politeness and perspicuity. His style is pure, natural, noble, and elegant. The variety of things he has mixed together, especially in his dialogues, and the beautiful strokes he has interspersed with a suitable decorum to his Subject, makes the reading of them exceedingly delightful. But however great his talents were, it was not from thence alone that he gained so much esteem. It was partly owing to the reputation of his integrity; and the honour to be employed by five ministers successively, who were excellent judges of men, is an authentic proof of their approving his conduct. The king himself more than once commended his knowledge and virtue. Had he been ambitious or less moderate than he was, he might easily have advanced himself more in the world, being always welcome to the great men at court, but he could never bring himself to handle other people's money; which was his great consolation at his death. Between eight and nine thousand livres which he annually received from the king's favours, together with his own paternal estate, seemed to him a sufficient reward for a man of letters, who ought rather to be a friend to virtue, than a slave to fortune. He always preserved a great sense of honour and religion. Though he was naturally of a grave and serious temper, nay, haughty and severe, yet his conversation was very agreeable, and upon occasion gay and sprightly. He had a heart full of sincerity and regard to truth, to which he excited himself by these words, benefacere & dicere vera, which he had caused to be engraven upon his seal, and which they put in the exergue of his medal. He lived in the practice of these two duties, which make the honest man, and the true christian (2). You may find all this more particularly in the journal des Savans (3).

FENOILLET (PETER) bishop of Montpellier in the XVIIth century, was of Anancy in Savoy. He applied himself to study with great diligence, and after receiving his doctor's degree in divinity, he applied himself to preaching, and became very famous in it. He was much esteemed by Francis de Sales bishop of Geneva, who gave him a benefice in his diocese, after which he was made canon of the cathedral of Anancy. Being invited to Paris to preach during Lent, he was so much applauded, that Henry IV honoured him with the title of his preacher, and at the end of three years nominated him to the bishopric of Montpellier (a).

FERNELIUS (JOHN) physician to Henry II, king of France, was born in Picardy [A]. He was sent something late to Paris to learn rhetoric and philosophy; but he made so swift a progress, that commencing master of arts at the end of two years, the heads of the college unanimously offered him to be teacher of Logic, with a very considerable salary. He refused these offers, chusing rather by private study, and lectures, to fit himself for a public profession. He followed his studies with such application, [A] He was born in Picardy. I confine myself to this general expression, to be more secure; for I see on one hand that he styles himself Ambianus, a native of Amiens, and on the other that we are assured in his life, that he was born at Clermont, twenty miles from Paris, and that he took the surname of Ambianus, because his father was of Amiens. Claramontio oppidulo (quod viginti duntaxat milliaribus à Lutetia distat) natus atque ingenue educatus, Ambianum in operibus idecirco se prædicat, quod patrem inde habuerit (1). mont is to be understood here Clermont in Beauvaisis. Dom Peter de St Romuald alleges another reason why Fernelius was named Ambianus. He was born, says he (2), at Clermont in Beauvaisis, in a house in the suburbs, where to this day hangs the sign of the swan. Some have called him Ambianois, because the suburb he was born in is called the suburb of Amiens. Mezerai affirms (3) that Fernelius was a native of Montdidier in the diocese of Amiens.

tion, that he denied himself the most innocent pleasures of life which might deprive him of his Cicero, his Plato, or his Aristotle (a). He got this advantage by reading Cicero, that his philosophical lectures were as eloquent as those of other masters were barbarous at that time. He also applied himself much to the mathematics; this hard study threw him into a long fit of sickness, which forced him to leave Paris. Returning thither after the recovery of his health, he resolved to study Physic; but before he entered upon it, he taught a course of philosophy in St Barbe's college. After this he spent four years in the study of physic, and taking his doctor's degree, he confined himself entirely to his closet in order to read the best authors, and cultivate the knowledge of the mathematics. He had an intimate friendship with an excellent rhetorician (b), who taught him polite learning, and whom he instructed in the mathematics. The instruments he invented, and ordered to be made in this science, were very expensive to him; which the wife, he had just married, not approving of, it breaking in upon her fortune, she murmured, wept, and complained to her father (c), and incensed him against Fernellius; at length he desisted, dismissed all his instrument-makers, and applied himself wholly to the practice of physic; but because visiting the sick could not take up all the time of a man, who, like him, allowed very little to eating and sleeping [B], he resumed an occupation which he had followed before he was doctor in physic; I mean he read public lectures upon Hippocrates and Galen. This soon acquired him a very great reputation through all France, and in foreign countries. He was forced at the end of six years to break off these lectures; for the esteem he was in drew such multitudes of patients to him, that he had not time to assist all those that came to consult him; but as nothing could make him leave his private studies, he employed all his leisure hours in composing a book of physic (d), which was published some time after. His disciples pressed him so warmly to read lectures upon this work, that he resolved to do it notwithstanding the opposition of his wife [C], and the advice of his friends. He spent three years in these lectures, and as during that time he undertook another work, which he also made public (e), he laid himself in a manner under a necessity reading publicly some years longer, for they passionately desired him to explain that second book to the youth

[B] He allowed little time to eating and sleep. Every other pleasure but that of learning was insipid to him; he valued neither play, nor walking, nor entertainments, nor conversations. I speak of the time when he was yet only a scholar. 'Ludos, jocos, comotationes, & comestiones, sermones etiam omnium pene condiscipulorum, ac familiarium, fugere statuit, non cibi, non somni, non corporis, non valetudinis, non rei familiaris rationem habere, omnia perperit, dum liberalium artium cognitionem assequeretur: omne in eis studium, diligentiam, curam, induriam adhibere, nullam præterquam ex discendo voluptatem capere: arbitratus omnem horam perire quæ in bonorum authorum lectione & studiis non collocaretur: tanta in illius animo insita erat discendi cupiditas, tantus cognitionis amor & scientiæ (4). — He scorned all plays, diversions, clubs, entertainments, the conversation of his companions, and friends, and payed no regard to feasting, sleeping, dress, exercise, health, or fortune, but devoted himself entirely to study; laying out all his application, industry, and care in the search of learning, in which was his sole delight. He imagined every hour was lost that was not dedicated to the reading of good Authors, such was his desire for learning, such was his love for knowledge and improvement.' The sequel of his life did not contradict such a beginning; never man was more active than he. He rose at four a clock in the morning, and studied till the time came on to read the public lectures, or to visit the sick. Then he examined the urines that were brought to him, and prescribed medicines according to the conjectures he could form (5). When he returned home to dinner, he shut himself up with his books till he was called to sit down to table, from table went into his closet again, which he did not leave till he was called to go abroad upon business. When he returned in the evening, he did as at noon, attended his books till called to supper; after supper he resumed them again till eleven at night, when he lay down to rest. When he had invited any friend to eat with him, he made no scruple to leave them as soon as the entertainment was over, and go to his books again. 'Omnia animi & corporis oblectamenta præ literarum studiis, & medicæ artis exercitatione, pro nihilo ducens: ut nulla vitæ pars neque publicis, neque privatis, neque medicis, neque domesticis in rebus vacasse officio videretur. Si quem fortè ad cenam vel prandium aliquando invitaret, ab eo neque turpe,

Some years before his death, at his wife's request, he bought a country-house (7): but he never went to it but once or twice a year to refresh himself. He found more pleasure in an active life, and in the exercise of his profession than in retirement. 'Erat hoc robore animi, atque hac indole virtutis, & continentia, ut respuerit omnes voluptates, omnemque vitæ suæ cursum in labore corporis atque in animi contentione conficeret; quem non quies, non remissio, non æqualium studia, non ludi, non convivia delectarent, nihil in vita expetendum putaret, nisi quod esset cum laude, & honore, & cum dignitate conjunctum (8). — He was of that strength of mind, of such a disposition to virtue and continence, that he rejected all manner of pleasures, and spent his whole time in the labour of his body, and the application of his mind. Neither rest, relaxation, the company of his equals, plays, nor feasts, had any charms for him. He thought nothing in the world was worthy his desires, except what was attended with dignity and honour.' He never sent away the sick that came to implore his assistance, how poor soever they were; and, they came in such great numbers to him in summer time, that he had not leisure to sit down to table, but dined standing. 'Tantus ægrorum numerus ad eum confugiebat, ut per totam ferè æstatem stans prandere cogeretur: neminem quantumlibet pauperem à se abire dimittebat morbi quo angeretur ignarum, remediisque ad eum profligandum destitutum (9).' When he was advised to give himself a little relaxation, his answer was that death would give him time enough to rest in. 'Quod si illum nonnunquam de curanda corporis sui valetudine, deque nocturnis studiis intermittendis, commonefacerem, & ad quiescendum cohortarer, (erat enim somni parcissimus) responsum in promptu habere solebat, Longa quiescendi tempora fata dabunt.

The wives of such physicians are much to be pitied, when they love their husbands, and are not of a covetous temper; for indifference and avarice can find relief in such an absence of the Husband. It is not hard to guess why his wife would not consent to such kinds of lectures: they hindered him from seeing his patients, and so considerably diminished the daily profit of his practice. His historian is not silent upon this damage: 'Quod onus . . . uxore, amicis youth also. He had not gone thro' this when he was called to court, to see if he could cure a lady, whose cure was despaired of [D]: he happily succeeded, and this was the first cause of the esteem which king Henry II, who was then only dauphin, and tenderly love that lady, had for him. That prince offered him the place of his first physician; but Fernelius, who preferred his studies to the tumult of a court, refused the offer, and even made use of some artifice to get leave to return to Paris [E]. He obtained it without any diminution of the pension that had been promised him (f). Having finished the explication of his book, he was continually solicited to read upon something else; but the multitudes of patients, who sent for him, hindered him from engaging in it (g). However, he did not cease from being serviceable to the public, otherwise than by his practice. In his spare time he composed a work de additis rerum causis, which was followed by seven books of pathology; after which he treated of medicines [F]. Before he had finished this last work, he was forced to obey the orders of Henry II: that prince would have him with him as his first physician, and it happened just contrary to what Fernelius had dreaded; for he found more quiet and leisure at court than he had had at Paris, and had

'micis omnibus, & ægrorum curis reclamantibus, vel magno rei domesticæ dispendio suscepit (10). — This laborious employ he undertook, notwithstanding the instances of his wife and friends, and the inconvenience which would attend his practice.

[D] He was called to court, to see if he could cure a lady whose cure was despaired of. Those who imagine that the historian had a view to the barrenness of Catherine de Medicis, would be grossly deceived, and this will be easily granted me if his manner of expression be considered (11): 'Nec absolverat ejus commendationis explicationem, cum in gravissimo mulieris nobilissimæ (12) casu ad aulicos quasi edicto regio rapitur. Pervagabatur enim incredibilis ad hujus imperii proceres de Fernelii eruditione fama & persuasio, quasi unus esset à Galliae Medicis calamitosi illius morbi perstrenuus oppugnator, & impendentis mortis fortissimus vindex, malorumque depulsor, quasi Hercules Alexicacus: quam ille opinionem de se strenue sustinuit, ut non tam sit creditus mulierem in vita retinuisse, quam jam profligata salute ex inferorum faucibus revocasse. — Before he had finished the explication of his commentary, he was sent for to court, as it were by a mandate from the king, on a most dangerous case of a lady of great quality: for the nobles of this kingdom, from the incredible reputation which had spread itself of him, had entertained a belief, that he was the only physician in France that could combat with success that deplorable distemper, the bravest champion against impending death, and a very Hercules at destroying and driving away distempers; which opinion of him he bravely kept up, it being believed, that he did not so much keep the lady alive, as rescue her from the most desperate circumstances, and the closing jaws of death.' First it is a question whether Catherine de Medicis is intended here at all: in the second place, no doubt nothing less than her barrenness was designed. If the author meant to speak of that princess who was then dauphiness, is it not strange that he should describe her by the general name of a lady of great quality? Is it not strange that he should say she was most tenderly beloved by the dauphin (13)? if it was not the dauphiness, the expression is good and proper: it might be a mistress: it might be a lady for whom the dauphin had a particular friendship; but if it was his wife, the historian explains himself impertinently. It is always supposed in relations of this kind that a husband loves his wife, that he is extremely concerned for his wife's cure, and is exceedingly grateful to the physicians who cure her. It is sufficient then to observe that the patient is his wife; and if they will use the word charissima, tenerrima, it should be brought in after the term uxor, or conjugis, is employed. From whence I conclude, that that author, having wrote with eloquence and judgment, would not have expressed himself as he has done, if he had designed to speak of a distemper of the dauphiness. Add to this another reason. It would have been an additional glory to John Fernelius, if the lady he cured had been the dauphiness: why then should his historian, who seeks to load him with honour and encomium, have concealed the principal title of that lady? so much for the first point: the second is still clearer. Catherine de Medicis was very healthy while she was barren; she tired her horse, she rode a hunting with the king (14), and neither her life nor health seemed to be in any danger from her continuing without having children. Therefore she was not cured of a mortal distemper, when he gave her medicines against barrenness; so that it cannot be meant of her, since the question here is of a morbus calamitosus, of mors impendens, of profligata salus, of an ex inferorum faucibus revocatio.

I do not insist on all these observations without reason; it is to draw from thence a strong proof against those who say Fernelius cured the barrenness of the dauphiness. This is a fact which appears very dubious to me, since his beloved disciple says nothing of it, and yet speaks of another cure less important than this would have been. It is not at all probable that he should be ignorant of so shining a circumstance in Fernelius's life, or that knowing it he should pass it by in silence in the history of that physician. Who should know this adventure, if Plantius was ignorant of it? Plantius, I say, bred up so long at the feet of this Gamaliel, and admitted to his greatest confidence? and who was fitter to publish a thing so glorious to the memory of his good master than this disciple? he forgot it, may some say, when he resolved to write the history of John Fernelius: but would he not have recollected it when he was giving an account of his master's first journey to court? could this lady, abandoned by her Physicians, so dear to the dauphin Henry, come into his mind without exciting the idea of a dauphiness, rendered fruitful by Fernelius's remedies? Credat Judæus Apella.

[E] He made use of some artifice to get leave to return to Paris. They were not satisfied with the reasons he alleged that he was not skillful enough to be trusted with the health of princes, but if they would let him return to Paris, he would use the utmost diligence to make himself more fit and worthy to serve the dauphin. When he found these arguments would not serve his turn, he pretended to be sick, and got a surgeon who could speak familiarly to the prince, to tell him that he had a pleurisy, which grief would infallibly render mortal, and that his grief proceeded from seeing himself separated from his books, lectures, and family and engaged in a life of hurry and tumult. 'Simulata pleuritide & conficta ementitque à Chirurgo qui principi familiaris erat periculi magnitudine, per eum nuntiari jubet tanti mali causam ab animi ægritudine & morore proficisci, quod à studiis esset abductus, &c (15). The prince believing this lye gave Fernelius leave to retire. Must not a man be strangely in love with study, and a philosophic life, to employ so many machines not to be a court physician, that is, to avoid an employment that others endeavour to obtain by all manner of ways? when Henry II succeeded to the throne, he renewed his instances; but Fernelius represented that the honour offered him was due upon many accounts, and as an hereditary right, to the late king's physician, and also that he wanted some time to make experiments on several things which he had discovered in physic. A time was granted him accordingly; but when the physician of Francis I was dead, Fernelius was obliged to go and supply his place to Henry II.

[F] He treated of medicines. He had finished his book of compound remedies, and was working upon simple remedies, of which he had discovered some virtues unknown to the ancients. He communicated them to no body; he desired the world might know to whom the honour of the discovery was due; he therefore designed not to make them known till the publication of his book. The necessity he was under of follow-it not been for the journeys that prince was obliged to take by the breaking out again of the war, his physician could have looked upon the court as a pleasant retreat. Returning from the Calais expedition, he sent his wife to Fontainebleau; the good woman was so grieved to be separated from her family, that she fell sick and died of a phrenzy shortly after. This afflicted him so deeply, that twelve days after his wife's funeral he fell sick, and died the eighteenth day of his illness (b) [G]. I shall make a remark upon the number of his years [H]. He got a great deal of money

ing the court, hindered him from setting his last hand to this work. The greatest concern he had upon his death-bed, was, that he could not finish it. * Hic doctor hominem præcipue angebat, hæc cura sollicita: bat quod therapeuticæ postremæ Medicinæ parti in qua multum diuque versatus erat, quamque suis inventis plurimum locupletare poterat, extremam manum non addidisset (16). — His greatest concern was, that he could not put the last hand to the last part of his discourses on Physic, namely the Therapeutic, about which he had been a long time employed, and which he could have greatly enriched with discoveries of his own. This is the reason that in his works there is an excellent pathology to be found, and but little therapeutic. See the Journal des Savans for the month of April 1666.

[G] He was so grieved at the death of his wife . . . that he died the eighteenth day of his distemper. Considering Plantius's narrative, it may be said that divers causes concurred to Fernelius's death. His spleen was disordered: and grief coming on made it worse, from whence issued a continual fever. He would not have died so soon, neither with his distemper of the spleen without his grief, nor of grief without the distemper of the spleen. It is true his grief did not arise wholly from the loss of his wife, many other things before that having extremely afflicted him. Quam causæ quædam externæ hæcque graves addidit acerbissimum mororem attulissent, superveniente uxoris obitu quo omnia exasperata sunt, humor in liene collectus tandem incallescens atque putrescens, inflammationem ejus visceris peperit, unde & febris accensa est continua (17). — Some external causes of a very bad nature having thrown him into a state of melancholy, his condition was rendered still worse by the death of his wife. A humour being collected in his spleen, which fermented at length and putrefied caused an inflammation in his bowels, which ended in a continual fever. But tho' no notice should be taken of these circumstances, yet it would plainly appear that the abbot Des Landes is strangely mistaken. * John Fernelius, says he (18), having been called to court by a princess who was disconsolate at her barrenness, and hearing of his wife's death, fell down at the princess's feet, from whence they carried him to his grave in the church of St James 'de la Boucherie.' This princess no doubt is Catherine de Medicis who was rid of her barrenness in the year 1543. Now Fernelius and his wife did not die till the year 1558, and besides it is not true that this physician died a sudden death. He did not fall sick till ten or twelve days after he had buried his wife, and did not die till the eighteenth day of his distemper.

(18) In a letter inserted in the Mémoires Galants, of November, 1765, pag. 197. See, above, remark (C) of the article CHARNACE.

[H] I shall make a remark upon the number of his years. If we believe Plantius, his historian, he died in the seventy second year of his life, in 1557, a little after the taking of Calais. That city was subdued by Henry II, in the month of January 1557, according to the way of reckoning at that time, that is if the year is not begun in the month of January; but if it began as we begin it, it was in 1558 that the town of Calais was taken. Plantius observes, that it had been a hundred years in the hands of the English. He should have said two hundred and eleven years. Fernelius's epitaph places his death on the twenty sixth of April. If the day is right in the epitaph, it must be concluded that Plantius is wrong in the year; for the twenty sixth of April, which follows the reduction of Calais, belongs to the year 1558, even according to the old way of reckoning. If Thuanus places the day right on the twenty seventh of March (19), then Plantius may be right in the year. But this is not the chief point. The epitaph gives Fernelius only a life of fifty two years. Plantius gives him seventy two. It must not be thought that the printers have put 72 instead of 52; for we find in that same life of Fernelius: 1. That he was about sixty years of age when he was made first physician to the King. 2. That he practised physic at Paris thirty years. 3. That he did several things before he applied himself to visit the sick; so that we may be very sure that Plantius assigned him seventy two years; and yet the epitaph, which is drawn up by the son-in-law of Fernelius, gives him but fifty two years. Let us set down a passage of Guy Patin (20): (20) Patin, letter Since you are printing Fernelius's works, I would desire you to correct a fault which those of Utrecht made in their impression (21), when they say, in his life, that he died in the seventy second year of his age; which is false, for I can assure you that it was only in the fifty second. I had it from the late Mr de Villersay, master of the requests, son to a daughter of Fernelius, who died but in 1642. I had it also from other relations of his, and it is a constant tradition in his family. But, without taking notice of tradition, which is not always to be depended upon, I have two positive proofs of it. One is taken from the register of our Faculty, which I had when I was dean; where it is expressly said, that Fernelius died the twenty sixth of April, 1558, anno ætatis 52. The other argument is taken from his epitaph at St James de la Boucherie, which I have shewed to a great many: where it is also said, that he died at the age of fifty two years. The author of this epitaph is there called Philippus (22) Barjæ, Fernelii gener, who was master of the requests, and president of the great council, and married his eldest daughter; Mr Giles de Riant, president au Mortier, married the second, and died in the year 1597: his widow lived forty five years after him. These arguments of Guy Patin can hardly be answered. Had he alledged only the epitaph, his argument had not been so decisive as he pretended: for who is sure that the engraver did not omit two XX, which would reduce seventy two to fifty two? He might more easily be mistaken, if he made use of figures instead of letters, for a 5 is soon put for a 7. Those that know that an author, when he corrects his proofs, doth not sometimes perceive that his printers have prodigiously altered his figures and numerical letters (23), will not find it strange that Fernelius's son-in-law did not perceive the engraver's mistake. But, as I have already said, Guy Patin's arguments do not wholly depend on the epitaph. However, I will object two things against him: 1. I cannot well conceive, that one of Fernelius's disciples, who was ten years his confidant, should be so strangely mistaken in his master's age; what, could he be mistaken twenty years, and would he compose his life without informing himself a little better of the age he was to assign him? 2. If this disciple errs with respect to the age, he must needs err in many other particulars. He is wrong when he relates, that Fernelius began his studies late (24); and it is not true, that Fernelius studied two years in St Barbe's college, and afterwards with so much application in private, that he contracted a quartan-ague, which obliged him to go into the country. Febre quartana TANDEM corripitur, qua crudeliter ac diu confectatus ceptum studiorum cursum interrumpere, utque salubriore aëre frueretur solum vertere cogitur (25). — He was at length seized with a quartan-ague, which having afflicted him a long time very cruelly, he was obliged to break off the course of his studies, and retire into the country, in order to enjoy the benefit of a more wholesome air. How is it possible, that after his recovery, being returned to Paris, and having de- liberated what profession to choose, he could have been two years regent in St Barbe's college? How can, I say, these things be, since we know that he printed some books of mathematics in 1526 (26): now taking things at worst, it cannot be supposed that those books appeared at any other time but while he was regent. Where shall we then find the time that he published them in, according to Plantius's relation, if it be true that Fernelius died at the age of fifty two years? He must then have been author of a book of astronomy

(20) Patin, letter cxvii. of the first tome.

(21) Patin is in the wrong to imagine that it was only in the fifty second. I had it from the late Mr de Villersay, master of the requests, son to a daughter of Fernelius, who died but in 1642. If this disciple errs with respect to the age, he must needs err in many other particulars. He is wrong when he relates, that Fernelius began his studies late (24); and it is not true, that Fernelius studied two years in St Barbe's college, and afterwards with so much application in private, that he contracted a quartan-ague, which obliged him to go into the country. Febre quartana TANDEM corripitur, qua crudeliter ac diu confectatus ceptum studiorum cursum interrumpere, utque salubriore aëre frueretur solum vertere cogitur (25). — He was at length seized with a quartan-ague, which having afflicted him a long time very cruelly, he was obliged to break off the course of his studies, and retire into the country, in order to enjoy the benefit of a more wholesome air. How is it possible, that after his recovery, being returned to Paris, and having de- liberated what profession to choose, he could have been two years regent in St Barbe's college? How can, I say, these things be, since we know that he printed some books of mathematics in 1526 (26): now taking things at worst, it cannot be supposed that those books appeared at any other time but while he was regent. Where shall we then find the time that he published them in, according to Plantius's relation, if it be true that Fernelius died at the age of fifty two years? He must then have been author of a book of astronomy at the age of twenty (27). But how doth this suit with his beginning late his grammar and rhetoric? We must take notice, that, in Ferneli's time, a scholar, that learned philosophy before he was twenty, was thought very forward. A country youth, who was sent to Paris at fifteen or sixteen years of age, to go through his school-learning, was not reckoned to begin his studies too late. I lay no stress on Thevet's authority (28), because he only copied Plantius both with respect to the seventy two years, he ascribes to Ferneli, and every thing else.

[I] He got a great deal of money. Plantius (29) says, that for the space of ten years that he was with Ferneli, this physician often got above twelve thousand livres, and rarely or never under ten thousand livres a year. Here is a passage of an author, whom I have already quoted: 'They found thirty thousand crowns of gold in his study, for he died very rich: he left, besides that, thirty six thousand livres a year to be divided between his two only daughters (30).' If we believe his history, he was kind to his family, but a lover of gain: Attentus quidem ad rem familiarem, sed in suis beneficiis liberalis (31). Scaliger says on this account, and on another more tender point, some things very offensive. Ferneli Get penny, who came in repute for having facilitated the queen-mother's delivery. 'Habuit salacissimam filiam, cui dedit decem millia aureorum pro dote (32). — He had a most leud daughter with whom he gave ten thousand crowns in marriage.' Those who will know something of Ferneli's Posterity, may read this passage of Guy Patin (33). In the nunnery of The Visitation at Lyons, there is a gentlewoman, daughter to Mr de Riant counsellor of state. Her mother is Mary des Prez, niece to Mr Narbonne. This pretty nun, who hath not as yet taken the veil, among other good qualities, is considerable for her birth, being descended from our great Ferneli, who was truly an incomparable physician. He left two daughters: the first was married to Mr Barjot, president of the great council, and master of the requests; from whom is descended Mr d'Annœuil, now steward to the king. Annœuil is a country-seat of twelve thousand livres a year in our province of Picardy, near Beauvais, two leagues from my native country. Ferneli's youngest daughter was married to Giles de Riant, president au Mortier, who died in the year 1597. Her name was Magdalen, and she died in the year 1642, in the month of March, aged ninety four. Et generatio restorum benedicatur. I am sorry that I did not go formerly to Villersay au Perche (where she died), on purpose to have the honour of seeing her, and kissing her hands. They make us kiss relics which do not so well deserve it; so that your pretty nun may boast, that she is sprung from the greatest man in our profession since Galen, Ferneli being her great-great-grandfather.

[K] It is a common opinion, that he cured Catherine de Medicis of her barrenness. They pretend, that Henry II proposed this affair to him in very odd terms: Mr Doctor, can you get my wife with child? And they will have, that Ferneli answered, very prudently, It is GOD, Sir, who must give you children by his blessing: It is your business to beget them, and mine to apply those remedies of physic, which GOD hath ordained for human infirmities (34). Mr Varillas tells us what expedient Ferneli made use of: 'The people, says he (35), were persuaded, that the queen-mother, after ten years barrenness, had conceived the king, only because the first physician (36) Ferneli had advised Henry II to lie with her during her courses; and that those, that were got so, were liable to this shameful disease (37). According to Mezerei (38), Francis II was from his infancy very sickly, being the first child of a mother who had her courses but late. And indeed several pretend that Catherine de Medicis became fruitful, merely because a remedy was found against the suppression of her flowers (39). This expedient is very different from that which Varillas relates. We have seen, that Scaliger talks of another service performed by Ferneli: He insinuates, that this physician was called whilst the queen was in labour, and gave some proper remedies for her easy delivery.

This would better agree with the cure of a great lady mentioned by Plantius. But as there seems to be no reason that could induce him to conceal from the public, that Ferneli procured a happy delivery to the dauphiness, who was in danger of dying; I persist in my opinion, that he did not mean Catherine de Medicis, and to draw from his silence a very cogent argument to doubt of what is contained in the text of this remark. According to Brantome, They said at court, that it was not so much the fault of the dauphiness, as of the dauphin, that he had no children (40). And upon that, he relates the jest of a lady. Here was a fine opportunity to relate what is said of Ferneli, and yet he says nothing of it. Doth his silence signify but little? Had Thuanus in Ferneli's encomium forgot so considerable an event, if he had known or believed it? I believe then that it is a fact, of which we ought to say non liquet, notwithstanding this Affirmation of Scœvola Sammarthanus. 'Ab Enrico secundo, in regiam accersitus, principem inter ejus archiatros locum tenuit. Eo felices operæ proventu ut quod à natura negatum esse videbatur, artis beneficio consecutus inivisam sterilitatem à domo regia repelleret (41). — Being called to court by Henry II, he was made his first physician, where he happily, by art, effected what nature seemed to have denied, and delivered the royal house from the misery of barrenness.' I believe that all these doubts might be easily cleared, had we the dissertation which Varillas hath quoted. 'Dr Ferneli, says he (42), having observed the constitution of the dauphiness, resolved to relieve her; and whether the medicines which he prescribed had any operation, or whether all his secret was to inform the dauphin at what time his wife was capable of conceiving, the court observed some months after, that the dauphiness was big with child.' You will find this place, word for word, in The Gallantries of the Kings of France (43). Mr Menjot, a learned physician of Paris, hath thought, that Ferneli conjectured that Catherine de Medicis was barren, by reason of the too great driness of the uterus, or because it was too much contracted. In the first case, the seed, finding too dry a soil, could not fructify: In the second, it did not reach as far as it ought to do. Now because in her courses the part was moistened and dilated more than ordinary, Ferneli thought that the dauphin ought to make use of that time, and that it was the happy minute for him to get his spouse with child. Mr Menjot adds, that Hippocrates might give very good hints for this advice. This author expresses himself with so much energy, that I should do him wrong did not I relate all that he says upon it: 'Reserunt Catharinam Medicæam Galliarum reginam ætate licet integra, cum velut quinta luna nata progeniem desperaret, importunam alvi sterilitatem votiva fecunditate commutasse, dulcique liberorum propagine ditatam fuisse, quod contra Mosis edictum et τῇ καθύδω τῶν καταμνηνίων quibus semen alias eluitur, à rege subagitata esset, ex consilio Fernelii sagaciter conjicientis exuperantem uteri ariditatem benigni sanguinis aspergine rigandam esse, vel etiam stomachum matricis naturaliter, perinde ac ex eventu in gravidis, arctissimum nonnisi mensium transitu reserari. Idque edoctus fuerat Ferneli ab Hippocrate jubente mulierem ἰμερῶσθαι τῷ ἀνδρὶ inchoante menstruo profluvio, sed maxime eo delinente, verum profluente adhuc potius quam arefacto (44). [L] She rewarded him largely. Let us hear Mr Patin (45): 'Some speak of the king of England, who hath married the princess of Portugal: he would willingly have divorced her, because she is barren; as Henry II would have done to his wife Catherine de Medicis, if Ferneli had not happily prevented it; from whom, out of an unparalleled liberality, he received every time that she was delivered of a child ten thousand crowns, as Lewis d'Orleans says in his Human Plant (46). The as of this Author is truer than he thought; for what he says of Charles II king of England's design, is a whim of newsmongers without any ground: And we learn from Brantome, that Catherine de Medicis ingratiated herself so much into the king her father-in-law's and king Henry her husband's affections, that remaining ten years without children faults of some authors [M].

'children, abundance of people persuaded the king and the dauphin to put her away, because France wanted an offspring from them; but that they loved her so much, that neither of them would consent to it' (47). See in the margin what I have observed on the passage of Gabriel Naudé: It shews that Lewis d'Orleans spoke of a thing whereof he was not well informed. This is what I said in the first edition: I shall now add two amendments; the one is, that there are some books which make mention of this design of Charles II. The other, that Catherine de Medicis was sometimes in terrible frights: from whence we may conclude, that her father-in-law and her husband were not always very far from thinking of a divorce (48). [M] We will gather the faults of some authors. There are but few of Moreri. He says, that Fernelius saw, 'that the books which he had published were the only books that were expounded to the students of physic in all universities, and preferred to all others.' This is one of the greatest lies that hath ever appeared in a book. What Sammarthanus affirms hardly deserves credit: what must we judge then of those monstrous hyperboles which Moreri hath bestowed upon him. These are Sammarthanus's words (49): 'Cujus (Fernelii) admirabili genio id contigit, quod à multis seculis nulli quamlibet erudito contigisse meminimus, ut ipso vivo atque vidente opera quæ de universa medicina scripsit in scholis publice legerentur: ejusque auctoritas veterum scriptorum instar apud optimum quemque rei medicæ magistrum gravissimæ esset ponderis et momenti.' — To Fernelius's admirable genius that honour was paid, which I do not remember to have happened to any other learned man for many ages past, that in his life-time and in his presence, the treatises which he wrote on all the parts of physic were publicly read in the schools, and his authority, like that of the ancients, was allowed by all eminent professors of that science to be of the greatest weight and moment.' Mr Bullart's faults are in greater number: he says, that Fernelius resolved but late to put himself under the discipline of James Strebæus, to learn the principles of the Sciences (50). This signifies two things: one, that Fernelius began his studies late; the other, that he begun them under James Strebæus. The first is very true, according to Plantius in his life of Fernelius; but the second is very false, because Fernelius had already taught philosophy in the college of St Barbe, and was received doctor of physic when he became acquainted with Strebæus. Their acquaintance was a reciprocal instruction; for they taught one another. Fernelius taught Strebæus the mathematics, and learned of him to write good Latin. 'Dum Strebæus à Fernelio mathematicarum disciplinarum, Fernelius vicissim à Strebæo polidioris literaturæ cognitionem & gravem plenumque orationis styli acceptionem, integrum biennium exigitur' (51). Mr Bullart is in the wrong, to believe that Henry II. was king of France whilst his wife was barren. Had he consulted Brantome, he had not said, that this prince had some thoughts of putting her away: neither, if he had consulted Lewis d'Orleans, had he said, that the queen gave ten times to Fernelius a present of ten thousand crowns (52). Let us quote Mr Bullart's words (53). This French Æsculapius made so happy an use of the knowledge of her distemper, and of a proper remedy, that he made the queen fruitful by removing the suppression of her monthly courses: after which she had five sons, and five daughters; and at the birth of every one of them, she presented this learned man with ten thousand crowns. He falsely supposes (54), that Henry II, after he had kept him near his person, as his first physician, and carried him every where with him, as the preserver of his health . . . gave him time to put in order those works of physic which he had writ, and means to get them printed. Read the life of this learned man, and you will find that he composed but a treatise of fevers after he was Henry the second's first physician, and even that he died before he had finished it.

FERON (JOHN LE) Advocate in the parliament of Paris, was of Compiègne: he was above sixty years of age in the year 1564, and died in the reign of Charles IX. He was one of the most diligent and most curious men in France, in searching and discovering noble houses and coats of arms (a), as he shewed by many volumes; some of which were printed [A]. Persons of a good taste despised them, because of an infinite number of fictions and puerilities they were filled with [B]. Mr le Feron, antient provost of the merchants at Paris, and president of the court of inquests in the XVIIth century, was of this family (b).

He published at Paris, in 1555, by Vascofan, a catalogue of the constables, chancellors, great masters, admirals, and marshals of France, and provosts of Paris, containing their institutions and establishments, the time and exercise of their offices, the changes and alterations in them, their names, surnames, lordships, and coats blazoned: also an abridgement of their actions; in folio (1). The same year he published his treatise of the primitive institution of kings, heralds, and pursuivants at arms, at Paris, with Maurice Menier, in 4to. As to his history of heraldry in two volumes, containing the escutcheons, blazons, names, surnames, titles, and perpetual memorials, of kings, princes, lords, gentlemen, and nobles of several kingdoms, christian and infidel, and particularly of the kingdom of France; and many other collections of the same nature; la Croix du Maine observes, that they were never printed (2).

an advocate (4), who was about a work of arms and escutcheons. 'I must tell you, that among those who have pretended to meddle with it, le Feron, whom you write about, set himself above all others. I shall mention him as a man I was formerly acquainted with in my middle age. He was an antient advocate in our court, but never made much of his business (5), only employing himself in blazoning arms and escutcheons, as you may have seen by some books he hath published upon that subject; and yet he was more unconfin'd than some that have succeeded him: for to tell you the truth, he derived the use of arms, and war, and nobility, from the beginning of the world, assigning even to our father Adam his escutcheon. If you ask me what he bore? I answer, three fig-leaves. And upon my asking of him why he did so; he replied, because after eating of the forbidden fruit, Adam covered his pudenda with a fig-leaf: and upon this foot he composed four or five large volumes, drawn up according to his own fancy; an inexcusable, as well as inextricable curiosity (6).'

FERRAND (JAMES), doctor of physic, born at Agen, composed a book, of the Disease of Love, printed at Paris in the year 1622. The historians of the physicians have as yet made no mention of it: It deserved however to be taken notice of better than many others which they have mentioned [A].

[A] It deserved however to be taken notice of better than many others which they have mentioned. Although James Ferrand's design be only to consider love, as it sometimes degenerates into a bodily disease, as fury and melancholy, nevertheless he says many things which may be referred to love in general. I take here the word love in that sense which is given to it by way of excellency, I mean that passion which

one of the sexes hath for the other; a passion which hath been honoured by the heathens with a divine worship, under the name of Venus, and is one of the most profound mysteries of nature. The epistle dedicatory of James Ferrand's book is full of learning, and shews, that the heathen poets philosophized upon nothing so profoundly as upon love. The verses of Lucretius, which I have quoted in another place (1), were forgotten there. I said, then, that if this passion came into the world by sin, we must consider it as a plank after a shipwreck, and as a second principle of life granted to mankind; it was a new spring very necessary to give motion to nature. But I should have said, that this second liberality of the author of all things was marked with the general stamp of this maxim, that the presents of fortune are always attended with some inconvenience: Fortuna nunquam simpliciter indulget (2). Those that do not know by experience what bitterness is mixed with the pleasures of love (3) need but read Ferrand's book, and they will learn what to think of this passion from the sentences of several grave authors: for, according to the method of those times, this physician is full of quotations: and he scarce says any thing, but what is strengthened with the authority of some Greek or Latin poet, or some ancient or modern philosopher. This method is now laid aside: however, those authors who have followed it are not the less instructive; and after all, I am surprized that Lindenius Renovatus (4) hath said nothing of the author who is the subject of this article. This is not the only sin of omission that he is guilty of. See the remark [B], of the article VANDERLINDEN.

She was born at Blois (a) the 25th of October 1510 (b), and was engaged to Charles of Austria (c) in the year 1513, and in the year 1515, and afterwards was also promised to Joachim Marquis of Brandenburg; but in 1527 she was married to Hercules d'Este, the second of that name, duke of Ferrara and Modena (d). Others reckon the 28th of June 1528 to be her wedding-day (e). A modern historian affirms, that she was very learned [B]. What [A] She was daughter of Lewis XII, and Anne of Bretagne. I shall relate here a particular which deserves to be more known: 'This queen was brought to bed, in the year 1510, of a second daughter, whom she named Renata, as if by this birth she had seen her hopes revive of having children, which she had almost wholly lost: but the ignorant midwives used her then so ill, that she was afterwards incapable of having any more; and she remained so infirm, that she died three years after, in the castle of Blois, the thirteenth day of February, 1513 . . . (1)'. The author of the notes on Rabelais's letters, is probably mistaken, when he said (2), that Renata was born the fifteenth of October 1509, &c.

(1) Mezerai's Hist. of France, Tom. II, pag. 89.

(2) Pag. 83.

[B] A modern historian affirms that she was very learned. Mr Varillas is the historian I mean. There are his words: 'Renata of France, daughter to Lewis XII, was married to Hercules d'Este, duke of Ferrara, and made him father of five of the handsomest children in Christendom, tho' she had the most disfigured body of any princess of her age. It is true, that what was wanting in her stature and Beauty, was so abundantly supplied by her mind, that, all things considered, she had more reason to be thankful, than to complain of nature. She had a more refined and delicate wit than had been observed in any woman, even in the Italian ladies, who pretended most to it; and it was but a diversion to her, to learn what was most difficult in the most sublime sciences. She had dived with ease into the most abstruse points of philosophy and divinity; and no woman spoke more gracefully of them, or rather with more ease. She excelled in all the parts of the mathematics, but especially in astronomy. Although she contemned judicial astrology, yet she would have the famous Luke Gauric shew her all the secrets of it (3)'. He says in another place (4), in stronger terms, 'That none exceeded her in the knowledge of the most abstruse points of philosophy, mathematics, and astrology.' This is romantic. Mr Varillas, instead of mollifying the expressions of Brantome, a Gascon author, who gave but too often way to hyperbole, especially when he spoke of princesses, refines upon him. We may be convinced of it by what follows: 'Madam Renata had as fine and piercing a wit as can be imagined; she had studied much: and I have seen her very learned, plainly, and gravely, talk of all sciences, even of astrology, and the knowledge of the stars; wherewith I saw her once entertain the queen-mother, who hearing her speak so well, said, that the greatest philosopher in the world could not talk more pertinently (5)'. Observe the abatement. According to Varillas, the equality of knowledge between this princess, and all learned men, relates to the knowledge of the most abstruse points of philosophy, mathematics, and astrology. But according to Brantome, it only relates to some dif-

courses of astrology, and this only in the judgment of Catherine de Medicis. It is of more importance than is imagined, to give the readers a parallel of the original with the copy, as I do here. Consult the margin (6).

[C] He tells several things, whereof some are abominably false, others very doubtful, concerning Calvin's journey to the court of that princess. Mr Varillas relates (7) in the year 1535, that Calvin, having pitched upon Strasburg for the place of his abode, drew there those of his sect, who had voluntarily banished themselves out of France. Calvin, continues he, having gathered a great number of disciples to form a congregation, by Bucer's advice presented a petition to the magistrates of Strasburg to obtain the spiritual direction of those Frenchmen, who, on account of religion, had transplanted themselves from France into Alsatia. . . . The magistrates, persuaded by Stunius (8), . . . granted his request; and thus Calvin had the opportunity to found a church after his own way. . . . As his design was to make the college of Strasburg famous, he was not satisfied to draw thither the finest wits, and the most learned men of the universities of France, whom he had corrupted, but he also endeavoured that this college should chiefly be obliged to him for its reputation, and he taught there with a more constant application, than either Luther or Melancthon had done in the college of Wittenberg: and truly the number of his auditors became, without comparison, greater than theirs had been, although no sovereign prince was concerned in it. He taught divinity in that college, and none of the professors assisted more readily than he at the public disputations. He revised his Institution also, and added a fourth and last book to it. He spent two years in this painful employ; and nothing had been capable to have drawn him thence, had he not hoped to make a greater progress somewhere else: but he was deceived by the vain hope, which was given him, of spreading his doctrine in Italy; and he fancied it so glorious and pleasing an attempt, to penetrate into a climate which had been inaccessible to Luther and Zuinglius, and to withdraw from the pope's obedience a people that was nearest to the holy see, that he could not withstand the temptation. Mr Varillas makes here a digression, in praise of the duchess of Ferrara (9), after which he says (10), that Calvin, knowing the disposition of this princess, went disguised from Strasburg to Ferrara. He supposes, that Calvin, having acquired by his Parts the friendship of Renata, disposed her to the doctrine of Luther, Zuinglius, and Melancthon; and that the princess, who (11) had only a mind to change her religion to be revenged of the court of Rome, rejected Calvin's maxims at first, but that it was not long before she became a Calvinist. . . . He preached in her chamber

(6) Brantome, ubi supra, says, 'That tho' Renata was ugly, yet she brought a very handsome offspring: And pag. 36. What he says of the motives, which engaged her to embrace the new religion, has very little probability [D]. As soon as her husband was dead, she left Italy on the account

'chamber, that it might be more private, because her servants, out of respect, were not to enquire too curiously what was done there. But it is not so easy for ladies of quality, as for others, to hide their religion from their husbands. The duke of Ferrara came to know his duchess's religion; and this prince was the more exasperated, because nothing was more contrary to his temporal interest. He held of the holy see; and he knew that the popes would not want forces to dispossess him, if they had any pretence for it. His fear increased, when he considered that duke Alphonso his father had been a long time an exile, vagabond, poor, and a soldier in the pay of a foreign nation, only because he had disobliged the pope; and that, to make his peace, he had been obliged to beg pardon of pope Alexander VI, and to marry Lucretia Borgia. These considerations immediately altered the duke, who had hitherto been very complainant to the dukes; he forced her to return to the exercise of the new religion (12), and all that she could obtain of him, in favour of Calvin, was, that he should return as he came.'

f. There are abundance of lyes in this narrative. I. When Calvin, in 1534, went out of France, he chose the city of Basil (13), and not that of Strasburg, for the place of his retreat; and he remained in Basil as obscure as possible (14), till he undertook his journey into Italy, after he had published his Christian institution (15). II. It is false then, that he erected at that time a church at Strasburg, and made the college of that city more famous than that of Wittenberg. III. Let us rectify this as well as we can, by referring it to its true time, and yet we shall find it full of lies. Calvin, being expelled out of Geneva in the year 1538, went into Switzerland, whence he was called by the magistrates of Strasburg to be professor in divinity. He accepted of the employ, and acquitted himself with the applause of the learned (16): But, IV. he drew not into this college the finest wits and the most learned men of the universities of France: And, V. the number of his auditors became not, without comparison, greater than that of Luther and Melancthon at Wittenberg,

I cannot imagine where Varillas could find a foun-

Calvin, with the consent of the magistrates, founded a French church at Strasburg, and that he submitted it to the formulary of his discipline (17): But, VI. it is not true, that he began by that his labours in that city. Seeing himself called by the magistrates, he went thither to teach divinity, and afterwards desired leave of them to erect a French church. VII. He left not his painful employment in hopes of making a greater progress in Italy; for he took his leave of those of Strasburg, only to return to Geneva (18), where he was recalled with great earnestness. It is absurd to suppose, as Mr Varillas doth, that Calvin went to see the dukes of Ferrara in the year 1525: after he had the dukes of Ferrara in the year 1535, after he had for two years performed at Strasburg the office of professor in divinity, and of minister; and after he had there revised his Institution, and had augmented it with a fourth and last book: for, VIII. he left France in the year 1534, and went to Ferrara towards the end of the year 1535: and, IX. when he undertook that journey, his Christian Institution had but once been published. He only revised and augmented it after his return from Italy (19). X. It was not divided into books, till the edition of one thousand five hundred and fifty nine. XI. I acknowledge that the dukes of Ferrara was mother of five children, but they were not all born when Calvin went to her. When she was delivered of a daughter in the year 1536, Rabelais observes that she had already a daughter and a son (20).

An historian, who is guilty of so many falsehoods in things so easy to be told with certainty, doth not deserve much credit in what he says of the private converations which he supposes between the duchels of Ferrara and Calvin. This is what I call doubtful ; for I have no good proofs to aver, whether Calvin infinuated, or did not infinnuate, to the duchess such and such things against Zuinglius, Luther, and Melancthon. I might easily be persuaded, that Calvin contributed but little to the conversion of this prince. I believe he found her pretty well cured of the Romish belief; and that Marot, who was a refugee before him in that court, had a greater share than he in Renata's changing her religion (21).

[D] That both Varillas lays of the motives, which engaged her to embrace the new religion, has very little probability.’⁴ The injuries which the pretended that the king her father had received from pope Julius II, had inspired in her an aversion for the court of Rome (22).’ This is, according to Mr Varillas, the motive that disposed her to lend a favourable attention to the new sectaries. ‘She did not change her religion, but to revenge herself: she fancied for that purpose, that it was enough to attack the spiritual and temporal authority of the popes, without meddling with the sacraments, and especially with religious orders, which would infallibly cause a great deal of disorder in the best established states (23).¹ It must be confessed that, generally speaking, a desire of revenge may produce in men minds a strong inclination for a fact. If a party appears against those who have done us a considerable prejudice, we are very much disposed to maintain that party: we wish it may have justice on its side; and, eagerly wishing, we at last believe it to be in the right. This is seen, not only in states and academical cabals, but also in religious disputes; so that we must not doubt, but a personal hatred against a pope may induce a prince to favour those divines who preach against that pope. But was this the case of the ducchi? She was scarce out of her swaddling-cloths when Julius II died. The court of Rome was reconciled with Lewis XII, when this prince went out of the world: so that our Renata was more like to hear of the peace between her father and Leo X, than of the outrages of Julius II. It is not probable that she conceived against this pope's memory a hatred that included all his successors. When we are informed of a quarrel, after it is ended, ed, those passions which it excites are not so lively for it is the fight of those evils, wherein it involves us, that kindles in our minds a violent hatred against the author of them. I do not deny, but those who at the time of the troubles, and even of the pacification, were as yet in the cradle, may harbour a very deep repentment against the author of those troubles when they come of age, and feel the fatal consequence of his turbulent temper. But was this the duchess of Ferrara's case? By the Salic law she was excluded from succeeding her father; and so the mischiefs which Julius II had done to Lewis XII had not affected her, even though they had continued in the reign of Francis I.

It is certain that true matters of fact are sometimes destitute of probability; and thus, without determining whether the princess had, or had not, any repentment, I only say, that it is not likely that the remembrance of Julius the second's injustice should breed in her a strong desire to be revenged of the court of Rome, by adopting the Lutheran religion. Nevertheless I ought not to conceal what I have read in Brantome.

‘ Perhaps, says he (24.) resenting the ill offices which ‘ the popes had on so many occasions done to the ‘ king her father, she withdrew from their obedience ; ‘ not being able to do them more mischief, because ‘ she was a woman. I have it from good hands, that ‘ she often said as much.’ Mr le Laboureur (25.)

quotes an elegy of Clement Marot on her being with child the third time, wherein the child is congratulated for his being conceived in so happy a time. Marot promises him the pope's and the holy see's ruin, whom he uses injuriously, and says, that he was an enemy to his family. That shows that this poet brought domestic quarrels upon the stage, to alienate the dukes of Ferrara from the court of Rome. Observe, that he also employed good omens and favourable predictions, whereof poets are so lavish, and which so often convict them that they are false prophets (26) of her religion [E], and went into France, where she had leave to profess the doctrine of Calvin. She resided at Montargis, and there protected many that were persecuted, till she was forced to desert. Mezerai, I am afraid, doth not set down the exact time that this happened [F]. She complied with this hardship with much reluctance. She shewed in that juncture both her courage and charity [G]. This virtuous Lady had always expressed a strong Inclination to relieve the distressed [H]. She interceded strongly

He proved so in this particular; but blushed no more for it than his brethren are used to do in the like cases.

[E] She left Italy on account of her religion. I have this from Thuanus. 'Sub idem tempus, says he (27), Renata Ferrariensis Guisii socrus, quæ ex Italia in Galliam ob religionis causam migraverat, Aurelianum Regis salutandi gratia venit. — Renata duchess of Ferrara, and mother-in-law to the duke of Guise, who, on account of religion, had retired from Italy into France, came to Orleans to pay her compliments to the king. He says this under the year 1560. The duke of Ferrara, this prince's husband, died in 1559.

[F] Mezerai, I am afraid, doth not set down the exact time that this happened. Giving an account of the cruel hardships which the reformed suffered in divers places in 1562, he says (28), 'That the duchess of Ferrara's authority saved a great many, who came from all parts to Montargis for her protection. The duke of Guise, her son-in-law (29), not able to bring her into the right way, sent thither John de Souches-Milicorne with four troops of horse, who, having summoned her to deliver him the chiefs of the factious who had to fled her castle, threatening withal to bring cannon before the place to get them out by force, received an answer worthy of such a prince. Have a care of what you do (says she to him); know that no body hath a right to command me but the king himself; and that if you push things to this extremity, I will put my self at the breach, where I will try whether you will have the insolence to murder a king's daughter, whose death heaven and earth would be obliged to revenge upon you, and all your posterity, even upon babes in the cradle. These resolute words a little cooled his heat; and the duke of Guise's death happening at that time, he wholly left off his design.' Mr Varillas telling the same story, and according to his usual custom amplifying it, applies it to the year 1562 (30). But I should be mightily mistaken, if the protestant authors, who apply it to 1569, deserved not more credit. We are going to see Mr d'Aubigné's words.

[G] She shewed in that juncture both her courage and charity. Her answer to Malicorne was not so nobly expressed by d'Aubigné as by Mezerai; but I doubt the phrases must rather be ascribed to the historian, than to the prince. Be it how it will, let us quote d'Aubigné. 'This (31) was the cause, that from the towns and villages of the flat country all fled to Montargis, where many had been preserved the first war, under the protection of the duchess, who being of the royal blood, and related to the Guises, had a particular privilege allowed her. She and her ministers blamed those, that took up arms, in such a manner, as set her and the prince of Condé at variance, and this quarrel was a cloak to the civilities which were shewed her. But this last crowding of the protestants into her house, stirred up the preachers of Paris, and they the king, to force her to turn out 460 persons, two thirds women and young children in the cradle. This prince, all in tears, told Malicorne, who had brought her this harsh news, that if she had on her chin what he had on his (32), she would kill him with her own hands, as a messenger of death. She furnished this distressed multitude with one hundred and fifty carts, eight travelling coaches, and a great many horses (33). There is something very particular in these poor people's escape, whom Malicorne endeavoured to destroy upon the road. D'Aubigné relates it. Another Huguenot historian (34) gives us also an account of it, but without mentioning Malicorne; and as for the duchess, this he says of her under the year 1569 (35). 'At that time the duke of Alençon gave the duchess of Ferrara to understand, that Montargis (her place of abode) was a harbour for protestants, and where plots were daily contrived against his majesty.

Therefore he desired her to drive them and their ministers out, to leave off the exercise of the protestant religion which she professed, or to remove somewhere else. She answered, that she was too near related to the crown to have so little regard for it: besides, that there was in the town but a poor harmless people, who meddled with nothing, that might in the least prejudice the king. In a word, that she could not go out of a place that belonged to her, and wherein she was resolved to live and die, and even in the exercise of that religion which the king had permitted her to profess, and in which she had been hitherto brought up. However, about the end of September she was forced, for fear of having immediately a garrison in her town, to dismiss most of those who had retired thither: and because there were several families, many women, and a great number of young and old people, who were not able to go those long journeys, which they were obliged either to go, or to be at the mercy of those who only waited for an opportunity to destroy them, she lent them her coaches, carts, and waggons to assist them, answering for the waggoners, who took care of the rest of their baggage.'

When I consider, that Thuanus (36) hath supplied Mezerai, and Varillas, with what they say of Malicorne's foolish attempt in the year 1562, and of the brave answer of that prince, and that he puts the same event in the same year, I cannot tell which way to turn myself; and perhaps it must be said, that the duchess was disturbed twice at Montargis, in the year 1562, and in the year 1569. Malicorne was not perhaps sent thither the second time, although d'Aubigné says it.

[H] This virtuous lady had always expressed a strong inclination to relieve the distressed. I will make use of Brantome's words. 'This prince, says he (37), 'was not only ingenious, wise, witty, and virtuous, but also full of goodness, which he expressed so well to her husband's subjects, that I never saw any one in Ferrara but was satisfied with, and extolled her to the skies: for they had chiefly a deep sense of her charity which she shewed, especially to the French; for she had this good Quality, that she never forgot her country; and altho' she was very far from it, yet she always loved it. Never a Frenchman going through Ferrara, if he was in want, and made it known to her, went away without a large relief, and money to carry him to his country and house; and if he was sick and could not travel, she ordered him to be taken care of and cured, and then gave him money to return into France. Brantome had heard, that when the duke of Guise went into Italy, she saved after his return above ten thousand poor French souls, as well soldiers as others, who had died of hunger and want, had not she assisted them; for when they went through Ferrara, she supplied them all with physic and money as much as she was capable to do; and when her stewards represented to her her exorbitant expenses, she only answered, what will you have me do, they are my poor country-men, whom, if God had given me a beard, and I was a man, would now be all my subjects, and even should be so, was not that wicked Salic law so hard upon me (38). Brantome was not unacquainted with her charity at Montargis. Let us hear him further (39). 'I have heard some of her servants say, that being returned in France, and retired into her city, and house of Montargis, as long as she lived, she received there in the civil wars a great number of people, and especially the protestants, who were driven and banished from their estates and houses, and assisted, helped, and entertained them as well as she could. I my self saw, in the time of the second troubles, when the forces of Gasconne, headed by Messieurs de Terrides and de Monfales, consisting of about eight thou-ly for the prince of Condé, when he was put in prison [I]; but she afterwards fell out with him, because neither she nor her ministers approved of the protestants taking arms (f). We cannot too much admire with what steadiness she opposed the machines made use of by Henry II, and her husband, to draw her from what they call heresy [K]. She died at Montargis the 12th of June 1575 (g), in the profession of the reformed religion. It is therefore through gross ignorance that a jesuit . . . (b) hath put her into the list of those who abjured the errors of the protestants. Her bearing with her husband's galantries shewed her mistress of a great deal of temper. It is pretended, that after she had brought him three sons and three daughters, she voluntarily retired to a private house, that she might not see, nor thwart those Diversions which he took with other ladies. Nay, they add, that this good prince expressed some kindness for her husband's mistresses (i).

and men were marching towards the king, and we the chiefs and principal captains and gentlemen passed by Montargis, as we were in duty bound, to pay our respects to her; I believe that we saw in the castle above three hundred protestants, who had fled thither from all the parts of the country. An old steward of her's, a very honest gentleman, whom I had known at Ferrara and in France, protested to me, that she fed every day above three hundred of those poor persons who had retired thither.

[I] She interceded strongly for the prince of Condé. I will still draw my proof from the same author. 'I have heard say, and have it from good hands, that when the prince of Condé was put in prison at Orleans, in young king Francis's time, she came from Ferrara two days after, and I saw her arrive: the king and all the court went to meet her, and she was received with all the honour that she deserved. She was mightily concerned at his imprisonment, and represented to the duke of Guise, her son-in-law, that whosoever had advised the king to do this, was mightily in the wrong, and that it was not a small matter to use a prince of the blood after this manner (40).' Thuanus makes her yet speak in a more lofty stile. 'Aurelianum regis salutandi gratia venit, deploratque præsentis rerum statu generum acerbe increpuit, & siquidem ante captum Condæum advenisset id se impedituram testata monuit, ut ab injuria erga regis stirpis principes in posterum temperaret, nam plagam eam diu sanguinem miserram, nec cuiquam unquam bene vertisset qui regis confanguineos principes prior læcessivisset (41). — She came to Orleans to pay her compliments to the king, and having deplored the miserable state of affairs, she very warmly reprimanded her son-in-law, and declared that had she arrived before the prince of Condé had been made prisoner, she would have prevented it. She advised him for the future to use more moderation towards princes of royal blood, since this wound would bleed a long time, and no man had been crowned with happiness that, unprovoked, had offered violence to princes allied to the king.'

[K] We cannot too much admire with what steadiness she opposed the machines made use of by Henry II, and her husband, to draw her from . . . heresy. Mr le Laboureur hath published (42) a very curious piece. It is Henry the second's instructions to Dr Oriz, when he went to Ferrara. This doctor was one of the pope's penitentiaries, and performed the office of inquisitor in France. He was sent to Ferrara on purpose to convert the dukes. He was ordered to tell her, I. That the king had, to his inexpressible grief, been informed, that she had suffered herself to be entangled in the labyrinth of those wicked and damnable opinions, which are contrary and repugnant to our holy faith. II. That when he shall hear that she is reconciled with, and reduced to the true obedience of the church, that it will give him as much joy and satisfaction as if he was to see her raised from death to life. III. That if instead of treading in the steps of her progenitors, who, by an exemplary zeal, have always protected our holy catholic faith, the said lady would remain stubborn and obstinate, nothing in the world could more displease the king, and would oblige him to forget wholly the respect, friendship, and duties of a good nephew; nothing being so odious to him as those reproachable sects, whereof he is a mortal enemy. If these remonstrances produced nothing, then Dr Oriz was to preach some polemical sermons which the dukes should be obliged to hear, with all her household, though she should obstinately refuse it. After he had done this for some days, and saw that he made no impression on the said lady, he was to declare, before the duke her husband, that his majesty wills and understands, and actually desires and exhorts, with earnestness, the said lord duke, to cause the said lady to be put in a place separated from all company and conversation, and where she may no more spoil any body but herself; taking wholly away from her, her own children, and all her servants, of what nation soever they may be, who are accused, or strongly suspected of the said errors and false doctrines, to have them brought to justice. . . . And after sentence passed against them, that the delinquents may receive exemplary punishments. All this was to no purpose. Read Mr le Laboureur's words (43). The duke of Ferrara had not skill enough to prevent Anne d'Est, his daughter, from being imbued with the new opinions. Her mother, who caused her to be instructed in the sciences, gave her, for a fellow student, Olympia Fulvia Morata, a young woman of great parts, and who was afterwards a good Lutheran. Cum Anna Herculis Estensis Ferrariorum sum Principis filia iisdem literis à Joanne Sinapio, viro summo, institueretur, ut haberet quicum honesta æmulatione certaret, visum matri est. . . . ut Olympia in aulam, in qua aliquot annos magna cum laude fuit, advocaretur (44). — Whilst Anne daughter of Hercules d'Est, duke of Ferrara, was under the tuition of John Sinapius a very eminent man, her mother, to excite an honourable emulation, caused Olympia to be sent for to court, where she lived for several years in the highest esteem. This young lady's conversation gave the prince's Anne a great insight into religion: Therefore it is reported, that she was sensibly grieved at the punishments which were inflicted on the reformed after the business of Amboise, and that she exhorted Catherine de Medicis not to spill innocent blood. It is Thuanus who reports it. 'Anna Atelina Guisii uxor mihi ingenio femina, & quæ à teneris annis Ferrariæ sub Renata parente ei doctrinæ quæ tunc exagitabatur inutrita fuerat, Olympia Moratæ lectissimæ & eruditissimæ semine consuetudine ad id usque lacrimas non tenuisse dicitur, ultroque Catharinam monuisse ut si regem ac regnum saluum vellet, ab innocentum suppliciis abstineri juberet (45). — Anne d'Est, wife to the duke of Guise, a woman of a mild temper, who from her infancy had been trained up by her mother at Ferrara in that religion, which then lay under persecution, and had enjoyed the instructive conversation of Olympia Morata, a lady of distinguished merit and abilities, is said to have burst into tears, and begged of Catharine, as she tendered the welfare of his majesty, and the kingdom, to divert him from the shedding of innocent blood. At the time of the league, she was very zealous against the protestants. Family interest, and the remembrance of Poltrot (46), perhaps altered her opinion. For the rest, the duke of Ferrara was at variance with Renata before the reign of Henry II: for Rabelais wrote this from Rome in the year 1536. 'Madam Renata is in danger of suffering for it: the said duke hath taken Madam de Soubise her governante from her, and allows but Italian women to wait upon her, which is no good sign (47).'

(43) She obstinately endured the effects of these threats, for which Braniome observes, that there was for some time a misunderstanding between her and her husband, who could do no more than take from her the education of her children. Le Laboureur, ubi supra, pag. 745.

FERRARIENSIS, a scholastic philosopher, who is commonly quoted by this name, tho' his true Name was Francis Sylvester [A]. He was a native of Ferrara, and made himself so much considered in his order (a), that he was chosen their general in a chapter held at Rome in the year 1525. His corpulence did not hinder him from visiting the provinces of his order, to restore it's discipline as much as could be (b). He died at Rennes in Bretagne the twenty fourth of September 1528. Father Ives Mayeuc, a Dominican, who was bishop of Rennes ever since the twenty ninth of January 1506, and had been confessor to queen Anne of Bretagne, to Charles VIII, and Lewis XII, attended him at his death, and administered the sacraments to him (c).

I add, that, according to Leander Alberti (d), he died the nineteenth of September 1528, aged fifty four years. This historian agrees with Altamura as to the place of his death; but his Latin translator hath not well rendered these words, Nella città di Rennes; for he says, in urbe Renesid, whereas he should have said, Redonibus, or in civitate Redonensi. D'Argentré asserts (e), that Francisco Sylvestro, general of the Jacobins, died at Rennes the twentieth of October 1528. He was very much mistaken, when he thought that he was called Prieras; confounding him with Sylvester Prieras, master of the sacred palace under Leo X.

FERRETUS (ÆMILIUS) [A], one of the ablest civilians of the XVIth century, was born at Castello Franco in Tuscany [B] the fourteenth of November 1489. As soon as he was twelve years of age, he was sent to Pisa, where he studied the canon and civil laws for three years: After that, he spent two more in the university of Siena, and then went to Rome, and was secretary to Cardinal Salviata. He was received Advocate at the age of nineteen, having defended some Theses before a numerous assembly of cardinals and bishops. He then left off his christian name of Dominic, to take that of Æmilius. Having accepted the professorship in the civil law, he explained so learnedly the title De rebus creditis, that he was for that promoted to be secretary to Leo X. He was some years in that office, which he voluntarily left, and retired into his own country. Two years after he came from thence, where his father had been killed, and went to Tridino in the Montferrat. He married there [C]; and after four years stay, he followed to Rome and Naples the marquis of Montferrat, who commanded part of the French army. This expedition of the French proving very unhappy, he endeavoured to return again into his own country; but he fell into the hands of the Spaniards, who made him pay his ransom for his liberty. He went into France, and taught the civil law at Valence with so much reputation, that Francis I made him a counsellor in the parliament of Paris [D], and sent him with a public character to the Venetians and Florentines. He acquitted himself in these employs with so much skill, that the marquis of Montferrat, having obtained Francis the first's leave, sent him to Charles the fifth's court. Ferretus followed the emperor in his African expedition; and after his return into France, the king sent him to the Florentines during the war which they had with the emperor. After they were conquered, he went back into France, and

[A] Æmilius Ferretus. Mr Graverol the advocate is mistaken, to think that this professor of the civil-law was called Æmilius Perrotus. He will not enquire whether some have erroneously called him Æmilius Ferretus (1); however, he affirms, that Æmilius Perrotus, to whom Bunel wrote some letters, is the same civilian as Æmilius Ferretus. It is a mistake. This was an Italian, the other a Frenchman, as Mr Graverol might have been informed by Bunel (2). I do not distinguish him from that counsellor of the parliament, honourably mentioned by Thuanus, and whose son was killed at the massacre on St Bartholomew's day. 'Dionysius item Perrotus Æmilii Senatoris Parisiensis non minus integritate quam juris scientia clari F. tanto patre dignissimus eandem fortunam subiit (3). — Dionysius Perrotus, son to Æmilius, a counsellor of the parliament of Paris, a man no less famed for his integrity, than for his knowledge in law; who, as he inherited his great father's virtues, so he likewise underwent the same fate.' The epitome of Geiner's Bibliotheca hath deceived Mr Graverol; wherein are these words, Æmilius Ferretus seu Perrotus jurisconsultus scripsit, &c.

(4) The author ascribes to him the commentary in legem Gallus, which belongs to none but Perrotus.

[B] Was born at Castello Franco in Tuscany. His ancestors, who were originally of Ravenna, settled in that town of Tuscany (5). Observe here one or two mistakes of Mr Allard. Æmilius Ferretus, says he (6), was at Languedoc, but he taught with applause in the university of Valence in Henry the second's reign. He should have said Francis I. It might have been said after Panzirolus (7), that he was appointed counsellor in the parliament of Grenoble; by that, he would have had a new relation to Mr Allard's work.

[C] He married there. His wife was of a very good family, ex splendida familia (8). He had by her six sons and one daughter (9), and yet he died without children, and his nephew became his heir (10); which is another proof, that Æmilius Perrotus, father to a son who was killed in the year 1572, is not the same Æmilius Ferretus who died without children in the year 1552.

[D] Francis I made him a counsellor in the parliament of Paris. It was in 1536, if we believe Panzirolus; but if he be in the right in that, he is soon after grossly mistaken, when he supposes that Ferretus, since his promotion to that office, was sent by Francis I to Venice and Florence, and by the marquis of Montferrat into Spain, about the time that Charles the first was preparing himself for his expedition into Africa. This expedition was in the year 1535.

He was called to teach the civil law at Avignon. His stipend immediately rose to 550 crowns, then to 800, and at last to 1000 per annum, a sum which had never been given to any professor in that university. He gained the love both of the inhabitants and students, as it appeared after his death [E], as may be seen in the remarks. He died at Avignon the 15th of July 1552. He wrote several books (a) [F]. One of his letters is seen before the old French translation of Boccace's Decameron [G].

(a) Taken from Panzirolus, lib. ii, cap. clxvii, de claris legum Interpretibus.

[E] He gained the love both of the inhabitants and students, as it appeared after his death. Simon Craveta, his successor in the chair of the civil law, daring to blame him in his first lecture, was hissed by all his auditory, and expelled out of the city. 'Unicū tam à civibus, quam auditoribus dilectus (Ferretus) in gens sui desiderium reliquit, quod Simonis Cravetæ exemplum ostendit, qui Æmilii Cathedræ subrogatus, cum in prima oratione eum perstrinxisset, ab omnibus explosus, & urbe eiecus, coactus est discedere (11). — He was beloved in so singular a manner, both by the citizens and students, that his loss was extremely regretted, and his memory had in the highest esteem, which is manifest in the case of Simon Craveta, who, succeeding him in the chair, censured him in his first harangue, which so exasperated the whole audience, that they turned him out of the city, and obliged him to retire.'

(11) Id. lib. ii.

[F] He wrote several books. Panzirolus says this (12). 'Plura in jus civile scripsit, & librum de Signo, & Ratione inscriptum, in quo multas leges interpretatus est, & alterum Bartoli Evericulum nuncupatum, in quo ejus errores congerit; notas in Institutiones, opinionum volumen, responsa, nec paucas epistolas edidit. Opus etiam de armorum ratione lingua Hetrusca composuit. — He wrote several treatises on the civil-law, and a treatise intitled, de Signo & Ratione, wherein he explained a great number of laws, and another intitled Bartoli Evericulum, in which he makes a collection of Bartoli's errors; he published also annotations on the Institutes, a volume of cases, replies, and several letters. He composed likewise in Italian a treatise upon the law of 'arms.' We must add to this a commentary on Tacitus.

[G] One of his letters is seen before the old French translation of Boccace's Decameron. This letter is in Italian, and dated from Lyons the first of May 1545. He wrote it to the queen of Navarre. It is a very good encomium on the Decameron, and on the French translation, which Antony le Maçon had made by order of that prince. Emilio Ferretti (thus he subscribes his name) declares, that he had not believed that the translator, though a man of parts, a diligent and good writer, and skillful in the Italian tongue, could succeed well in translating the Decameron; but that he had been convinced of the contrary, by reading his translation. Le Maçon's application to husbandry and building, and his distractions occasioned by the cares of his family, being incumbered with a wife and a great number of children, made Ferretti despair of seeing a good translation from him. I am sure that you will not be displeased to see here his own words. Per la moltitudine & varietà de le cure, ne le quali egli ha reso singular conto di se, o per esser deditissimo à la agricultura, & à l'edificare, secondo che dimostrano le ville & le case sue, o per haver moglie & buon numero di figliuoli & maschi & femine, à quali è stato mestieri di altro aiuto che di tesser favole, à ogni altra cosa aspettavo che mi riuscissi che à tradur novelle, almeno in sì gran numero & di sì gran varietà: ma la bellezza de l'ingegno suo, & il compartimento, per il quale egli ha saputo così ben dispensar il tempo, ha vinto & tante sue difficoltà, & l'imagination mia. Here is, by the way, a small account of the character of the old translator of the Decameron.

FERRI (PAUL) in Latin Ferrius, was a very learned divine in the XVIIth Century. He was born the twenty fourth of February 1591, at Metz, where his family made a good figure [A]. He improved himself so much at Montauban, where he had been to study divinity, that he was received minister at Metz in the year 1610, at the age of nineteen. He had already published a book [B]. The quality of student of divinity, and that of author, were found united in him at the same time. Those which he afterwards published at several times, acquired him great reputation [C]. He had excellent talents for

(1) The Oxford Catalogue should have called him Montan, and not Montan.

[A] He was born . . . at Metz (1), where his family made a good figure. James Ferri's father was forty one years successively going through all the degrees of the ancient magistracy of this city, and was not out of employment till the suppression, which was made in the year 1643, of the jurisdiction of the judges which were called the thirteen. Elizabeth Jolli, his wife, our Paul Ferri's mother, was sister to the famous Peter Jolli the king's attorney at Metz, Toul, and Verdun, to whom Mr le Bey-de-Batilli, and Mr Boiffard, addressed several epigrams in their Latin poems.

[B] At nineteen years of age, he had published a book. This is the title of it: Les premières Oraisons politiques de Paul Ferri Messin, où sous la douce diversité de ses conceptions se rencontrent les bons libertez d'une jeunesse. He got it printed at Montauban in 1610. He was as yet but a student of divinity; but as he prepared himself to be shortly promoted to the ministry, he ended his advertisement to the reader with these words, Sat ludo nūquid datum. — Tous much for mirth and trifles. If this collection of poems was in Latin, it would be called, Juvenilia Pauli Ferrii. Here is a new author to be added to the famous youths, as Mr Baillet prints that book again. The first piece that is found among his poems, is a pastoral, intitled, Isabelle ou le dessein de l'amour. The next pieces are several sonnets and stanza's, under the title of Les gloires d'Isabelle; and lastly, many stanza's and sonnets for some ministers and other persons of Montauban, Metz, and Rochelle.

[C] Those that he afterwards published at several times, acquired him great reputation. That which he published in 1616, under the title of Scholæstici orthodoxi specimen (2), shews that the doctrine of the Protestants, upon the subject of grace, hath been taught by the schoolmen. This treatise got him the esteem of the illustrious Mr du Pleissis Mornal, who writ him a letter (3), wherein he gave his thoughts on another work which he had heard Ferri was about. That other performance was printed at Sedan by John Jannon in the year 1618, and is intitled, Le dernier desespoir de la tradition contre l'Ecriture, ou Refutation du livre de François Veron. Here is the title of a book published at Leyden in 1630. Pauli Ferrii Pindicæ pro Scholæstico orthodoxo adversus Leonardum Perinum Jesuitam, doctorem theologum, & universitatis Mussipon-tanæ Cancellarium, jussu, plenæ, amicæ, in quibus agitur de prædestinatione & annexis, de gratia & libero arbitrio, de causa peccati, & justificatione. This Jesuit had put out a book in 1619, intitled, Tursionica Pauli Ferrii Calvinistæ (4). Mr Ferri made a general catechism in 1654, to shew that it was necessary to reform the Romish church. He published it the same year, under the title of Catechisme général de la réformation, Mr Bossuet, who was then canon and arch-deacon of Metz, and who hath been so famous, under the name of bishop of Condom and Meaux, writ against this for the pulpit. He was the most eloquent man of his province, and whose discourses were the most moving. His tall stature, his venerable face, and his graceful gesture, added much to his eloquence. His enemies spread a false report, that he was one of those ministers, whom cardinal Richelieu had prevailed upon to attempt the union of both religions. Guy Patin's Letters contain this falsity [D]. What is certain is, that he lamented the division of the Protestants, and that he hoped to be able to contribute something towards a union among them. It was, no doubt, for that reason, that he kept a great correspondence by letters with Mr Dury (a) [E], who negotiated in Germany the agreement of the Protestants, and who was a good man, full of piety and zeal; but at last he became a sort of visionary [F]. Paul Ferri died the 27th of December 1669. He continued treatise of Mr Ferri. I must not forget, that this minister was chosen to preach Lewis's thirteenth's, and the queen mother Anne of Austria's funeral sermons. These two sermons are printed. He made also, on certain occasions, some prayers for their majesties recovery. These prayers were printed, and are very good.

(6) He had just before spoken of the Scholasticus Orthodoxus.

Let us add to all this a passage of Mr Ancillon (5). Mr Ferri hath also writ another book (6), intitled, Le dernier desespoir de la tradition, which is an excellent book in it's kind. He writ also, in 1624, a small book, intitled, Remarques d'Histoires sur le discours de la vie & de la mort de St Livier, & le récit de ses miracles nouvellement publiés par le Sieur de Ramberviller lieutenant-général au bailliage de Pontche de Metz, avec diverses approbations des docteurs. Mr Ferri would not be known to be the author of this small piece, because he had writ it against a person of note, and his countryman, with whom he would have no difference; but he hath made me a present of this small book since I have been his colleague, and I actually have it by me, under whose title he writ with his own hand, by Paul Ferri.

(7) Patin, Letter DIX, dated the 10th of March 1670, Tom. III, pag. 499, Edit. Genev. 1691.

[D] Guy Patin's letters contain this falsity. These are his words (7). 'Mr Ferri, minister of Metz, died there a month ago. He was one of the most learned of his rank. If cardinal Richelieu had not died so soon, he had reconciled both religions. Several ministers were gained over to this project. This Mr Ferri was of that number, and had for it a pension of five hundred crowns every year. Thus the Huguenots speak of it here.' His enemies renewed this false report on account of his general catechism, wherein they pretended he gave his adversary a great advantage; I mean, the abbot Bossuet, archdeacon of Metz, who writ against him.

[E] He kept a great correspondence by letters with Mr Dury. This correspondence lasted above five and twenty or six and twenty years. I will relate on this subject a story that has been communicated to me. Dury, being at the fair of Francfort in April 1662, expressed to some gentlemen of Metz a strong desire to see Mr Ferri. When they were ready to go home, they asked him whether or no he would go along with them; they pressed him to undertake the journey, and offered to stay for him till the next day. He could have wished to have had more time to resolve upon this journey; but he was obliged to determine immediately. He then resolved to go to Metz; but met with two obstacles in his way: the first, that he must dress himself in the habit of a French peasant, and to cut off a large white and square beard which he then wore. He had an aversion to the first of these two things; and could not, without mortification, comply with the second. But the desire to see Mr Ferri overcame these difficulties. They arrived at Metz so late, that Dury was obliged to delay his visit till the next day. But one of those that came along with him, very early in the morning, told Mr Ferri, that Mr Dury was arrived the day before, and that it was reasonable that he should prevent his visit. Mr Ferri beset himself so much at this news, and was transported with so much joy, upon his going to embrace this good doctor, that he forgot to tie the strings of his drawers, and went out half dressed. Their interview was attended with a thousand edifying marks of zeal and reciprocal esteem. It is thought that, as a consequence of their conferences, Mr Ferri writ a paper, which he addressed to the divines of Strasburg. One of them, who in all probability did not like Syncretism, writ against Mr Ferri. Observe, by the by, that Mr Amyraut was mistaken, when, in 1647, he spoke of Mr Dury, as of a man that was already dead (8).

Let us place here what Mr Ancillon, Mr Ferri's colleague, hath said of Dury (9). 'He came to Metz, and conferred at a gentleman's house with Mr Ferri and me upon this subject. He told us as a secret whatever he had hitherto done, and what he designed to do for the future, and asked our opinion. We observed him to be a good man, learned, and every way capable to negotiate a business of that importance: he had then put it on a good foot; for he had already a promise of all the princes of Germany, and the northern kings: he told us, that he found no opposition from the princes, but only from some ministers who opposed this great and desired work. He was well satisfied with the charity of the gentlemen of Zurich, who had supplied him with considerable sums of money to defray the expenses of his journey, and to supply what he wanted over and above what the protector (10) did give him. We earnestly exhorted him not to leave off his design till he had executed it.'

In the first edition of this work, I gave an account what the memoir contained that was communicated to me; which is, that after Dury and Ferri's conferences, the latter composed a discourse, which obliged a divine of Strasburg to write against him. This divine cannot be Dorscheus, because he died in 1659, and so his book, De gratia adversus Calvinismum Ferrium, cannot be referred to any thing that followed this conference of the peace-maker Dury, and the minister of Metz. What Dury said, that he found no obstacle but from some ministers who opposed the re-union of the parties, is worth our notice, and confirms what shall be said hereafter (11). Hulfeman, a professor of divinity, published at Wittenberg, in 1644, a book against this project of Dury, and intitled it, Calvinismus irreconciliabilis.

[F] Dury at last became a sort of visionary. This appears from what I have said in another place (12) concerning his apocalyptic designs, and much more from the great hopes which he had conceived of his new explanation of the apocalypse. I could not join this last fact with the preceding, because I was then at the last page of the first volume of this Dictionary. I therefore referred it to this place. Pray observe Dury's plan. It is a 'method of meditation to obtain the true sense of the holy scriptures by one's self, and to prevent all occasions of dispute concerning what may be doubtful; for in every doubtful case, we shall have nothing to do, but immediately to have recourse to one or several texts, which speak of the subject in hand, and having found the true sense of the scripture by the rule of common interpretation, the decision will be found, if people are previously agreed to acquiesce in the sense of the holy scripture (13)'. He adds, that to give an essay of his method, 'he hath pitched upon the book of the Revelation, which, without doubt, he looked upon as the most obscure book of all the whole Bible; that by the description of the means whereby we come to understand it, we may be convinced that the same rule may discover the sense, and lead us to the understanding of other less obscure books and texts of holy writ (14)'. He believes, that, with God's help, this battery against the powers of darkness will be so raised, that the Lord's hand shall be lifted up according to Isaiah's prophecy, chap. xxvi. ver. 9, 10, 11, 12. which begins to be now fulfilled. We must therefore surround them with such a light, that they shall have no place where to hide themselves any more (15). What dreams! what chimeras! how weak must a man be, to fancy that he can draw from such a method so great an evidence continued his preaching. Above eighty stones were found in his bladder, which was the cause of his death. He had a very fine library, and to the last took a pleasure in writing several remarks on the blank-paper, which is commonly at the beginning and end of books; and because he writ small and plain, he set down upon these leaves abundance of things, which may easily be read. We see in the inscription of his picture in print the words Verbi divini minister [G]; which dence, that it will be able to clear all the doubts which are raised on such and such places of scripture? This great pacificator founded the horn in Zion; for he joined to his book, a Latin piece, of four pages in 4to, with this title Celestina ad pios Evangelii Ministros. An exhortation to the devout ministers of the gospel.

Vos qui per vada sancta navigantes
Lentos figitis ad mandata remos
Audite hoc monitum, ut celestina missum NOMINE CHRISTI.

Attend ye sailors on the sacred deep,
Whose oars the measures of God's mandates keep,
The cheerful signal catch, and think it came From heav'n itself, with your great master's name.

The owner of the copy, which came to my hands, fastened to it the original of the letter, which Dury wrote to the consistories of the province of Groningen, when he sent them his new project and his Celestina. This letter is dated from Cassel the 22d of June 1674, and shews, that he was concerned for nothing so much as for his new method.

Observe, that to excuse him, and to shew that he fed not on whims, one would think it might be said, that one of his chief designs was to attack the consciences of those who foment division. This appears by his words: What perplexes the minds, and separates the affections of christians, is nothing else but a design that men have to maintain the principles and method of their particular faction, against the interest of the common edification, which is taught and recommended to us by the apostle St Paul, 1 Cor. ix. 19. I have therefore in view an enquiry after a truly evangelical and spiritual remedy, which may be applied to the conscience of those who foment a spirit of Party among christians, for a temporal interest: this is the foundation and aim of my new design (16). It may be said, that this was to go to the spring of the evil, and of the remedy; and so it ought not to seem strange that he appeared so confident of success. 'He had a mind to shew by what means those obstacles might be removed, which hinder the Protestants from proceeding to a more perfect reformation, which ought to be introduced both in the schools and in the church, and from whence, by the blessing of God, the fruit will redound to the government of the state (17).' People may say what they please; his chimeras will still subsist; for the attacks, which he designed to give to the conscience of the chiefs, were not less unlikely to succeed, than those which he levelled against their understanding.

*Tales q; multos ferrent hæc sæcula Ferri,

was, without lessening Mr Ancillon? Or could not be raised but on the ruins of his colleague? This distinction seems to him (22) odious and affected; he says, (22) Ibid. that I preposterously endeavour to blacken Mr Ancillon's memory (23). II. He is angry (24) with the person (23) Ibid. who furnished me with some memoirs, and he hath been surprized (25) at my credulity, and at the manner of my making use of them. He supposes, that having been a long while in the neighbourhood of Metz, I must be pretty well acquainted with the transactions there, and that I could not but know the universal esteem, and unexpressible affection, which people had for Mr Ancillon. III. He speaks (26) of the correspondence by letters that had been between Mr Ancillon and me for several years. IV. He doth not believe (27) that his father, or any of his family, hath ever disoblige me. V. But he finds (28), that I should have done well for my credit to forbear placing with so much care the name of Ancillon, in the body and index of my book, since I would afford him but a rank unworthy of so great a man. VI. Coming to the fact, he pretends, that what I say is false; and informs the world (29), that Mr Philippe engraved Mr Ferri's picture some time after his death, and named him minister of the R. R. that the king's attorney took fire immediately at this title, and proceeded against the Engraver; That Mr Ferri's heirs unwilling to meddle in that affair, the Engraver (30) was displeased with his work, and that if some persons of note had not hindered him, he would have broke his plate to pieces, being vexed that no person appeared for him, who, by his work, had had no other aim, than to honour the memory of Mr Ferri; that therefore he was contented to correct the title, and, to stop the king's attorney's and the Roman Catholics mouths, he put a P. between the two R. to signify pretended reformed; That (31) the same Philippe engraved afterwards Mr Ancillon's picture; and that, to avoid the same inconvenience that had happened to him on account of Mr Ferri's picture, he put these words, David Ancillon, Ministrorum Metensium Decanus. That no body ever found fault with them; that they remained without contradiction; that the world hath always seen them in this print; that he hath actually the plate in his hands, and (32) that he is ready to shew it to whosoever will desire to be convinced that there is at least one mistake in my large work.

I never was more surprized, than when I read this part of Mr Ancillon's son's book. I immediately did two things: one was to write to him, that he might be in the right as to the fact, but that he could not be so with reference to the design which he accuses me of. I gave him some explanations, and begged of him to rectify these things in the first work that he should publish; and I told him, that, on my side, I would clear this business in my second edition. He returned a very obliging answer, and assured me, that he hoped to print shortly a book, wherein all this should be revised and corrected. The other thing that I did was to write to the person who had furnished me with the memoirs concerning Mr Ferri: I desired him to tell me, whether the two facts which I had related, and received from him, could be well proved? or whether I must confess myself in the wrong, since the public had seen a book, wherein Mr Ancillon the son maintained, that Mr Ferri's print was called in question, but that of his father had never been so? We shall see hereunder what answer I received. But before that, let us make some notes on the five heads of this complaint.

I. I can protest, with all the sincerity in the world, that I have had no design of giving my readers an idea of superiority or inferiority, with reference to these two ministers of Metz, Mr Ferri and Mr Ancillon; neither do I believe, that the gentleman, who sent me these memoirs, had any such design. I have read them over since I have known the complaint, and I have found in them no ground to suspect it. The thing is told in a plain manner, as I have related it; and it plainly appears, that he only designed to shew the

the epocha of one of the chicaneries of the missionaries against the Protestants. There was a time when only those ministers, who took upon them the title of pastors, were put to some trouble for it, but were not disturbed for styling themselves ministers of the word of God; but at last it was thought fit to vex them on this account. This is all that I believed, that the person who sent me those memoirs, designed to shew with reference to the affairs of Metz; and it was wholly with that view that I made that remark which concerned Mr Ferri's picture. Had I been told, that any body would have pretended, that I designed, by that, to have put Mr Ferri above Mr Ancillon; I had answered, that it had been impossible. I at least remember, that it never then came into my mind that any one would understand me so; and had I suspected it, I would have positively set down the design of my remark. Judge then what was my surprize, when I saw that there was a public complaint against me, that I had aimed to vilify and blacken Mr Ancillon; and that I said, that the title of minister of God's word was blotted out of his picture, because they had not the same regard for him as for the other. This is not only to impute to me a design which I never had, but also some words which can never be found in my dictionary. I have several times observed, that those who write either the life, or encomium of great men, are pleased to say, that such or such a custom hath begun, or ceased, by such or such a professor, &c. These are epocha's or particulars which are thought remarkable; and therefore the author of the memoirs ought to have informed me when the permission to put verbi divini minister to the copper-plates of the ministers ended, and when it began to be forbidden. But had he had a design to have heightened Mr Ferri's character, he should have entered into particulars, and shewed how they warranted such a distinction; otherwise he could not have made it appear that Mr Ferri was preferred to his colleague. To explain myself: Those who say in general, That such a one was the last who had that permission, such a one was the first that had it not allowed him, shew plainly and precisely a period of time; but they say nothing which proves that the first was more deserving than the last: the event, which they relate, is a very equivocal sign. Some factions may spring up, which may endeavour to abolish a custom, and for the first three or four years have not authority enough to abolish it: in the mean time a professor is promoted to the chair, and of course enjoys the privileges of that custom. If in the fifth year the faction is potent enough, another professor, that happens to be elected at that time, shall be debarred this privilege. Doth this prove him less deserving than the other? not at all. It proves only, that the cabal was more able to carry their point the fifth year than they had been before. It may even happen, that a faction will not employ their whole strength, because they despise certain persons; and that they wait to establish their innovation, till a professor of extraordinary worth is chosen, because the alteration of a custom is of much more weight when it begins by a very eminent person. There are a thousand cases wherein the epochas, which the author of the memoir pointed out to me, would be a proof of Mr Ancillon's superiority over Mr Ferri: but the truth of it is, that there was no design in this business to decide who was the greatest man of the two. It was only intended to shew by what steps ministers were wronged and vexed. Observe, that the judges, exasperated by the missionaries, or carried on by their own ambition (33), did sooner vex a minister of great parts and learning, than one of less note. They imagined, that by persecuting one, who was reckoned as a pillar of a Calvinistical church, they could better carry on the ruin of the whole party, than if they persecuted a minister of an inferior rank. So that, instead of pretending, as Mr Ancillon, the son, hath done, that there was a design to lessen his father, it had been more excusable to have fancied, that there was rather a design to extol him: for what can be more honourable for a minister, not only according to the opinion of the refugees, but also of all the Protestants, to have been the first example of the persecutions of the missionaries (34)? Did not such a choice of the persecutors imply, that they did despise those upon whom they had not begun their attacks, and that they thought it a master-piece to affront those upon whom they begun them? you may remember, that the agents of the clergy, who took no notice that some country ministers, or some indifferent writers, styled themselves pastors, made a great bustle when they saw the Paris ministers take upon them that title in an excellent book composed by Aubertin, one of the ministers of that church (35). After all, it will appear, that if the author of the memoir and I had had the odd design which is fathered upon us, we should have been the most unskillful of all men: we should have so concealed our design, that we should have made it invisible to all unprejudiced readers, and that many might easily have concluded from our words just the contrary to our intention. This is what concerns the first part of the complaint: I will not enlarge so much on the others.

II. The credit that I gave to the memoir is not an unlawful credulity. I was obliged to believe, that a man that had lately taken the pains to inform himself upon the spot, as exactly as he could, of all the particulars of that story of the prints of Mr Ferri and Mr Ancillon, could not be mistaken: and as I had lived some years in the neighbourhood of Metz, and had never heard any thing of what concerns these prints, it induced me the more to think so. I came to Sedan about the end of August, 1675, and I found that the Protestants there enjoyed a greater liberty than the other churches: but I found that things grew worse with them every day, and I saw the cavil that arose concerning the verbi divini minister. A student (36) of divinity was to maintain some theses which he had dedicated to some of the ministers of that place. He gave them the title of verbi divini minister, according to the custom that had been always practised, and never opposed; but the priests of Sedan made a bustle about it, and got this title struck out. When I remembered this, could I doubt but such another innovation had happened some time after Mr Ferri's death? The particular esteem which the magistrates might have for a minister (37) did not hinder them to give way to the peevish temper of the missionaries who applied to them. It was the bent of the court, and consequently the spring that gave motion to all.

III. I was very well pleased, and thought myself honoured, to have an intercourse of letters with Mr Ancillon. We writ to one another what we knew concerning the news of the republic of learning. I had a design to speak of him in my book, and to boast of his friendship; but I expected some memoirs, or at least till the article of Farel, whose life he has written, should give me occasion to do it: but this article was referred to the Supplement to the two volumes of my Dictionary, as I have referred to it several important articles. IV. None that knows me will ever do me so much injustice as to suspect, that, under pretence I had been disoblighed by any one's relations, I would revenge myself on his memory (38). I freely here confess, that I have no reason to complain of the late Mr Ancillon, or of any of his family. V. If I thought it not fit to go from my memoir concerning Mr Ferri, to speak of the worth of his colleague, it was because I was very sure that I should not want a more proper opportunity to do it. I gave the public notice, that I did not make the Index to my Dictionary: It was done by a minister, and a refugee, who no doubt put there Mr Ancillon, because he had a mind to shew the epocha of the particular quarrel against the title verbi divini minister, it being a remarkable thing.

VI. Let us at last come to the chief point. The author of the memoir hath acquainted me, that he was mistaken in one thing; that it is not true that Verbi divini Minister was put in Mr Ancillon's print, and therefore that they were not obliged to raze out this clause. However he was in the right to say, that this clause was allowed in Mr Ferri's print. He has sent me a copy, where I read these words: PAULUS FERRI V. D. MINISTER ECCLES. P. R. METENSIS OBIT ANNO 1669. ETAT. ANNO 79. The inscription was at first MINISTER ECCLES. REF. METENSIS; but they were obliged to raze out REF. as repugnant to the edicts of pacification, and to put in the room of those three letters P. R. which are seen in all the prints.

(35) See remark [B] of the article AUBERTIN.

(36) Born at Sedan. He is minister of the Walloon church at Dort. He is yet alive, and may witness to what I advance here.

(37) The author of the complaint ought to acknowledge it, since he confesses that the engraver of Mr Ferri's picture was dead, and that this minister was very much esteemed.

(38) See in it's place the article ANCILLON. It was composed since the unkind complaint of this minister's son; and notwithstanding that, I have spoken very advantageously of the minister, without minding this unjust and ill grounded complaint.

(33) It was in France a short and sure way to please the court, and to obtain from thence some favour and preferment, to shew a great zeal to harass the ministers, &c.

prints. Mr Ancillon is mistaken when he says, that Mr Ferri's plate had originally R.R. in whole room, when they came to correct it, they were only obliged to put a P between those two letters. The conclusion of all this will be, I. That it is strictly true, that the title of V. D. Minifter appeared at first on Mr Ferri's print, and that it remained there even after the Engraver was sued for it. II. That it was never seen, after that, on the print of any minister of Metz, and that the Engraver durst not put it on that of Mr Ancillon. This is what the author of the memoir answered me. I omit several considerations which tend to distinguish the pretence from the true cause of the affront that was put upon him and me: there is no necessity to trouble the world with it.

[H] He left some children.] He was twice married, and had by his first wife one son and one daughter. The daughter is at Metz, with all her family. The son's family consists of one son and several daughters: these, except the eldest, have taken sanctuary in Berlin, and the son is in England. The eldest daughter is at the Hague with Mr du Vivier her husband, who is minister there. He had by his second wife one daughter, married to Mr Bancelin, heretofore minister of Metz, and now of Berlin.

[I] And some manuscripts.] As, the answer to The history of the birth and decay of heresy in the city of Metz. Mr de Madaure, suffragan of the bishopric of Metz, is the author of that history. Mr Ferri, by his last will, desired his heirs to print his answer to this book, yet it hath not as yet appeared (39). They keep some other treatises of the deceased, besides a vast number of sermons, and among them eleven hundred only on the Epistle to the Hebrews.

FERRIER (ARNAUD, or ARNOUL DU) president of the parliament of Paris in Henry II's reign, was employed by Charles IX in several embassies. See upon this Mr Moreri; for my design is only to insist on a thing which he hath taken no notice of, which is, that du Ferrier was along while a good Huguenot in his heart, and that at last he publicly owned himself one [A]. Had not he made his escape, he had been put in prison, (as being suspected of heresy) after the famous Mercuriale of the year 1559 (a). This storm against him ceased some time after; and he was chosen for an embassy, which gave him occasion, in some measure, to speak his mind. He harangued (b) in the council of Trent, as ambassador of the most christian king; and expressed himself with so much vigour, that he offended the stanch Papists. After that, he went to Venice in the same quality of ambassador, and remained there several years without having an opportunity to discover his sentiments. At last Mr du Pleffis Mornai, who was not ignorant of them, pressed him so warmly, at his return from his embassy, to give glory to truth, that he obliged him to declare himself publicly (c). The king of Navarre made him his chancellor [B]. The Ultramontanes have accused du Ferrier of a certain plot,

[A] At last he publicly owned himself a good Huguenot.] This circumstance, which many learned men have not known (1), deserves to be proved here. The place that I will quote is something long; but I quote it entire, because I found in it nothing but what is useful to give us an insight into the history of this famous man. Mr du Pleffis Mornai going to Guienne (2), meets with Mr Ferrier, at Artenay, as he returned from his embassy at Venice, where he had been particularly acquainted with him in the year 1570. After they had embraced one another, they retired into a private place, and talking of the good disposition which God gave him at his age, he happened to say, that it bordered on the seventy sixth year: Whereupon Mr du Pleffis took occasion to tell him, Is it not then high time to look to your conscience, and to remember those edifying discourses which we have had together formerly at Venice, and that resolution which you have so many times repeated to me, both by word of mouth and by letters, of making an open profession of the truth, which you have known so long, and so long concealed? And he pressed him so warmly, that he got a promise from him, that he would declare himself; not without saying however, that he would be glad to be first paid off fourteen thousand crowns, which were due to him for his embassy. Mr du Pleffis wrote to his friends at Paris, to keep him in this good resolution; and, to take off all manner of excuse, as soon as he was with the king of Navarre, he persuaded him to make du Ferrier his chancellor. Whereupon laying aside all other business, he went to meet him, and then made a public profession of the reformed religion. He was a great man, acquainted with all the parts of sound learning; an excellent civilian, honoured with several embassies, and even with that to the council of Trent, and who in his old age confined his studies to the scriptures and the holy tongue: and for that reason, Mr du Pleffis, as may be seen by several of his letters, exhorted him to make a more solemn declaration (3); whereby the states, wherein he had lived, might know, why a man, so much valued, had forsaken the Romish religion at that age. But he could not obtain that of a man who had grown old in the respect for the court, and in the fear of the world. Truly Mr Montagne could not forbear saying often to Mr du Pleffis, You have gained a victory over us by getting this man, and honouring in him a virtue which we slighted.

[B] The king of Navarre made him his chancellor.] Believing that the affairs, du Ferrier negotiated at the court of France, would not give him leave to reside near his person, he was pleased to give him an employment, which should oblige him to stay at Paris: he designed Pibrac's place for him, that is to say, the superintendence of the affairs which he had in that city (4). This prince had a council at Paris at Toulouse, and at Bourdeaux. The law-suits which he had in every one of those parliaments required it. But let us make use of Mr du Pleffis's own words (5). Because the said estates are under three parliaments, namely, Paris, Toulouse, and Bourdeaux, to whose cognizance several affairs and law-suits arising concerning them belong, he retains and pays in every one of these parliaments a council, over which one of the chief of the parliament presides. As for that of Paris, he hath chosen Mr du Ferrier, lately ambassador for the king at Venice, one of the greatest men of Europe, and whom the late chancellor de l'Hôpital had judged the only man worthy to succeed him in the place of chancellor for his integrity and capacity. We are afraid that he dares not accept of it, because he desires hereafter to make an open profession of the Protestant religion, and therefore he would live in a more secure and free place for the exercise of it. Indeed I believe that he did not accept of that post. He went to the king of Navarre to be his chancellor; for here is what I find in du Pleffis's memoirs (6): 'I have not known all this while but two chancellors of the king of Navarre; the late Mr Ferrier, a very great man, the second Cato of France, who died plot, that might have been either wholly or partly true [C]. This learned man died in the year 1585, aged about seventy nine years [D]. Brantome says a remarkable thing of him [E]. I shall mention it, and will not forget cardinal Palavicini [F].

I lengthen a little this article in the second edition; to observe that du Ferrier took his degree of doctor of the civil law at Padua; and that from a professor in the university of Toulouse, he was promoted to be counsellor of the parliament of that city (d). Read on this subject a letter of Bunel (e), where he observes, that cardinal de Tournon had contributed very much to this honourable recompence of the merit of this learned civilian; and that the liberality of Francis I appeared on that occasion. This letter is without date; but we find in it, that Castellan was then bishop of Mâcon. We must thence conclude that du Ferrier got that employ between 1543, and 1548. He had been one of the learned men whom cardinal de Tournon carried along with him, and with whom he familiarly conversed (f). Thuanus says on this head what redounds much to this cardinal's glory (g). Du Ferrier's elogium is found among those of Sammarthanus [G]. Besides that, consult the notes on the Catholic confession of Sanci (h).

[C] The Ultramontanes have accused him of a certain plot, that might have been either wholly or partly true.] The author of the Journal des Savans is angry with Raynaldus the annalist, who attributes this plot to chancellor de l'Hôpital, and to president Ferrier. A certain project of the pope's legates, occasioned the remonstrances made by the emperor, the king of Spain, and other princes, and the famous protestation pronounced by president du Ferrier, Charles the ninth's ambassador, which was so displeasing to the court of Rome. Nothing could be invented more injurious to the memory of this famous magistrate, than what Raynaldus rashly advances, that he had conspired with the chancellor de l'Hôpital to withdraw the most christian king from the holy see, to assemble a national council, where the French king, in imitation of the king of England, should have been declared head of the Gallican church, and to usurp all the church lands of France (7).

AUTHORS who knew not that du Ferrier died a Protestant.

A great many other learned men have not known that du Ferrier died a Protestant. Here is what Davila says of a conference that the duke of Elpernon had with the king of Navarre, whereupon Roque-laure, one of this prince's favourites, advised him to comply with Henry the third's intentions. Contendeva in contrario Arnaldo Monsignore di Ferrier suo Cancelliere, il quale buono di finissimo ingegno, e di eccellente dottrina dopo la legatione di Venetia, nella quale era stato molti anni, tornato in Francia, e poco riconosciuto alla corte, s'era ritirato appresso il Rè di Navarra. Questo temendo, se il Padrone si riducesse alla concordia, e alla ubbidienza del Rè di rimanere abietto, e abbandonato, s'era BENECHE CATTOLICO accostato all'opinione di Filippo di Mornè Signore di Plessis (9). Mr de Beauvais-Nangis (10) hath taken notice of this Mistake of Davila. I believe that cardinal Palavicini would have thanked any one that had informed him of what I relate in the remark [A].

This would have given great weight, among those of his party, to the reason he alleges (11) against Fra Paolo, taken from the great intimacy which was between that friar and the ambassador du Ferrier. It is most certain that the conversion of the latter was not known to this cardinal, since it is not alleged in the place which I have quoted. See the remark [F].

[D] He died in the year 1585, aged about seventy nine years.] Two places of Mr du Plessis Mornei, above quoted, are a proof of this. One says, that in 1582, president du Ferrier bordered on his seventy sixth year (12), and the other, that he died in the year 1585 (13).

[E] Brantome says a remarkable thing of him.] I should as well like president du Ferrier, so long kept ambassador at Venice, who sometimes would go and read public lectures at Padua; which was a thing unbecoming his employ and the king's authority, who took it ill of him, and gave him no kind reception at his return, as well on that account, as for the religion he professed. He was afterwards chancellor to the king of Navarre (14).

[F] I will not forget cardinal Palavicini.] He quotes (15) the life of father Paul, wherein is seen that this father had been very intimate with du Ferrier, and that du Ferrier had made a large collection of memoirs and letters. Hence the cardinal concludes, that father Paul had taken his materials from ill hands: for you must know, says he, that du Ferrier was one of those ambassadors which the court of France sent to Trent (16), when, in the time of king Charles's infancy, most of those that governed the royal council were imbued with new heresies. Du Ferrier shewed himself so plainly, that three persons of note testified, by their writings, that he passed for a Huguenot. The third of these witnesses is the ambassador of Venice, who affirms, in the account which he gave the senate, that du Ferrier, suspected of being a Huguenot, read Lucian as he was at mass. The cardinal adds, that du Ferrier, designed to enrich himself by a traffic of religion, and that he treated secretly for that purpose with the Pope, by the means of Bastian Gualtieri bishop of Viterbo. He endeavoured to persuade his holiness to dissolve the council, and call a particular assembly of the Gallican church; whereof the Pope was to be the head, and where he hoped to assist on the king's behalf. As he expected wonders from the Pope's favour, he promised all manner of good offices to the court of Rome, and protested that he was persuaded of the Pope's authority on those points upon which the Sorbonne were contesting. Seeing that the Pope would not follow this project, he changed his ambition into rage; and taking advantage of the absence of the cardinals of Lorraine, and of Lanfac, chief of the embassy, as also of the conditional power which the court of France had given its ministers to protest, and knowing that his colleague would applaud him (18), he made, before all the council, a satirical harangue against the Popes, and against the members of the assembly, and ascribed to the king his master the same authority over the Gallican church that the schismatic kings of England ascribe to themselves over the church of that kingdom. He appeared no more at the council, because he knew that he had made himself odious there, but he went some time after to Venice, from whence he wrote to the king as maliciously as he could, and shewed, by the most cunning reasons of state that he could devise, that his majesty ought not to send any more ambassadors to Trent, nor receive the decrees of that council, since they were so prejudicial to the royal authority. From hence father Paul hath drawn his dross, which he vends for pure gold. Thus Palavicini concludes this subject.

[G] Du Ferrier's panegyric is found among those of Sammarthanus.] This eulogist hath very well expressed what he hath said, but he hath not enlarged enough on the life of this great man. For the rest he hath been hitherto quoted (19) in Moreri's dictionary in Annal. Which will make many believe, that Sammarthanus hath written annals, and may oblige them to seek for this pretended book. This gives me occasion to observe an error of this nature, which hath not been corrected, even in the Paris edition of 1699. In Morel, at the end of the article of Eugene IV, is quoted Eneas Silvius, Eutrop. c. 53. This is enough to persuade several readers, that this Eneas Silvius, who was Pope under the name of Pius II, had wrote a Book intituled, Eutropius, or a Commentary on the Historian Eutropius. These faults, and many more of this nature, have been made not by Mr Morel himself, but by his printers. I do not question but that he had wrote Ste. Marthe, in Elogiis. Eneas Silvius in Europa. At least to he ought to have written.

FERRIER (JEREMIAH) (a) was a minister and professor in divinity at Nîmes, about the beginning of the XVIIth century: He afterwards changed his religion, and was made counsellor of state. He had maintained, in a public disputation in the year 1602, that Pope Clement VIII was properly Antichrist (b). This caused a great disturbance [A]. Who would have thought that a man, who made so bold a step, would not always continue a hot man, and an enemy to moderate divines? Yet, he was one of the first that grew faint and slack [B] in the political assemblies of the Protestants: For he did not second those who were for appearing bold and daring; on the contrary, he opposed, as much as he could, all the vigorous and courageous resolutions which several zealous persons proposed. This made him so suspected, that they looked upon him as a court pensioner, a false brother, and a betrayer of the church (c). The national synod of Privas in 1612, forbid him to preach at Nîmes (d) [C]. Whereupon Ferrier got a place of counsellor in the presidial of that city; but a popular tumult was raised against him, which occasioned his change of religion [D]. After which he settled at Paris, where he endeavoured (d) French Mercury, Tom. III, pag. 156.

[A] This caused a great deal of disturbance. The parliament of Toulouse ordered, that he should be taken into custody for this thesis. At Castres the chamber was divided about the form of proceeding. At last Henry IV made an arrêt, forbidding all manner of persons to disturb this minister for that proposition (1). The provincial and national synods used all their interest for Ferrier (2), who had industriously concerned the whole body in this affair; inasmuch that the national synod of Gap, where he was assistant to the moderator (3), ordered, in the year 1603, that a new article should be inserted in the confession of faith, importing, that the Pope is properly Antichrist, and the son of perdition, foretold in God's word. See in Mr du Pleffis Mornai's life (4), how ill Henry IV. took this innovation; and observe how the intrigues and interest of a private member may influence the whole body.

[B] Yet he was one of the first that that grew faint and slack. We are told, in the history of the edict of Nantes (5), that he was corrupted by the cajoling of the court; and that the Jesuits boast, that in the year 1600, their father Cotton being at Nîmes... got Ferrier's acquaintance, whom he disposed at that time to betray his brethren. Let the matter be how it will, continues this historian, he embroiled every thing in the political assemblies, where he was present, which obliged the synods to forbid him appearing there any more. The French Mercury (6) informs us, that some jealousies arose between the deputies of the assembly of Saumur in the year 1611; and that also Ferrier the minister took occasion to go home upon his son and wife's sickness. There were two opinions in this assembly (7): Some maintaining, that they ought to enjoy the edict of pacification as it was drawn up; and others, (among whom Ferrier was) that they ought to acquiesce (conformably to the king's pleasure) to the terms of the edict, as it had been verified in the parliaments.

[C] The synod of Privas forbid him to preach at Nîmes. The historian of the edict of Nantes gives a large account of this affair: 'It was on Ferrier's account, says he (8), that in the synod of Privas an act was made, whereby the divinity-professors were excluded out of the political assemblies; but, with relation to him, they were not contented with general terms, for he was arraigned after a very mortifying manner. The means which he had devised to ward off the blow, seemed only to draw it upon him: he took some suspected journeys to court, with out acquainting his church. He at first accepted the place that was offered him in the church of Paris, and even shewed a great deal of sorrow when he was upbraided with his faults: but after he had promised not to abandon his profession, and to exercise it at Paris, he very dishonourably broke his word, and returned into his province without taking his leave of the ministers of Paris. All this was considered at Privas; and du Moulin, who gave there an account of what had passed at Paris, where Ferrier had shewed himself of a temper equally haughty, inconstant, and unsincere, proved his deportment very irregular. Several accusations concerning his former behaviour, which was rigorously searched into, were added to this. He was charged with neglect of his duty as divinity-professor; with preaching some doctrines not very orthodox; with meddling with the management of money; with having kept a considerable sum which he would not account for; with having forged, or consented to the forging of, certain letters, which had engaged him in some shameful broils and dishonest disguises. He was severely censured on all these heads: but besides the verbal censure, the synod ordered him to write to the church of Paris, and to make them satisfaction: forbid him appearing in the political assemblies for ten years; and enjoined him to exercise his ministry out of the province of Languedoc. The church and city of Nîmes sent some deputies to the synod, who omitted nothing to get this decree cancelled, but to no purpose. The synod even declared to them that they took it ill, to see so considerable a deputa-tion in the behalf of a man who betrayed the common cause. The ministers, who had sided with him, were censured for their complaisance; and the memorials, which they had taken along with them to justify him, were voted slanderous. But because they saw that Ferrier would not stop there, and that having the magistrates for him, he would continue the exercise of his ministry, whereof he was not suspended; they declared, that he was already suspended, if he did not obey. Nevertheless, because they would not carry things to the utmost extremity against him, the synod sent him to Montelimar, in the room of Chamier, who was going to be divinity-professor at Montauban. Ferrier then took other measures (9): he got a place of counsellor of the presidial of Nîmes, and was there installed, notwithstanding the oppositions of the consistory, which, after many proceedings, excommunicated him on the fourteenth of July, 1613. We shall see, in the following remark, the disorders that happened by a popular commotion.

[D] But a popular tumult was raised against him which occasioned his change of religion. The author of the French Mercury has described the circumstances of this tumult. Ferrier's adversaries, says he (10), seeing him a counsellor of the presidial, excommunicated him after their way, and incited the populace to fall upon him as he went to the presidial, or returned from it. Though Ferrier was informed of this design, yet he went with the provost to the presidial the fourteenth of July, 1613. As he went thither, he met with no body; but as he came out, designing to go home, he found his adversaries with the populace, who, pointing at him with their bands, said to one another, see, see, that traitor Judas! then they began to throw stones at him, and to pursue him, with a design to seize him; but he escaped into Lieutenant Rozel's house. Mad that he had made his escape, they went to his house, ransacked it, and burned before his door a great deal of his goods and books.

endeavoured to raise himself. He published, in 1614 (e), a book of controversy, concerning Antichrist. The king employed him in many affairs of importance; and in the year 1626, he commanded him to follow his majesty in his progress to Bretagne, and there honoured him with the place of privy-counsellor of state (f). Cardinal Richelieu honoured him with a particular esteem (g). At his return from this journey he was attacked (g) Ibid. with a lingering fever, which grew worse every day. He died of it the 26th of September 1626 [E], and was buried in St Sulpice's church, which was his parish-church (b). He gave great proofs of his catholicism on his death-bed [F], and made all his children promise that they would live and die in the same faith [G]. I cannot well

The fifteenth and sixteenth of July, they went also to ransack what he had in the country, and to pluck up his vines; which having performed, they returned to Nismes, every one of them having in their hands vines and young trees out of Ferrier's inclosure. He found means to escape to Beaucaire, after he had been shut up for three days in a tomb (11). Ferrier says, (12) that 'he was half killed with stones; and that he escaped by a miracle out of the hands of thirty of the consistory's parishans, who had bound themselves by an oath to kill him: that his mother, aged sixty years, widow and daughter of a minister, died with horror at this sad spectacle; and that she was several times threatened by these murderers to be burned alive: that two little children were miraculously snatched from the flames by the prudent management of the magistrates, whom these enraged zealots threatened to kill: that his poor wife, nine months gone with child, was struck with a halbard: that his mother-in-law, being almost eighty years old, was treated with the same cruelty: that all his household-stuff was burned before their temple; the greatest part of his books and papers pillaged or burned; all the best of his goods carried away, or spoiled: that the sentence of the chamber of the edict of Castres, and the opinion of all the judges of the pretended reformed religion, condemned to the galleys seventeen of these wretches, whom they (13) had persuaded to kill him on account of religion, by promising them heaven for so detestable an action.' This last circumstance hath all the air of an impotence and black calumny. By this means the rest may be suspected (14): but, at worst, this cannot be brought as a consequence of the doctrine and temper of the whole party. It is well known, that in all countries, and in all religions, the mobile, when in a mutiny, knows no bounds. Ferrier himself acknowledges, that the Protestant judges voted seventeen of these mutineers to be punished. All that I have to do, to make an end of the commentary of my text, is only to say, that Ferrier pretends that all these outrages conquered the obstinacy wherewith he resisted the light: It is, says he (15), the common reproach of the enemies of my salvation, That I am a catholic by force. It is true; I confess it. God granted me this favour against my will, when I opposed him, when I fled from him, and abhorred the salvation which he offered me. My calling was violent, because my obstinacy in heresy was very great. Thus, to save the greatest persecutors, and the most virulent enemies of the church, God hath been obliged to thunder and lighten, to pull them down to the ground, and blind them by his powerful hand. He therefore pretends, that the injuries he received broke the ties by which he was attached to heresy, and conducted him to another Ananias, that is to say, cardinal du Perron, who introduced him into the bosom of the church: for this cardinal was the great converter of that time.

(11) Ibid. Tom. XII, pag. 495, 496. Ferrier says it also in his preface to his Treatise of Antichrist: I have been buried three whole days, and truly put in the grave.

(13) He means the ministers and their abettors.

(14) The historian of the Edit of Nantes, Tom. II, pag. 123, 124, acknowledges that the populace, without any regard to the consuls, judges, or pastors, broke open Ferrier's house, embezzled or burned all his goods, and forgot no outrage, which an exasperated crowd can do; ravaged every thing in his country-house, and broke open the goals, to set at liberty some mutineers whom the judges had committed.

REFLEXION on the maxim, Compelle intrare, — compel them to come in.

I shall observe here, without having any particular event in view, that as there is a compelle intrare, COMPEL THEM TO COME IN, there is also a compelle exire, COMPEL THEM TO GO OUT. Suppose a clergyman, who hath a potent enemy among his brethren. It may happen, that in spite of himself he may be made a heretic, and forced to fly to another communion: first, he shall see himself accused of heterodoxy; after that, it shall be objected, that he keeps a secret correspondence with the enemy; that he is a pensioner, ill affected to the government, and capable to infect the church: he shall be made so odious, that even his relations dare not see him: he shall be forced, seeing his ministry can no more edify, to seek employment elsewhere. But where shall he go? his adversaries letters move faster than a family; he can go no where, but he shall find himself already defamed (16). Thus, after he hath removed his tents into several places, without being able to remove prepossessing and rash judgments, almost reduced to the last penny, and not knowing how to subsist, and besides full of indignation, that it is so easy for two or three bawlers to prepossess so many against him, and conceiving an ill opinion of a party which can so easily be startled, he flies into the arms of another church. And this is what his enemies wanted; they are arrived to the height of their desires. Nothing torments them more, than to see that those, whom they have accused and calumniated, do not confirm their suggestions by their desertion (17). This is a kind of dragooning, not to compel to come in, but to compel to go out.

[E] He died the twenty sixth of September, 1626. Those who say (18), that he died the twenty seventh of September, 1626, are but little mistaken; those (19) who place it in the year 1625, are a little further from truth.

[F] He gave very great proofs of his catholicism on his death bed. A book was published intitled, The happy death of the Sieur Ferrier; wherein is related what he said when the priest brought him the sacrament and extreme unction, &c. The French Mercury (20) mentions a great many things contained in this little book; I refer the reader to it. But I will here take notice of two of them, because they are of use to rectify some mistakes. 'The holy sacrament coming into his house, Mrs du Ferrier his wife being on her knees, pretty near his bed, cried out, Ab, Lord, I am not worthy that you should come into my house: he, being sensibly affected with these words, said to her, Alas, my dear, I wish that he who put these words in your mouth, will ever be here after imprint his love and belief in your heart (21). This shews plainly, that this ex-minister's Wife was no more a Protestant; and therefore, that St Romuald the Feuillant, and after him David l'Enfant the Dominican, are mistaken, when they say (22), That du Ferrier could not persuade his wife to follow his steps, which did not hinder them from living lovingly together. A little before his death, he dictated his epitaph in these words (23): 'Hic jacet Hieronimus Ferrier, qui anno Domini 1613. Catholicam Apostolicam & Romanam fidem firmiter amplexus ad extremum usque vitæ spiritum firmiter retinuit. — Here lies Jeremiah Ferrier, who, in the year of our lord 1613, embraced the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman faith, which he steadfastly retained to his latest breath.' This will serve to confute Mr Moreri.

[G] He made all his children promise that they . . . would die in the same faith. As he says in the preface to the treatise of Antichrist, that he hath a great family upon his hands; we must believe that he had many children: among them, he had but one daughter. And this is what he said to her, when he exhorted them all to persevere in the Romish faith: And you, my daughter, who have had this great privilege over your brothers, to have been baptized in the church, do you not promise it me also (24)? Mr Patin also mentions this daughter: The lieutenant-criminal is here very sick. His wife, who is a shrew, hath beaten and shut him in the cellar. She is a devil, worse than Pilate's wife; she is the daughter of Jeremiah Ferrier, formerly minister of Nismes, who abjured. Thus he speaks in a letter dated the twenty fifth of August, 1660 (25). In all likelihood he speaks also of her, when he says in another place (26), 'There is here no other talk, but of the murder of Mr Tardieu lieutenant-criminal, and his wife: the two assassins were immediately taken . . . All the people go as it were in procession to St Bartholomew's Church, to well say how old he was [H]. They gave him some hopes of being sent ambassador to Holland, if we believe Mr Moreri [I]. of Jeremiah Ferrier was killed by some footmen, whom he would have hindered from striking his servant. Dom Peter de St Romuald (28) says, that his death happened on the twenty third of February 1638. Here is a very unhappy Family. I do not doubt but Mr Tardieu's wife, who was so noted for her covetousness (29), and who so tragically ended her days with her husband, was daughter to Ferrier the ex-minister.

[H] I cannot well say how old he was. He doth not explain himself consistently on that subject; for in a place of his preface, he acknowledges, That he is mightily afflicted that he had not employed for the Catholic church twenty whole years, which, he says, he hath wretchedly left to serve a bad and ungrateful cause. This shews, that he was received a minister about the year 1593, since he changed his religion in 1613; but he had said two pages before, that he was but twenty four years of age, when he maintained, that Clement VIII was Antichrist. This I find in the words which I am going to quote, and which serve for an answer to the reproaches cast upon him, that he had impudently engaged in this hypothesis to disturb the state, and to enrich himself by the war. 'He therefore, that is to say Mr du Plessis, is more concerned than I am in their accusations, that I designed by this means to raise a war. I had then never gone out of my study, being only twenty four years of age; had never been versed in business, nor in martial cabals, and thought of nothing else but my books, and to further the religion wherein I was born.' Let us remember, that he maintained his thesis in the year 1602. Now if he was then but twenty four years of age, he could not have been received minister in 1593. The ministry is not conferred on a scholar of fifteen years of age: we cannot therefore depend upon what he says. According to the French Mercury (30), he had preached for sixteen years the Protestant religion. Taking it then for granted, that he was twenty four years of age when he maintained, in 1602, the thesis of Antichrist, he had been received minister at the age of nineteen in 1597, and had died at the age of forty eight years. But who will rather believe the French Mercury, than Jeremiah Ferrier himself, on the duration of his ministry? The best way then is to decide nothing.

(30) Tom. III, pag. 134.

[I] They gave him some hopes of being sent ambassador to Holland, if we believe Mr Moreri. I think he is not here to be relied on; for he did not know that Jeremiah Ferrier lived thirteen years after his journey to Paris; he thought that this ex-minister died a little while after he arrived in that city. He did not know, that his book of antichrist was in French; for had he known it, he had not noted it in Latin, de Antichristo. He believed, without reason, that Ferrier was the author of a book, intitled, Responsio ad lib. admonitio ad Reg. Lugd. XIII. &c. The printers have horribly misfigured this title: it should be Responsio ad libellum cui titulus, admonitio ad Reg. Ludovicum XIII. Those who have ascribed such a book to our Ferrier, are undoubtedly some Latin authors, who have thus described a French book which is fathered upon him. I am going to speak of it.

[K] I dare not positively say, that Ferrier writ the State-Catholique. There are some arguments pro and con. This book appeared in print in the year 1625, under the name of the Sieur du Ferrier (31). It was immediately ascribed to Jeremiah Ferrier; for the author of a little book, intitled, The happy death of the Sieur du Ferrier, observes (32) that two things may be inferred from this death: one against the Protestants, the other against the publishers of libels in Flanders. The Protestants or party Huguenots had given out, that his conversion was feigned . . . and that his end would make it appear. They were answered, that the declaration, which he had made at his death, could not be called in question, or thought forced, or the effect of a delirium, since several Protestants themselves had visited him in his sickness, who might testify, that he continued in his senses, and that he kept a sound judgment to the last. As to the foreign writers, who said in their libels, that Simia fit semper Simia, it was replied, that this declaration of faith made by the Sieur du Ferrier at his death, and the relation of his happy decease, ought to have stopped their mouths, and exposed their scandalous writings. We must know, that the State Catholique was an answer to some libels, which some sticklers for the king of Spain had published against France (33), because it made an alliance with the Protestants to the prejudice of Catholicism. The author of the State-Catholique could not answer without venting many things against the house of Austria. The writers of the Spanish party replied (34), and reproached him, that he always acted the part of an ape; which shews plainly, that they took him for the ex-minister and ex-professor of Nismes; and this is the reason why, in the account of his death, the reflexion I have related is made. Several famous authors, and very well versed in books, have thought Jeremiah Ferrier to be the author of the State-Catholique (35). I would not stick to do it, did not I know that Mr Baillet (36) ascribes this work to John Sirmond (37), who was one of those writers, whom cardinal Richelieu employed to answer the libels that came out by shoals against him in the Spanish Netherlands. John Sirmond was used to give himself a false name in the pieces which he published against these libels; but it would be very odd, had he taken upon him the name of a living author, and so well known as Mr Jeremiah Ferrier was: besides, Mr Pellisson (38), who mentions many anonymous or pseudonymous pieces of this writer, doth not ascribe the State-Catholique to him, which is one of the best pieces in Mr Chatelet's collection. Notwithstanding all these reasons, I will not decide it, till I have seen what proofs Mr Baillet will alledge to maintain his opinion.

(31) It was afterwards inserted in the collection of several pieces useful to history.

(32) French Mercury, Tom. XII, pag. 499.

[L] The Protestants have given a very bad character of Jeremiah Ferrier. He himself tells us that he suffered two violent persecutions; one before he was a Catholic, and the other after (39). The first when he was stoned, and had his house sacked, &c. and the second was a shower of invectives that were published against him (40). He was accused of having been the king's pensioner, a traitor to the churches, and of having sown dissension in the assemblies, and disputes among the nobility; of designing to stay at Nismes, to ruin all the churches; of having been gratified by their majesties for secret services, and secured several ways to ruin and exterminate the churches; of being an atheist, and of having maintained many execrable propositions against the mystery of the incarnation; and of having deserved to be cast out of the synagogue as a son of Belial. See in the history of the edict of Nantes, at the 124th page of the second tome, the substance of the accusations against Ferrier; and here is what is found concerning him, page 395, of the first volume of the same history. 'He confounded every thing in the political assemblies where he was present, which obliged the synods to forbid him to appear there. He created to himself some trouble in his church and province, which occasioned his expulsion from thence; and being weary of being a minister, he got a place of councillor of the presidial of Nismes, though he had promised at Paris to continue somewhere else the exercise of his function. He was afterwards deposed as a defector. At last he turned Papist, and died some few years after (41), as hated by the people as he had been beloved in his youth. He was selfish, deceitful, ambitious, fickle, turbulent, void of judgment, and unfit for those intrigues wherein he had the imprudence to engage. But he was pretty bold, of quick parts, of a fiery temper, and a fluent tongue, having an imperious tone, and vehemence of action and discourse; which imposed on his hearers, and did not allow them the liberty of contradicting him. Wherefore the multitude,

(41) I have already said, above, against Moreri, that he lived thirteen years after his abjurations. The author, whom I quote, hath acknowledged it in his second Tome, pag. 125. Ferrier lived yet a great while, says he, after the Commission of Nismes.

VOL. III.

Cardinal du Perron has said a very invidious thing of the excuses which he pretended the Protestants made for the commotion at Nismes [M].

How apt hot-headed men are to judge rashly.

tude, which is easily dazzled by these qualities, was always for him: and he often carried it, even in synods, against Chauve his competitor. This Chauve had a great deal more integrity and judgment, and especially an agreeable gravity; which made him very considerable in the assemblies. But the heat of the one did prevail over the moderation of the other; and Ferrier's vivacity obscured Chauve's solidity. I have no reason to doubt of the truth of this character. But I will say in general, without making any application, that it is easy at some certain times to pass for a false brother, though one be not so. It is enough to have other notions of things, than some men of a hot temper, and of a great and contagious imagination. These men have but little knowledge of others, or even of themselves. For the most part, they imagine that they act for the advancement of religion, when they are only acted by heat and pride. Their temper makes them averse to all counsels of moderation and patience; nothing pleases them but vigorous proceedings, and which they think fit to preserve the credit and worldly interest of the party: and this they call a zeal for God's cause. But this is no great matter; for they sometimes unaccountably injure their neighbour; they believe that he cannot be of another opinion than theirs, but out of treachery. However, there are some cases wherein a man may be fully convinced, that even for temporal interest we ought not to be so stiff. But what do these fiery men? They earnestly strive to get moderate men suspected; and then those, who will not be suspected, give way to the greater number; and those, who continue to oppose them, run the risk to draw upon themselves all the mischiefs of the compelle exire. Thus two or three powerful men, in a pretty numerous assembly, are enough to obtain a decree. It is only terrifying those that are of a quiet disposition, that they will be made odious to the party, and suspected of a base prevarication. What would not one do to avoid a thing which renders his pains and parts useless?

As this reflexion may displease some persons, I will strengthen it with the opinion of a very zealous writer. He acknowledges, that there have been some very honest men, who loved their religion, and thought it purely evangelical, who nevertheless made no scruple to receive pensions, because they looked upon them rather as rewards for their affection for the public tranquillity, than as a tie to engage them to attempt any thing to the prejudice of their churches. To tell the truth, continues he, in those places, where the people, who were hot and overhasty, might easily be engaged in rash and seditious attempts, it was requisite that the ministers should be discreet and moderate, that by their discourses and examples they might beget in their flocks a peaceable disposition; but it had been better to have done it for the reasonableness of the thing, without taking the gratifications of the court, than to receive these suspected rewards, which might call in question their innocence and integrity. Du Moulin hath several times been tempted by the court emissaries, who offered him a very large pension, without requiring any thing else of him but to engage his people to peace and obedience. He always protested, that it was a duty that he would discharge as long as he lived; but that he would have the honour to do it of himself, and for conscience sake, and not as if he was hired to do it: so that he would not accept of any thing that was offered him. It had been glorious, if all those, who were exposed to the same temptation, had repelled it with as much courage (42). Nothing can be said more judicious and reasonable. Du Moulin's behaviour ought to have been a pattern for all his brethren: none of them should have received a reward for what they did pursuant to their duty. But let the thing be how it will, we see here the condemnation of those rash persons, who, carried away by the impetuosity of their temper, were always ready to disgrace all those who preached patience, as false brethren, traitors, and prevaricators. The author acknowledges, that some very honest men were pensioners to the court of France, without any design to do any thing to the prejudice of the churches, and without proposing any thing else to themselves but receiving a gratification, which they believed due to the care which they took to oppose warlike spirits: but he hath indeed more reason to acknowledge, that those, who preached patience gratis, might be honest men. As for the missionaries, who upon account of these pensions would maliciously and odiously say, that the religious wars had put the French monarchy in the same condition whence Lewis XI had rescued it (43), they deserve no notice. Henry IV, and Lewis XIII, had no need to buy any mediators of peace between them and their protestant subjects, in order to avoid religious wars. Had they observed the edict, it had not cost them one farthing to maintain the public tranquillity. Mr Jurieu will, I hope, forgive me, if I do not acquiesce in his concession, that the Huguenots, in Lewis the thirteenth's time, undermined the supreme authority. Cardinal Richelieu, says he (44), took from them their towns of security, but it was rather out of policy, than a zeal for religion. He saw that it was a state within a state, and that these cities were only harbours for rebels and malecontents.

[M.] Cardinal du Perron said a very invidious thing upon the excuses concerning the commotion at Nismes. The Protestants have writ a book to palliate their outrages against Ferrier, and make use of some places of the fathers, and among the rest of St Bernard, to prove that they were in the right to use him so, since he was excommunicated; and that a judge excommunicated was suspended from his office. Afterwards he says in jest, St Bernard speaks of excommunication as he ought to do, but St Bernard said mass every day; they will make use of our laws when they think it for their turn, otherwise they will not regard them, which is an unjust proceeding; did they believe themselves strong enough, and by excommunication think that they could be masters of the realm, and dispossess the king, I cannot tell what they would not do (45). Here is an instance of the injustice commonly done to those sects which are tolerated: their affection to the government is suspected, and they are looked upon as a sort of people that would alter the constitution, if it was in their power, and who only condemn the furious maxims of persecution, and the power of excommunication, whilst they cannot use them at their pleasure.

FERRIER (JOHN) a French Jesuit, born at Rouergue, succeeded father Annat in the post of confessor to the king of France in 1670. He was born in the year 1614, and became a Jesuit in 1632. He taught philosophy four years, divinity twelve years, and ethics two years. He had been Rector of the college of Thoulouse, and had behaved himself well in that employment (a). Without doubt he passed among the Jesuits for a considerable person, since they appointed him to supply the place of confessor to his majesty. It was thought by many that he was much fitter for business and intrigues than father Annat. He died in the house of his order at Paris the twenty ninth of October 1674 (b). ality of the soul, in 1668, and another concerning the beauty of Jesus Christ, in the year 1657. But these two books are wrongfully ascribed to him: they should be attributed to John Ferrier, a Jesuit of Guienne, known to Mr Ballac (2).

FERUS (a) (JOHN) warden of the Franciscans of Mentz, was one of the greatest preachers of the XVIth century. He is author of several commentaries upon the scripture, which shew not only that he was learned, but also that he was not one of those opinionated Monks who will yield nothing, nor will consent to the reforming of any abuses. There are few writers of the Romish communion more esteemed by the Protestants than Ferus [A]. The reason of which is, that he wrote with a great deal of moderation upon the controversies that divided Germany in his time, and because in some things he favoured the tenets of the reformers (b) [B]. He was attacked upon this subject by a Spanish Jacobine [C]; but his cause found apologists, even in that country. They could

(a) This is a name latinized. This monk was named Wild, a German word signifying savage. Therefore Moreri speaks of Ferus under the word Sauvage.

[A] There are few writers of the Romish communion more esteemed than Ferus by the Protestants. Bucholter says of him (1). 'Fuit vir doctissimus, ejusque scripta non solum apud Catholicos, sed etiam apud Evangelicos quoddam in summo habentur pretio. — He was a man of great learning, and his writings were held in the highest esteem, not only by the Catholics, but also by some Protestants.' Quenstedt, a Lutheran author, quotes these words without finding fault with them. He also cites another passage which I shall set down for the reader's information. 'Johannes Ferus, alias Wild, Franciscanus, ecclesiastes Moguntinus, vir doctus & eloquentia singulari præditus. Scriptis latino & culto sermone piis & eruditissimis, (scilicet annotationes in Pentateuchum, in Job, Ecclesiasten, Threnos, Jonam, Mattheum, Johannem, Acta Apostolorum, Epistolam ad Romanos) in quibus tam veterum, quam recentium expostitorum labores veluti in compendium redegit, telles Sixto Senensis lib. iv. Bibl. S. (2). — John Ferus, or Wild, a Franciscan, an ecclesiastic of Mentz, a man of great learning, and uncommon eloquence, wrote, in pure and elegant Latin, his pious and elaborate lucubrations, viz. Annotations on the Pentateuch, Job, Ecclesiastes, the Lamentations, Jonah, St Matthew, John, the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistle to the Romans, wherein he has given us an ingenious compendium of the labours both of ancient and modern expostitors, as Sixtus Senensis shews in the fourth book of his Bibliotheca sacra.' It must not be thought that Quenstedt has given an exact list of all Ferus's works. They consist of several other books. Consult the Oxford catalogue, and Mr Teissier, at page 85 of the first volume of additions to the dologies taken from Thuanus.

quote after him. 'How many things are there which were instituted by the saints with a good intention, which we now see changed partly into abuses, and partly into superstition? As for instance, saints days, ceremonies, images, the mass, monasteries, &c. none of which were instituted as they are held now: a-days. And nevertheless our Gideons are silent; they do not remove the abuse, or reform the superstition.' He says in another place (6) that this copy would have in their libraries a good edition of Ferus's commentary upon St John, ought to get that of Leu- vain 1559, which is preferable to all others: for besides that it is in folio, it has the epistle dedicatory of that pious and eloquent Franciscan to Sebastian, archbishop of Mentz, which the other editions have not. In that epistle Ferus ingenuously confesses, that he has made use in some places of the commentaries of Brentius, and Oecolampadius, Protestants; but, he adds, Ea tantum transuli quæ bona, Ecclesiasticæque doctrinæ consona videbantur, & quæ viri illi non in schismate, sed in Catholica Ecclesia didicerant. — I only (says he), took from them the things that were good, and seemed agreeable to the doctrine of the church, and which those men had learned, not in their schism, but in the Catholic church.

(6) Bibl. Choiseul, pag. 78.

[B] In certain things he favoured the tenets of the reformers. They designed to shew the corruption of mankind, and the necessity of having recourse to the divine mercy, without relying on good works. Their forms of prayer are full of this spirit; and this is so little consistent with the maxims of the Romish church, that the French missionaries have a hundred and a hundred times cavilled at the protestant ritual on this account. But in answer to this Mr Drelincourt, among other things, shewed them (3) that John Ferus had composed prayers full of the sentiments they condemned. There are innumerable quotations out of this Franciscan in the books of that minister. Mr Colomies (4) cites a passage of Ferus (5) which I shall pology was condemned by the congregation of the index (10), and the author was obliged to give an account of his faith. 'Aliquando quod Joannem Ferum suæ sectæ Franciscanæ sodalem ab impetu Dominici Soti apologetico libro defendisset, causam religionis dixit, in qua tamen suam innocentiam probavit (11). — Having wrote a defence of John Ferus, a brother of the Franciscan order, in answer to Dominicus à Soto, he was obliged to give an account of his faith, wherein however he proved his innocence.' From whence we may conclude that Ferus's orthodoxy was a point much doubted of by the inquisitors, to say no worse of it.

[C] He was attacked . . . by a Spanish Jacobine. The famous Dominicus à Soto published a book (7) which he called, Annotationes in commentarios Joannis Feri Moguntinensis super evangelium Joannis, and dedicated it to Ferdinand Valdes inquisitor general. He charges Ferus with having taught Lutheranism in sixty seven places of his commentary upon St John. If Ferus did not defend himself, it was not for the reason which Nicholas Antonio insinuates (8): it was because he was dead, and not because that he either in his conscience knew the charge to be true, or would pretend not to know what Soto had published. But he found an advocate in the very same country where he was attacked. Michael Medina, a learned monk of the order of St Francis, published a book intitled (9), Apologia Joannis Feri in qua septem & sexaginta loca commentariorum in Joannem, quæ antea Dominicus Soto Segovienfis Lutherana traduxerat, ex sancta scriptura, sanctorumque doctrina, restituantur. — A defence of John Ferus, wherein the sixty seven passages in his commentaries on St John, which have been reflected upon by Dominicus à Soto, as favouring Lutheranism, are explained and vindicated from the holy scriptures and doctrine of the Apostles. This apolo-

[D] They supposed that the heretics had added to his writings many things which were not in the original. The same Medina, assisted by some others, retrenched what they thought proper from Ferus's commentary upon St Matthew's gospel, and reprinted it at Complutum in 1562. He supposed that the places which were suppressed had crept into that work by the artifice of the sectaries, after the author's death. 'Purgavit etiam, ne id ignoret, lector, Michael noster ejusdem Feri sermones, seu commentaria in Matthæum, quæ inedita ab eo relicta hæreticorum inter manus tabis quidquam contraxerant: quod & agnovit Sixtus Senensis lib. vi. Operas autem cum Medina Rodericus Vadillus Benedictinus, & Petrus Carolus Prior Uclesiensis Ordinis Sancti Jacobi restituendi his mancipaverunt, Complutique edi correctiora curaverunt anno 1562, in 4to. — The reader ought likewise to be informed that our own countryman, Michael Medina, lopped off several surreptitious branches from Ferus's discourses or commentaries on St Matthew, which being left by him unpublished had been corrupted by heretics, as Sixtus Senensis has acknowledged. In the execution of this work, Medina was assisted by Rodericus Vadillus, a Benedictine, and Peter Charles, prior of Uclesia, of the order of St James, who caused a more correct edition to be published at Complutum, in the year 1562, in 4to.' The Oxford catalogue makes mention, 1. of Ferus's commentary upon the gospel of St John, and upon the first epistle of the same Apostle; that commentary, I say, corrected by Michael Medina, and printed at Complutum (12): 2. of an English book (13) wherein complaint is made that those of the Romish church falsify authors; and for an instance they give the commentary of Ferus upon the first epistle of St John.

[E] He was almost an Anabaptist . . . with respect to going to war. This I have read in Grotius, in the place wherein he observes that a great number of good men, considering the barbarities that are committed in war, have been of opinion that a christian ought never to lift himself a soldier. 'Cujus immanitatis conspectu multi homines minime mali eo venerunt, ut Christiano, cujus disciplina in omnibus hominibus diligenter præcipue consistit, omnia arma interdicere: ad quos accedere interdum videntur & Joannes Ferus & Erasmus nostras (14), viri pacis & ecclesiasticæ & civilis amantissimi (15). — In regard to the enormities which are incident to war, many valuable men have proceeded so far as to pronounce all war repugnant to the distinguishing principle of christianity, namely, universal benevolence, of which number we sometimes find Ferus, and our countryman Erasmus, men who pay the greatest regard to peace both civil and ecclesiastical.' (16)

[F] Salmeron has been his plagiarist. At least he is charged with this by John Gerhard a famous Lutheran doctor. 'Salmeron, says he (16), ex fontibus Feri areolas suas ita irrigavit, ut pagellas integras in commentarios suos ex eo transtulerit. — Salmeron, says he, has so far made free with the treasures of Ferus to enrich his little flock, as to transfer whole pages from him into his commentaries.' I wonder Thomassius makes no mention of it; but another collector of plagiarisms (17) has not omitted this.

FEUARDENT (FRANCIS) a famous Franciscan, was born at Coutance in lower Normandy (a) in the year 1541 (b), and might have inherited a great estate if he had not preferred a Monk's habit to the sword (c). He took the Franciscan habit in the monastery of Baieux (d), and obtained infinitely more fame in that dress than he would have done in that of a cavalier. He became doctor of the Sorbonne, preacher, and controversialist. His temper was so agreeable to his name [A], that never was the old maxim, Conveniunt rebus nomina sæpe suis. — Oft does the name the thing exactly fit, more true than in his person. He was one of the most furious adversaries, and cruellest persecutors the Protestants ever had to deal with, if we only reckon churchmen. And yet he boasts of having been ill used by the heretics [B]. He wrote commentaries upon some books of the scripture, and translated into French some works of the fathers. He published an edition of Irenæus with notes [C], and some books of controversy in which the

[A] His temper was agreeable to his name. Mr Daillé makes this remark. 'Feuardentius, says he (1), homo nomine suo dignissimus, quem cæci irarum, odiorum ac furiarum ignes sic exagitabant ut raro apud se esset. — Feuardent (a raging fire) a man whose morals perfectly answered his name, was so transported with passion, malice, and fury, that he was seldom master of himself.' I have always very much wondered that families, who have an odious or ridiculous name, do not quit it (2). Why, for instance, do they not leave that burlesque, or savage name, of Feuwardent? One might instance a hundred more.

[B] He boasted of having been ill used by the heretics. If one will believe him (3), one day he received a box on the ear; he was often abused in the streets, accused before the magistrates, and sued for his life. They stole from him the horse he made use of in his old age, to go from place to place and preach the gospel. One of his brothers received a shot from a gun. He forgot not what his brother monks suffered: but he ought also to tell what they made others suffer. But this is the constant fraud of these passionate people. They tire the patience of all mankind, and at last they meet with impatient enemies who handle them severely. Have they not upon this the face to complain of ill treatment? Do they not make catalogues of the hardships they have endured, and pass over in silence the injuries they had before committed? thus Mr Moreri has been deceived in favour of this person. 'Perkuis, Cocus, River, and some other Calvinists, says he (4), exclaim against father Francis Feuwardent in an unchristian manner: but these authors are not commonly consulted by honest men.' Did that Franciscan treat the ministers in a christian manner? Let any one answer for Mr Moreri.

[C] He published an edition of Irenæus with notes. Mr du Pin has made the following judgment of it (5). 'At last Feuwardent, a Franciscan doctor of divinity of the faculty of Paris, a learned man for his time, set himself about this work, and printed at Paris, by Nivelles, in the years 1575 and 1576, the five books of Irenæus, revised and corrected in many places from an ancient manuscript, and enlarged with five whole chapters which were found in his manuscript, at the end of the fifth book. He has added annotations to the end of each chapter, which he thought necessary for the understanding of the Catholics themselves confess he has been too virulent [D]. The Jesuits have had reason to complain of his proceedings towards Suarés [E]. I forgot to observe that he was one of the most seditious preachers who taught in Paris Buchanan's principles against Henry III, and Henry IV (e). He did not even spare the head of the League himself, when he thought him the author of something which might prejudice the interest * of his author. They are for the most part useful and learned, but some of them exceed the bounds of a commentator, who ought not to aim at being thought learned, or treat of matters of controversy, but merely to explain his author. Feuardent's second edition, printed at Colagn, in 1596, and afterwards in 1630, and at Paris in 1639, is better than the first, because it contains the Greek passages of Irenæus, which are found in St Epiphanius, and some other ancient authors. This is very moderate. Father Labbe, exasperated by some hard things which he found a Protestant had published against the edition of Feuardent, is not so reserved. 'Plura nos quoque, says he (6), adversus Centuriatores Magdeburgenses, Nicolaum Gallasum . . . sed præcipue Rivetum bipedum nequissimum, qui pristinæ Apostolorum Patrumque doctrinæ retinentissimos Baronium & Possessinum hæreticos appellare, & de Catholicæ fidei fortissimè vindicæ hæc ausus est effutire, Caveant (7) ab illis editionibus, quas impudentissimus ille Monachus Feuardentius homo projectæ audaciæ & nullius fidei, scdæ in multis corruptis & annotationibus impiis & mendacibus (sic Christianas & Catholicas vocant desperatissimæ causæ infelices patroni) conspurcavit. Verum quid facias homini impudentiam ubique professæ, nec Deum nec homines reverito, κυριωτη και κυριωτα, cui totidem hærent infixæ cordi sagittæ, quot pro veritate Eucharistiæ, hujus oblatione à Christo Domino instituta, libero arbitrio, fide & operibus, principalitate Romanæ ecclesiæ, ac similibus Catholicæ religionis asseritis, ex Irenæi lucubrationibus deprimuntur apertissima testimonio, quæ allegatis aliorum patrum locis firmavit, & discussa Novatorum caligine illustravit Feuardentius, nunquam non à laudatis viris laudandus. — We might, says he, object many other things to the centuriators of Magdeburg, to Nicolaus Gallasus . . . but in a more particular manner to that infamous Rivet, who had the assurance to call Baronius and Possessin, who most religiously maintained the ancient doctrine of the apostles and fathers, heretics, and thus to defame the greatest champion of the Catholic faith. Beware, says he, of those editions which that most impudent monk Feuardent, a fellow of a most prodigal assurance, and no credit, has, in many places, notoriously corrupted, and with impious and lying annotations (for so these wretched patrons of a desperate cause call those which are truly christian and catholic) bespattered. But what is to be done with a person, who seems to pride himself in his impudence, who reveres neither GOD nor man, but shows his teeth, and barks at all, and whose heart is transfixed with as many arrows, as there are convincing testimonies for the truth of the eucharist, it's institution by our Lord CHRIST, free-will, faith, and works, the supremacy of the church of Rome, and such like doctrines of the Catholic religion. which Feuardent has drawn from the labours of Irenæus, confirmed with the authorities of other fathers, illustrated by dispelling those clouds which novelists would spread over them, and must command the admiration of all men of merit.'

[D] He wrote some books of controversy in which the Catholics themselves confess he has been too virulent. Moreri will furnish me with the proofs of this.

Perhaps, says he (8), Father Gautier exaggerates matters in the hundred heresies he charges upon the Calvinists in his chronology, and that they might be reduced to a less number. We may also pass the same judgment upon what is written by Father Francis Feuardent a Franciscan, a doctor of Paris, who has mentioned a thousand four hundred errors of the Calvinists, in the work he calls Theomachia Calvinistica. These are Moreri's words. This book of Feuardent was reprinted at Colagn, in 1629 (9). He has intitled one of his books Les Entre-mangeries Et Guerres ministérielles (10), the most considerable part whereof, in every respect, is what he has pillaged from other authors.

Some days ago I cast my eyes upon his Examination of the Confessions, Prayers, Sacraments and Ca-

techisms of the Calvinists: with the refutation of a minister's answer, wherein they are convicted of six hundred and sixty six contradictions, errors, and blasphemies, contained in them. The second edition revised and enlarged by the author. This book was printed at Paris in 8vo, in 1601. Feuardent's usual fury appears in this book, and in some places (11) he relates in a prophane and impudent manner I know not what stories of ministers wives and Maids. There is no gravity in his stile: it is full of puns and burlesque phrases. An anonymous author answered the first edition of this book. This answer, printed by Nicholas Froit-d'eau, at Rochel (12), was sent to Feuardent at Nantes, towards the end of the year 1599 (13). He observes that it was thought to be the work of Anthony de la Faye (14). Here are his boasts. 'Feuardent, in the best cities and most famous churches of France, Brabant, Flanders, and Lorraine, where he has preached by God's grace, has reclaimed above six hundred souls from thy errors to the true faith and Catholic religion: and has confirmed above a hundred thousand good christians (15).'

[E] The Jesuits had reason to complain of his proceeding with Suarés. The case is this. Feuardent had cited, as a passage of St Cyril, the words of Master Jossé Clichthou, to prove the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin. This Master Jossé, finding St Cyril's work upon the gospel of St John imperfect, supplied the four books that were wanting, and published them with those of St Cyril. There is one place in the supplements which is as clear as noon-day, and perfectly decisive for the immaculate conception. Feuardent cited it with an air of triumph, and attributed it to St Cyril. He was informed of this mistake by Suarés, who observes that the passage ought to be referred to Jossé Clichthou, instead of being ascribed to St Cyril. Feuardent was not at all pleased with this advice: he was so provoked that he collected together all the faults he could find in Suarés, concerning the mistakes in figures, and pretended to convict him of a like error. But those things are by no means the same. To put one figure for another is no great matter. Most commonly it is the fault of the press, which ought not to be charged upon the author; but to ascribe to St Cyril what comes from a man of our own age, and to do this in order to have an unexceptionable man to produce against his adversary in a cause of importance, is no slight mistake in a writer. Theophilus Raynaud determines positively that Feuardent did not do this out of ignorance but with a premeditated design. 'Feuardentius ad lib. 3. S. Irenæi cap. 23. intentus in asserendum nitorem conceptionis prædictæ, allegavit locum pro ea, ipis Solis radiis scriptum, ex lib. 6. S. Cyrilli in Joannem cap. 15. At non esse eum librum S. Cyrilli, sed Clichtovei, qui lacunam quatuor intermediorum librorum in eo Cyrilli opere supplere voluit, in confesso est. Neque id ignorasse Feuardentium, comperta ejus eruditio dubitare non fuit. Sed (ut dixi) serviens causæ quam tractabat, locum ex lucubratione nuper scriptoris, operi S. Cyrilli intexta, meditatio supposituit S. Cyrillo, & tanquam tanti Patris dictum, protulit. Monuit de hoc loco per Feuardentium minis aptè citato, & ad Clichtoveum, non ad S. Cyrillum referendo, Suarez tom. 2, 3. part. d. 3. f. 5. qui eam à Feuardentio gratiam retulit in posteriore editione commentariorum in Irenæum, ut quot quot congerere potuit menda, in numeros typographicos illapsa in Suarés operibus, ad eum similis lapsus insimulandum intorserit. Sed est profectò summa disparitas. Nam autorum allegationes quoad numerum arithmeticum, quo à typographo exhibentur, nullus auctor præstare queat indemnes à multis mendis, in tantarum operarum olicitantia, & emaculatorum indiligentia. At plagulæ Clichtovei prolatio nomine S. Cyrilli, ad conciliandam majorem fidem placito pro quo pugnes, non est erratum, vel mendum typographicum, quod in olicitantes operas, vel in dormitantem emaculatorem possit referri (16). — Feuardent, in his Annotations upon Irenæus, lib. 3. cap. 23. passim nately

'nately labouring to give a gloss to the said notion, quoted a very clear passage to that purpose, from the sixth book of St Cyril, upon the fifteenth chapter of St John. But it is owned on all hands that that book is not St Cyril's, but Clichtboul's, who proposed to supply the deficiency of four intermediate books in the works of St Cyril. Nor will Feuardent's known great reading permit us to call his knowledge of this matter in question. But to serve, as I said, the cause wherein he had engaged, he industriously quotes a passage in a modern writer's works, interwoven with those of St Cyril, and would put it off for the authority of so eminent a father. Suarez took notice of this passage being improperly alledged by Feuardent, as belonging to Clichtboul, and not to St Cyril. Feuardent returned Suarez the favour of this information, in the second edition of his Commentaries on Irenæus, by collecting all the errors which the printers had made in the figures in the works of Suarez, to convict him of an offence of the same nature. But the difference is certainly very wide. For such is the supine negligence of compositors, and the oversight of correctors, that no author can warrant his quotations entirely free from errors in the figures; but the producing a passage of Clichtboul under the name of St Cyril, in order to give the greater credit to the cause in which you are enlisted, is not a slip or error of the press, that ought to be ascribed to a sluggish compositor, or a sleepy corrector.

[F] He did not spare even the head of the League when he thought him the author of something which might prejudice the rebels.] The duke of Nemours, a great leaguer, having made himself unacceptable to the duke of Maienne, his brother by the mother's side; was arrested, and people were persuaded that this was done by the intrigues of the duke of Maienne. Pasquier having related this, adds, 'Feuardent, a Franciscan, one of the most seditious preachers in Paris, did not stick to charge the duke with it in the pulpit. He sent for him with a resolution to punish him, to teach him to govern his tongue. But hearing he was a Savoyard by nation, he excused him immediately as one he saw favoured a prince of Savoy (17)'. Pasquier is mistaken concerning that Franciscan's native country.

FEVRE of Etaples (a) (JAMES) in Latin, Faber Stapulensis, was one of those who began to expel the gross ignorance that prevailed in the university of Paris. He was a very little man and of mean extraction (b); but of great learning and parts. He made himself suspected of Lutheranism, and was forced to give way to the persecutions of certain ignorant and enraged zealots, who gave him no rest (c). He quitted the field to them and retired from Paris to Meaux, where there was a bishop (d), who loved the Sciences and men of true learning. The persecution raised at Meaux by the Franciscans obliged the bishop to be a good Catholic (e). Le Fevre was then forced to retire first to Blois, and from thence into Guienne. Margaret, queen of Navarre, sister to Francis I, honoured him with her protection, so that he enjoyed full liberty at Nerac, even to his death, which happened in 1537 (f). They tell very remarkable particulars of his last moments [A]. The parliament of Paris received an order from Francis I to come to no resolution against le Fevre; but to wait for his majesty's resolution.

[A] They tell some very remarkable circumstances concerning his last moments.] Thomas Hubert, counsellor of the elector Palatine, Frederic II, whom he accompanied in his journey to Spain, wrote an account of that journey, which was printed at Franckfort, in 1624. He relates (1), that the elector, his matter, returning from Spain, passed through France, in 1558, and fell sick at Paris, where Francis I, and the queen of Navarre, often visited him. It was at one of these visits that this prince gave an account in what manner le Fevre of Etaples ended his life. He and some other learned men, with whose conversation the queen was greatly pleased, dined one day with her (2). In the midst of the entertainment, le Fevre fell a weeping, and when the queen asked him the reason of it, he answered that the heinousness of his crimes occasioned that pungent sorrow. That it was not the remembrance of a leud life that afflicted him, since at the age of one hundred and one years (3a) he had been utterly a stranger to women. That with respect to other passions, which precipitate men into vice, he felt his conscience easy enough, but he reckoned it as a very great crime, that, having known the truth and taught it to several persons who had sealed it with their blood, he should have the weakness to keep in a place of security, far from the places where the crowns of martyrdom were distributed. The queen, who was very eloquent, endeavoured to comfort him. He made his will by word of mouth, then laid himself down upon a bed, and some few hours after was found dead there. The queen caused him to be honourably buried in the same tomb she designed for herself: Honorifice tumulari fecit & marmore quod pro se exsindi fecerat contegi voluit. He bequeathed his books to Gerard Roussel, and his other goods to the poor.

It is hard to doubt of this story, and yet hard to believe it. If the fact had been false, would the queen have told it to the elector? If she did not tell it him, would Thomas Hubert have dared to have put it into his history? These are the motives not to doubt of it. But, on the other hand, how can it be thought that a thing of this nature, most glorious to James le Fevre in particular, and to the whole body in general, should be suppressed by all the ministers if it had been true? How comes it to pass that Theodore Beza says nothing of it, neither in his History of the Churches, where he mentions the death of James le Fevre, nor in the particular elogy he has made of that doctor (3), nor in any other place in his books, where he had frequently an opportunity to have told this wonder? Whence comes the silence of Sleidan, the silence of Verheiden, and a million other authors, who ought, if they had had common sense, to have told this particular, if they had any knowledge of it? One cannot answer these difficulties but by supposing this adventure was entirely unknown to them. But this is removing one difficulty by another. The court of the king of Navarre was the scene where this fact happened: several learned men, who dined with the queen, were witnesses to it, the most part of whom were Protestants: by what strange combination were they engaged not to speak of it all their lives? By what fatality should the tongues of a whole court be tied up for more than fifty years, upon so public an accident, and of such a nature? It has been known, that when the good man was dying, he said he left his goods to the poor, and they have not failed to record this circumstance in verse (4). How then should it happen, that the rest, more worthy to be declared, should not have been known also? Add to this, that it is by no means probable that le Fevre lived a whole century; for if he had been one hundred and one years old when he died, he must have been born in the year 1436. He would have been above eighty six years old, solution. That prince was then prisoner: the substance of his letter may be seen in Sleidan [B]. This was probably at the time when the Sorbonne degraded le Fevre from his doctor's degree; but he did not go out of France, as Sleidan affirms. I confess he made a journey to Strasburg; but it was by the queen of Navarre's order, to confer with Bucer about the reformation of the church [C]. His natural moderation left him when he wrote against Erasmus, his old friend [D]. This contest did not turn in his favour.

We have said elsewhere (g), that he was exposed to the clamours of the monks, for having maintained that St Anne was but once married. He was no less opposed in the opinion he advanced, that the woman who was a sinner, of whom St Luke speaks in his seventh chapter, and Mary Magdalen, mentioned in the eighth chapter of the same Evangelist, and Mary, the sister of Lazarus, spoken of in the eleventh chapter of St John, are three different women. This dispute was lately revived [E]. We must not forget that he translated the four gospels into French, and St Paul's epistles into old, when he fled from Meaux, and almost ninety six when Calvin made him a visit at Nerac. Could such a circumstance be forgot? Are they contented to use for such very aged men the term of old age, which Beza, Verheiden, and other writers of that party, make use of, with respect to that doctor? In a word, there is no influence, in these latter ages, that a celebrated man should live above a hundred years, and yet no author, that speaks of him, should take any notice of it.

[B] The substance of that letter may be seen in Sleidan. It is, according to his custom, very elegantly written (5): but he did not know that le Fevre was retired to Nerac (6). Spondanus (7) speaks but in very few words of this doctor, and of his degradation.

[C] He took a journey to Strasburg . . . to confer with Bucer. I learned this particular in the life of Capito. Tanta statim Capitonis & Buceris fama fuit, ut Jacobus Faber Stapulensis, & Gerardus Rufus clam e Gallia profecti, Capitonem & Bucerum audierint, atque de omnibus doctrinæ præcipuis locis cum ipsis differuerint, missi à Margaretha Francisca Regis sorore Navarra regina (8). — Such immediately was the fame of Capito and Bucer, that James Faber of Etaples, and Gerard Rufus, went privately from France to hear them, and held conferences with them upon all the principal points of learning, being sent by Margaret, queen of Navarre, sister to king Francis. Erasmus, who did not know this last circumstance, imagined that le Fevre was at Strasburg as a refugee. Faber Stapulensis Gallia prolongus, says he (9), agit Argenterati, sed mutato nomine quemadmodum Comicus ille senex, Aibentis Chremes erat, in Lemno Silpho. — Faber Stapulensis, who did fly from France, is, says he, at Strasburg, but under a borrowed name, like the old man in the play, At Athens Chremes, in Lemnos Silpho.

In another letter, dated from Basil, the seventeenth of May 1527, he says, that le Fevre had been honourably recalled into France. Hinc honorifice revocatus est in Galliam, cesserat enim metu & est regi charissimus (10). — He was honourably recalled into France, whence he had retired out of fear, and is highly cherished by the king. This is still the consequence of the false supposition, that that doctor had fled towards the Rhine. Every body did not know the true cause of that journey, the secret deputation of the queen of Navarre.

[D] His natural moderation left him when he wrote against Erasmus, his old friend. He was the aggressor, without any other reason than that Erasmus, when he published his notes upon the New Testament, did not adopt all his opinions upon certain passages of scripture (11). He rudely attacked Erasmus, and charged him with advancing impieties (12). Erasmus defended himself; but after having provided for his own honour, he intreated his adversary to continue his friendship to him, assuring him he should always continue to love and esteem him (13). He was not pleased with the complements which were made him upon this victory, and desired his Friends not to alter their opinion of le Fevre on account of this difference. Quæ scribis de nostra ad Fabrum apologia, quamquam scio animo abs te scribi amicissimo, mihi tamen his molestia inerat, vel quod veterem animi dolorem refricant, vel quod tu hac occasione minus aliquanto quam vellem videris tribuere Fabro, viro quo vix in multis milibus reperias vel integriorem vel humaniorem. Hac una in re sui dissimilis fuit, quod amicum imme-rentem tam atrociter impetiit. Quis autem omnibus horis sapuit unquam? Atque utinam mihi liceisset adversario parcere. Nunc duobus crucior nominibus, & quod cum tali amico coactus sim manus conferere, & quod intelligam quosdam de Fabro minus candidè sentire, de quo cupiam omnes quam optime sentire (14). — Though I am convinced that you have wrote to me concerning my answer to Faber proceeds from the sincere respect of a friend, yet to me it was doubly unwelcome, as it revives in my breast an old pain, and as you on this occasion seem to ascribe less than I could wish to Faber, a man who, for his integrity and humanity, has not his equal amongst thousands. In this one instance he has not acted like himself, in attacking, without provocation, a friend with so much violence. But what man was ever always wise? And I wish I might spare my adversary, but I labour under a double anxiety; I am reduced to a necessity to enter the lists with a valuable friend, and find likewise, that some have conceived a less favourable opinion of Faber, of whom I wish that all mankind would conceive the most favourable sentiments. Can any sentiments be more heroic than these? Le Fevre repented of his attack (15), and made no reply.

[E] He maintained that the woman who was a sinner, . . . Mary Magdalen . . . and Mary the sister of Lazarus, are three different women: this dispute was lately revived. When James le Fevre published a book upon this subject about the beginning of the XVIth century, the unlearned and the learned, the populace and the doctors, agreed in saying that Mary, the sister to Martha and Lazarus, did not differ from the woman which was a sinner, mentioned in the 7th chapter of St Luke, nor from her out of whom Jesus Christ cast seven devils. The hymns and office of St Mary Magdalen, in the Roman breviary, are agreeable to this opinion. This did not hinder our le Fevre from combating it. His book was reprinted in 1518 and 1519, by the care of Josse Clichthow, who embraced his opinion, and defended it twice against the attacks of Mark Grandival, canon of St Victor. The book that John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, wrote against le Fevre in defence of the common opinion concerning the unity of those three women, was printed at Paris in 1519. This dispute caused a great deal of heat, both because the least innovations alarmed the Catholics in the beginning of Lutheranism, and because they were but little satisfied of James le Fevre's orthodoxy. But when these personal animosities ceased, they began to relish his sentiment, so that at the end of the XVIth century, and long after, it was looked upon as consistent with reason and faith. It was allowed to be publicly maintained in the Sorbonne, provided a small distinction was added to it, which really destroyed the whole decree in favour of which it was invented. They were obliged to say, that they did not acknowledge a triple woman, which would have been to affirm, what the decree of the Faculty had condemned; but three different women, one of whom was named Magdalen (16). The thing went so far that the most learned men would have been ashamed to have continued in the common opinion, and the correctors of the breviaries of Paris, Orleans, and Vienne, put a distinction between Lazarus's sister, the sinner, and Mary Magdalen. Things being in this state, some doctors took pity of the doctrine they saw forsaken, and which had been led in triumph by what appeared so false, when James le Fevre ventured to swim into latin, with critical notes and a commentary in which he often censures the vulgar translation [F]. He made a like commentary and notes upon the gospels and the epistles of the other apostles. All this served only to increase the ill humour of the Sorbonne against him, and he saw himself also attacked by the formidable Noel Beda. He did not externally separate from the church of Rome, and he disapproved in certain points of the too warm conduct of those who settled the reformation in Germany [G]; but in the bottom swim against the stream (17). Father Alexander, who afterwards published the reformation of the office of Paris, after having weighed . . . the authorities and reasons of both parties, has concluded * in favour of the opinion which makes them but one single person. After this, father Lami, priest of the Oratory, not content with having endeavoured to re-establish this opinion in his new Evangelical Concord, which he wrote in Latin in 1689, has published a particular dissertation upon it in a French treatise, by way of letter, printed in 1691. . . . Since which, father Mauduit †, also a priest of the Oratory, and Dom Pezron ‡ . . . have each of them wrote a dissertation in a work they published in French upon the gospel, wherein they defend the common opinion . . . Mr du Hamel † of the Academy of Sciences retains the same opinion. I borrow this from a book printed at Roan, in 1699, by Mr Anquetin, curate of Lyons, under the title of a Dissertation upon St Mary Magdalen, to prove that Mary Magdalen, Mary the sister of Lazarus, and the woman who was a sinner, are three different women. Note, that Erasimus wrote to the bishop of Rochester, that all the world gave him the victory; but that there were some people who were sorry he had treated so severely a person, who had done so much service to the sciences as James le Fevre (18). We find in the same letter of Erasimus, that Stephen Poncher, bishop of Paris, had excited the English bishop to write against that doctor.

[F] He translated the four Gospels into French, and St Paul's Epistles into Latin, with notes . . . in which he censures . . . the vulgar translation.] This French translation was printed with the royal licence, in 1523, by Simon de Colines. The author did not put his name to it; but * we learn from a letter of Erasimus, written to Billibaldus in 1526, that it is James le Fevre's, who was obliged to fly for having published it, as if it had then been a crime at Paris to translate the sacred books into French, on account of the troubles, those new translations caused in Europe. James le Fevre (says Erasimus * in that place) * who had fled for fear, for no other reason but that he had translated the Gospels into French, was recalled to court. Jacobus Faber qui metu profugerat non ob aliud nisi quod verterat Evangelia Gallicè, revocatus est in aulam (19). Mr Simon, from whom I borrow these words, cites several places of this version and gives his judgment of it. What he takes from the life of Capito, compiled by Melchior Adam (20), is not at all proper to confirm what Erasimus says, that James le Fevre fled from Paris on account of his new French translation; for it appears by that passage of Melchior Adam, that this doctor was at Basil, as the deputy of Queen Margaret. See, above, remark [C].

(21) He published in the year 1512 a translation of St Paul's Epistles with a commentary. This first edition is in the king's library written upon a fine vellum. He durst not totally reject the vulgar, which he has inserted intire in his work, setting over against it his new version, where he does not much vary from the ancient: but he has added critical observations to his commentary, intitled, Examinatio nonnullorum circa literam; and it is chiefly in these observations that he has taken the liberty to examine and correct the ancient Latin interpreter. Tho' he shews a great deal of learning in this work, and keeps as far as possible from the barbarisms of the divines of his time, yet he discovers throughout the whole great signs of weakness, both in the interpretation and in the Latin. Erasimus and Stunica have learnedly observed some of his mistakes, having proved by many instances that he was but a half Grammarian, and had but an indifferent knowledge of the Greek tongue. Natalis Bedda, a divine of Paris, censured his divinity as well as that of Erasimus. Lastly, the inquisitors of Rome under Clement VIII have placed his commentary on all the new testament among the * number of prohibited books, till it was revised, and purged of its errors . . . Bedda charged him with many errors, and among others with having wrote, upon the ninth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, that it did not depend upon the will of man to save himself †, posse salvari non est hominis voluntate, potestate, aut operibus. . . . The learned father Taumassin (22) of the Oratory has inferred, in his memoirs concerning grace, this censure of Bedda, adding that the doctrine of that censure was in some measure the doctrine of the faculty of divinity at Paris, since it had approved of that censure. Be that as it will, Bedda presses him warmly upon this head, as if he had denied universal grace . . . (23). I have seen but one edition of his commentary upon the gospels, which did not appear till 1522, having been printed at Meaux at the charge of Simon de Colines . . . (24). He has also wrote upon the canonical epistles. This last work he dedicated to Antony du Prat, chancellor of France, thanking him for the protection he had given to his explication of the gospels; which might induce one to believe that the books of that author did not even at that time please some divines at Paris. . . . He has followed the same method in that last commentary as upon the gospels, only he has placed his corrections in the margin, over against the text, which is more convenient. He observes in a letter written from Meaux in 1525, which is placed in the beginning, that the original Greek of the gospels, and St Paul's epistles is more exact than the old Latin edition: that on the contrary that edition is more exact than the Greek in some places of the canonical epistles. Mr Simon relates several other things to shew the character of that work, and concludes that James le Fevre ought to be ranked among the best commentators of his age. But Erasimus, who wrote at the same time, and was much more polite, lessened his reputation considerably. The works of that Paris divine are now scarcely read, whereas those of Erasimus . . . are still greatly valued (25).

[G] He did not externally separate from the church of Rome, and disapproved of the bad behaviour of those who settled the reformation in Germany.] The second of these two facts is contained in these words of Erasimus: De regno quod scripsi, plebem lingua temperare, magistratum nihil gerere, nisi ex ipsorum sententia, senatu movere, qui à doctrina ipsorum dissentiant; conjicere in carcerem, qui verbo ipsos tegerit, fœderibus sese committere, an non hoc est regnare? Damnavit hoc in illis egregius ille vir Jacobus Faber, quum metu cesserat Galliis, & in Germaniam concesserat (26). — As to what I wrote concerning their effecting a sovereignty, what else can be the meaning of all this! to keep the common people in a state of slavery, and the magistrates in such subjection, as to determine nothing without their approbation, to expel from the senate all those who differ from them in opinion, to imprison those who complain of their behaviour, and to strengthen themselves with alliances? This the great Faber condemned in them, when he left France out of fear, and retired into Germany. For the first particular I shall cite a passage of Florimond de Remond: Le Fevre who took the surname of Etaples, the village of his birth, a poor boy, without friends, lived a long time in the territories of the king of Navarre, raising sundry doubts and scruples in the consciences of those that would hearken to him, yet always appearing a Catholic. I remember to have seen formerly, when the church of Nerac was standing, his tomb with this inscription.

Corpus humo, mentemque Deo, bona cuncta relinquo Pauperibus, Faber hæc dum moreretur, ait.

*His dust to dust, his soul to him that lives,
To the poor the rest, the dying Faber gives.*

* At

bottom he was much a Papist.

At that time no alterations were made in religion, or the church ceremonies. The king and queen of Navarre, though their devotion was observed to be cooled after their intimacy with these fugitives of Meaux, continued to live in the same manner as usual (27).

FEVRET (a). Mr Charles Fevret, son of Mr James Fevret, counsellor of the king in the parliament of Dijon, was born at Semur in Auxois in 1583.

The famous Genebrard, archbishop of Aix and prior of our Lady of Semur, was an intimate friend of James Fevret, whom he calls in his works Patronum rebus omnibus ornatum. He desired of him his son Charles to accompany him in his journey to Rome; but that prelate was found dead in his bed at Semur by his servants, who went to call him up the morning he designed to set out.

Bongars, so well known by men of learning, and by his works, was also the friend of James Fevret. He wrote to him for his son Charles, who went to meet him at Metz in 1602, and accompanied him in his journey to Germany, whither king Henry IV sent him in quality of Resident of France to the Electors and Princes of the Empire.

Charles left him to go and study the Civil-Law at Heidelberg, a famous university of Germany. Godefroy * taught the Civil-Law there at that time. He took a particular care of Charles Fevret, who was recommended to him by a great many persons of quality and merit, lodged him in his house, and made him maintain public theses with applause.

In the year 1607 Charles Fevret returned to Dijon, where he married Anne Brunet de Beaulne, by whom he had nineteen children. They brought up fourteen of them together for eight years. After the death of his wife which happened in 1637, he cut his bed in two and married no more.

He acquired a great reputation at the bar at Dijon, where he pleaded a long time with great eloquence and force, and did several public actions which procured him a general esteem.

He was chosen counsel to the three estates of the province.

In the year 1629, Lewis XIII coming to Dijon to punish the authors of a popular sedition, he was pitched upon to implore his majesty's pardon for the guilty: he spoke for all the several bodies, and made so eloquent a speech, that the king ordered him to print it, and send it to him to Lyons. His majesty pardoned the authors of the tumult, and made Charles Fevret a counsellor in the parliament of Dijon by a new creation; but the execution of the wills of princes often depending upon their ministers, Charles Fevret was given to understand that the king expected he should exercise himself the office of counsellor, which his majesty had bestowed upon him. This he refused, not caring to part with his profession of advocate, which he managed with so much esteem and reputation. He was therefore forced to be contented with the post of the king's counsel, secretary of the court, with a pension of 900 livres, which was granted him gratis.

His frequent deputations to court brought him acquainted with Mr de Marillac, keeper of the seals of France, who honoured him with his friendship.

In the years 1626, and 1627, the king's brother nominated him for his counsel in ordinary in all his affairs, and the prince of Condé made him Intendant of his house and business in Burgundy.

He was continued in the same post by Lewis de Bourbon, his son, prince of Condé, and honoured during the life of those two princes in a particular manner with their favour. He was also nominated by Frederic Casimir, prince palatine of the Rhine, and by his lady Amelia Antwerpia, born princess of Orange, for counsellor and intendant of their affairs in Burgundy.

Charles Fevret had an intimate acquaintance with all the learned Civilians of his time.

The first impression of this learned treatise, intituled de l'Abus & du vrai sujet des Appellations qualifiées de ce nom d'Abus, appeared in 1653. He enlarged it one half, which gave birth to a second edition in 1667, after his decease. The same tract was printed a third time in 1677.

He also made an excellent translation of Pybrac's stanzas into Latin verse, printed at Lyons in 1667, with a commentary under the title De Officiis Vita Humana sive in Pybraci Tetraſtica Commentarius.

Several authors have made honourable mention of him and his works.

His device was, Conscientia virtuti satis amplum Theatrum est.

He died at Dijon in 1661, at the age of seventy seven years, and left two sons counsellors in the parliament of Dijon, and two grandsons, one of which is a counsellor in the same parliament, and the other counsellor in the parliament of Metz.

of Briançon (b), and taught the belles lettres in Montague college, was a kind patron to him, and had him entered in the college of Navarre. The young man went through his classical learning, and a course of philosophy there (c). He carefully studied all that the professors taught him; but was particularly attached to the mathematics, for which he had naturally a strong inclination (d). Nor was he discouraged by the consideration of the contempt those sciences then lay under, or of the necessity he was in of mastering them by himself, and without the assistance of another; but notwithstanding these obstacles he made a very great progress in them (e). He acquired great skill in mechanics, and as he had a head to invent instruments as well as a hand to make them (f) he got much reputation by the first essays of his industry. The first work that made him known was his correcting and publishing the arithmetic of John Martin Siliceus, and the Margareta Philosophica [A]. Afterwards he read private lectures in the mathematics, and then taught that science publicly in the college of Master Gervais (g). He performed it so excellently well, that he was proposed to Francis I, as the fittest person to teach the mathematics in the new college that prince had founded at Paris (h). He forgot nothing that might give credit to his profession, and notwithstanding his constant application to the public lectures, yet he published several books (i) upon almost all the parts of the mathematics. He boasted to have found out the squaring of the circle [B]. What they say concerning this, in his elogy, will furnish matter for a remark. I am very much mistaken if it is not he that is mentioned in Agrippa's letters, as a man that was a long time imprisoned for having foretold some disagreeable things to the court of France [C]; for at that time there were few Astronomers or Geometricians who did not pretend to judicial Astrology. The clock he invented in 1553, the description of which may be seen in the Amsterdam journal of the twenty ninth of March 1694, is a proof his capacity in mechanics; but neither his genius, his labour, his inventions, nor the esteem which an infinite number of persons expressed for him, could secure him from the fate so common to men of letters. He was forced all his life to struggle with grievous poverty [D], and, when he died, left a numerous family loaded with debts. It is true, the remembrance of his merit did for his children what it could not

[A] The first work that made him known was his correcting . . . the Margareta Philosophica. Dr de Launois informs me of this. 'Et primo quidem, says be (1), nomen suum ab edendis corrigendisque aliis rum operibus illustrare fecit. Nam anno 1519 à Navarra sua Joannis Martini Siliceii Hispani Arithmeticae typis commisit, mendisque pluribus expurgavit, & anno 1523 dum adhuc in Navarra cum Antonio Silvestro degeret, Philosophicam Margaretam quæ rationalis ac Moralis Philosophiæ principia duodecim libris complectitur, recognovit & prælo mandari curavit. — He first made his name famous by publishing and correcting the works of other men. For in the year 1519 he published, during his residence in the college of Navarre, the arithmetic of John Martin Siliceus, which he rendered much more correct; and in the year 1523, whilst he still lived in the college of Navarre, with Antony Silvester, he revised and published the Margareta Philosophica, which contains the principles of rational and moral philosophy in twelve books.

[B] He boasted that he had found out the squaring of the circle. Sammarthanus assures us that Orontius Finæus was in the wrong to boast that he had found it out, and that providence had reserved that honour for Joseph Scaliger: 'Cum . . . inter cætera volumina peculiari quodam libro quadraturam illam circuli à multis frustra quaesitam se tandem aliquando reperisse gloriaretur. Hoc enim de se facile credebatur homo summæ doctrinæ sibi conscius, cum tamen verum hujus admirabilis inventi gloriam uni Josepho Scaligero faciliora numina reservarent (2). — He boasted in a particular treatise, that he had at last found the method of squaring the circle which multitudes had so long in vain sought for. This a man, conscious of his own great learning, might easily believe of himself, tho' the true glory of this admirable invention was reserved by the favour of heaven for Joseph Scaliger.' He justly says that Orontius Finæus wrongfully assumed to himself the invention of the quadrature of the circle; but he is strangely mistaken in making Scaliger the only one that discovered this mystery; for this honour was so far from being reserved for Scaliger alone, that it may be affirmed that great man came not so near to it as many others.

[C] I believe that, according to Agrippa, he was a long time imprisoned for having foretold some disagreeable things to the court of France. The words of Agrippa which I shall quote are taken from a letter, wherein he complains of his disgrace, which he attributes to a scheme of a nativity, wherein he found that the constable of Bourbon would be still victorious in the year 1526. The Queen-regent was incensed against the Astrologer on this account, who thereupon said his design was not to prostitute his art to lies, and that he had not timely remembered the fate of a great mathematician. I suppose he means Orontius Finæus. 'Sed & nesciebam me prædario Astrologum conductum, quodque mihi, quod ars illa dicat, monendi dicendique jus relictum non esset, occurrirque exemplis Orontius Parrhius (3) Agrippa, Epist. lib. 16, lib. 3, pag. 831. The letter is dated from Lyons the third of November, 1526.

[D] He was forced to struggle all his life with grievous poverty. He had gone through his studies without receiving those supplies from his family, which are necessary to students: his father was dead, and his relations neglected him (4). It may be easily imagined what straits he was in. Thevet (5) assures us that Orontius Finæus 'had so well freed himself from covetousness, that by philosophizing he satisfied his mind, but he did not fill his purse. I cannot say this was his fault, for he often complained to several lords of the great necessities, he was under, which they took the good man so little notice of, that honest Oronce's estate at his death was only a great load of debts, which, to his sorrow, he left his dear spouse Denise Blanche incumbered with, and five sons and a daughter to provide for. Some orators, philosophers, and learned 314.

men, have been highly valued, whereof some were rich, others threw their riches into the sea, as if they had been only a hindrance to philosophy. The learned Finæus was among none of these (6), unless it be that he was partaking with the last in this, that, after they had thrown away their estates, they found themselves poor, with respect to wealth. Let us add to this what the same Thevet observes in the elogy of Peter Danes. 'I cannot forbear saying that I commiserate the ingratitude and unthankfulness of many self from cardinals, abbots, and other prelates, who have seen, heard, and been informed, of the misery of several poor, but virtuous and learned men, such as were Jodelle, Orontius Finæus, Poissel, Regius, Belle Fosse, and a great many more, who after their death left not enough to bury them; and yet they would not vouchsafe to open their bowels of compassion to offer them one farthing (7).'

not do for himself. Some generous Mæcenæus's were found, who, for his sake, relieved his indigent family [E]. I shall cite an author who charges him with being a plagiarist [F]. According to Moreri he died the sixth of October 1555. The abbot de Brianville, who invented the heraldry cards, and was the author of certain books for the use of the dauphin of France in the reign of Lewis XIV, was of the same country and family with Orontius Finæus (k).

(k) Allard, Bibl. de Dauphin, p. 106.

[E] Mæcenæus's were found, who . . . relieved his indigent family. Let us still hear Thevet. 'He had a great many children, who, tho' without father or estate, yet were not destitute of all assistance; for after his death, several good lords extended their charity to maintain and protect the children of a man they had so much valued during his life. Two of them not only followed the study of the mathematics, but also one of them divinity, and the other the civil-law, and were graduates in their respective faculties (8).'

(8) Ibid., Tom. VII, pag. 310.

Thevet in page 312 speaks of Master John Finæus, doctor of divinity, the son of Orontius: 'I have been assisted, says he, with some memoirs by his son Master John Finæus, doctor of divinity, who, having been informed that I was writing an abridgement of the lives of illustrious men, earnestly desired that his father should be put among them.' In another place he says: 'Although his sons have composed excellent epitaphs, I durst not infer them here, fearing, however exact and true they may be, they should be lessened by this consideration, that they are not sufficient evidences of their father's merit (9).' Dr de Launoi informs me (10) that this John Finæus studied in the college of Navarre, that he taught philosophy some years in the college of Harcourt, that he was made doctor of divinity in 1565, that he was afterwards canon of Meaux, and in the year 1603 was dean of the faculty of divinity.

[F] I shall cite an author that charges him with being a plagiarist. John Baptista Benedictus in the preface of his book of dialling declares, that he has touched upon nothing which others had well explained, and that he has confined himself to that, that he might not appropriate to himself the labours of another, or hinder any body from reading other books. He adds, that all authors are not so scrupulous, and names Munster and Finæus. 'Quis enim Sebastiani Munsteri, & Orontii Phineæ horologiographias legit qui non animadvertit quam multa præter necessitatem de verbo ad verbum in posterioris opere sint translata quæ poterant majori cum utriusque laude apud priorem videnda relinqui, aut potius ab utroque prætermitti, cum alter alterius imprudens calcaverit vestigia, & quandoque eodem errore ambo ducti cœcutescentes in eandem foveam sese præcipites egerint, ut factum est præcipue ubi agunt de descriptione horarii super globo aut spherica superficie convexa (11). — For who that has read Sebastian Munster's, and Orontius Finæus's treatises of Dialling, has not observed what a multitude of things there are unnecessarily inserted word for word in the works of the latter, which might with more honour to both have continued in the former, or rather might have been omitted by both; whilst the one imprudently followed the steps of the other, and both, misled by the same error, blindly fell down the same precipice; and more particularly where they treat of projecting a dial upon a globe, or convex spherical superficies.' Here are two things to be considered: one is a matter of fact, viz. that Finæus's book contains word for word several of Munster's observations, the other is the reasoning of Benedictus. He supposes that if Finæus had not stolen them from Munster, the honour of both of them had been greater. He is right in some respects; but in others his reasoning is false, and upon the whole he ought to have explained himself better. He supposes afterwards that one of them copied the other without knowing it. Therefore he should have said that Munster was a plagiarist of the same authors who were afterwards plagiarized by Finæus: and he ought to have told us who those authors were.

FLACIUS (MATTHIAS). Look for ILLYRICUS.

FLAMINIUS (MARC ANTHONY) was one of the best Latin poets of the XVIth century, and also a good humanist. He was born at Imola in Italy, the son and grandson of learned men (a). See the account of him in Mr Teissier (b), and more at large in Moreri. I shall only observe one thing which they have omitted. The Pope chose him for secretary to the council in 1545 (c); but Flaminius refused that great office, because, finding himself imbued with the new opinions, he would not employ his pen in the service of an assembly that would anathematize them. This is cardinal Palavicini's conjecture. That cardinal, speaking of the honour the Pope designed for Flaminius, has not forgot to criticize Fra-Paolo [A]. He adds, that after that, Flaminius had the happiness to acknowledge his errors by his acquaintance with cardinal Pole, and to write and die a good Catholic. Thuanus was not ignorant, that in some points Flaminius inclined to the party of the reformers. But among other articles he excepts that of the Lord's-Supper, and I do not find that Simler contradicts him in this respect [B]. Longolius has spoken very honourably

(a) See the remark [C].

(b) Elogies, taken from Thuanus, Vol. I, pag. 36, & 39.

(c) See the remark [A].

[A] Cardinal Palavicini . . . speaking of Flaminius, has not forgot to criticize Fra-Paolo. He charges him (1) with falsely giving out that the Pope let his legates know, that it was not necessary to dispatch letters in the name of the council, and that those which he should write himself, or which the legates should write in their own names, would be sufficient. To prove that this is false, cardinal Palavicini observes that the Pope prescribed distinctly to the legates the form of signing, and directing the letters that should be writ in the name of the council. He adds, that it belonged to the secretary of the council, to draw up those letters, and the decrees of the council, and that the Pope designed Marc Antony Flaminius for that employment (2). 'Adunque il papa se propose al consiglio per Segretario Marcantonio Flaminio, chiaro fra gli Scrittori Latini di quell'età, come dimostrano i suoi versi. Ma egli scosso dal peso, forse perche già covava (3) nella mente l'affezione a quelle dottrine in condannazione delle quali gli sarebbe convenuto d'esercitar quivi la penna: avvenne che in fine de gli anni suoi la salutare conversazione del cardinal Polo in Viterbo lo facesse ravvedere, e scri-ver e morir cattolicamente.' But what makes most against father Paul, in this chapter of the cardinal, is, that the fathers of the council complaining that the Pope chose himself the officers of the assembly, he gave them full liberty to chuse their own secretary: upon which they made choice of Angelo Massarelli provisionally (4), and afterwards absolutely (5).

[B] I do not find that Simler contradicts him in this respect. In the manner that Thuanus speaks of Flaminius, he makes him rather a Jesuit, than a Protestant. He says that, among those in Italy who thought that a reformation was necessary, there arose private disputes concerning faith, good works, grace, free-will, election, vocation, and glorification; and that the greatest part of them formed a judgment of these matters very different from the then received opinion, Trent, &c, and fortified themselves with the authority of St Augustine. For this reason, adds Thuanus, Augustine Pro-

pieces taken from the works of that father. Flaminius embraced this opinion, and as to other things he did not follow the doctrines that were dispersed in Germany: he plainly declares in a letter, that with respect to the eucharist, his opinion was the same with that of the church, and he did not leave his country as some others did, with whom he had lived in a strict friendship, on account of religion. Galeazzo Caraccioli marquis of Vico was one of this number (6). Mr Teiffier contradicts this narrative. 'If we believe' Josiah Simler, says he (7), Thuanus was mistaken when he wrote that Flaminius did not approve of the doctrine which Luther taught in Germany; for Simler (8) places Flaminius among those who, having embraced the Protestant religion, forced Peter Martyr Vermilio, who was afterwards minister at Zurich, to follow their example, and renounce the communion of the church of Rome. I have run over Peter Martyr's life in Melchior Adam's volume (9), and I find nothing in it concerning Flaminius; but that Peter Martyr, being superior of a monastery at Naples, came to the knowledge of the truth by reading certain books, and conferring often upon religious points with persons of piety and zeal for the true religion. Martyr chiefly conferred with Marc Anthony Flaminius upon these things. I see nothing in all this contrary to Thuanus's account, and at most Simler would be more to blame than that great historian, since the letter of Flaminius is authentic, and his abode and death in Italy are incontestable matters of fact. I have said it a thousand times: a man might discover a thousand abuses and disorders in the Romish communion, and many excellent truths in Luther's books, without thinking himself necessarily obliged to take a journey into Germany, and without pretending that the Romish church was wrong in all that the Lutherans found fault with (10). Mr Teiffier opposes to Thuanus, Flaminius's epigram upon the death of Saveriola: but that proves nothing; an infinite number of Dominicans who were good Papists would not scruple publicly to put their names to that epigram. The letter inserted in the life of Galeazzo Caraccioli shews a great deal of piety, but there is nothing in it particularly declaring the profession or approbation of Lutheranism.

[C] Longolius has spoken very honourably of Flaminius. Mr Teiffier has quoted the following words of Longolius (11): 'Know that for many ages none has equalled Flaminius for parts, learning, virtue, and probity. Truly I am used to say, speaking of him, that at this day I know no body that has more merit, or who is more unhappy than he.' In other places (12) Longolius expresses a very particular esteem and friendship for Flaminius. Here is a passage which has some relation to that of Mr Teiffier. 'Ego nihil ad Flaminiū scripsi, quod neque scirem ut cum ipso ageretur, neque certi quicquam haberem, ad quod literas meas accommodarem. Quin ingenio, industria, virtute æquales suos omnes longe superaret, plane non dubito: ne fortuna tantæ indolis maligne responderit, etiam atque etiam timeo. Sed tamen velim ut animo maximo sit, optetque semper secunda, cogitet adversa, ferat qualiacunque accide-rint, neque sibi præstandum quicquam præter culpam existimet: à qua sane tam longe abest quam ab ea ætate quæ vel culpam adhuc præstare debeat' (13). — I have never wrote to Flaminius, as being a stranger to his circumstances, and having no particular occurrence on which I might communicate my sentiments. But I question not his having surpassed all his equals in genius, application and virtue, and am much afraid that fortune has but ill rewarded such superior qualifications. I wish however that he would keep up a greatness of soul, and still hope for happier days, and bear with resolution whatever may happen, and not to think he is to answer for more than his faults: from which he is as free, as he is remote from that age which ought to be answerable for them. Flaminius was yet but a young student, and consequently could not be said to be the most unhappy of all men. A man ought to have tried every thing, and still have had an ill fate, before this could be properly said of him. However this passage discovers the unlucky circumstances of Flaminius, a young man under such hardships, that his friends were forced to contribute to his relief, and endeavoured by letters of recommendation to procure him cloaths. 'De Flaminiū quod benigne polliceris, respondes illi omnino, quam de proluxa ista tua atque beneficia in studiosos omnes natura semper habui, opinioni: sed nihil eo quod ostendis etiam nunc est opus. Initia est enim à nobis ratio, quemadmodum hic adolescentem tueamur. In vestiario tantum laboramus: in quo si adjutus à te fuerit, ocium ejus liberalitate tua constitutum esse judicabo' (14). — The generous promises which you made concerning Flaminius, you perfectly answer from that open beneficent nature, with which I have observed you constantly treat all lovers of learning. But there is now no occasion for what you propose, we have contrived a method to maintain the young man amongst us. We want only to equip him with cloaths, wherein if he should meet with assistance from you, he will by your liberality be made easy. By a certain letter he wrote, he made himself an enemy, who, speaking to Longolius, reviled him extremely, and in the same conversation affirmed, that as Flaminius was the son and grandson of a pedant, and a pedant himself, he could find in him neither virtue or wit. 'Erras, inquit, Longoli, erras, si quod te vel ingenii vel virtutis lumen in eo perpexisse putas qui & ipse pædagogus sit, & pædagogus patre avoque natus' (15). — You are mistaken, Longolius, you are strangely mistaken, if you imagine to have discovered in him either abilities or virtue; he is a pedant himself, and such were both his father and grandfather. As to the father of our Flaminius, he is not unknown to me: his name was JOHN ANTHONY FLAMINIUS. He taught polite literature at Bologna for many years (16), and died there in the year 1536, after having published some books (17). Moreri has spoken of him. As to his grandfather, I do not know him, and perhaps he is the same with one SEBASTIAN FLAMINIUS, a native of Imola (18), author of the life of Ambrose of Sienna, a beatified Jacobine.

FLAMMINIUS (ANTHONY) a learned professor of polite literature in the college of Rome about the beginning of the XVIth century, was a Sicilian by birth. He was so fond of solitude, that he took no pleasure in conversing either with the learned or unlearned. He never invited any body to eat with him, nor would accept of any invitation from others. He had neither man nor maid servant. He used to buy every day his provisions at an inn in the neighbourhood; but the landlord, observing that for three days past he had not come for any thing, nor had shewed himself as usual, entered his chamber through the garden window, and found him dead among his books. He studied, lying along upon the ground (a) [A].

[A] He studied lying along upon the ground. This was not the least sign of his fantastical temper. 'Is inopinata præventus morte à capone vicinæ qui quotidianè edulia homini venditabat, contentionem admittans quod jam triduum non apparuisset, & per hortuli fenestellam quandam ingresso inter libros quos stratus, stratus & ipse lectitare consuevit, sempiterno oppressus somno repertus est' (1). He had taught a long time in Rome with profound learning. 'Cujus prælectionibus Roma longa annorum serie nihil habuit eruditius' (2).

FLAVIGNY

FLAVIGNY (VALERIAN DE) doctor of divinity of the house and society of the Sorbonne, counsellor and king's professor of the Hebrew tongue in the university of Paris, and dean of the king's professors in the royal college of France (a). Add to what has been said of him in Moreri, and elsewhere (b), that he had a great dispute with some divines of the faculty of Paris, for having proved the Thesis which Lewis de Cleves, bachelor in divinity, had maintained concerning episcopacy in his public act, the fourth of November 1667. Complaint was made of two propositions in this Thesis [A], and they hindered that bachelor, 'who had gone through his licentiate's degree, who had been presented to the chancellor of the church and university of Paris by the faculty of divinity, who had been harangued and assigned, by the said chancellor, to the place, rank, and apostolical benediction of the degrees, the third of February last, as well as others of the same degree, from receiving the said benediction, which is a reward for study, and a proof of capacity (c).' Flavigny advised him, merely for the sake of peace, and to avoid the scandal which might arise from such a dissention, to sign the declaration and explication of the said two propositions which were required of him [B]. And he compiled a long apology, which was printed at Tournay in 1668, under the title of Ad Thesim Clevesianam ubi de Episcopatu expectata Vindicia. It is a quarto of 128 pages, wherein he cites an infinite number of authors who have advanced the same doctrine with Lewis de Cleves, viz. that episcopacy, as distinct from the priesthood, is no sacrament. Some letters were prefixed to this apology, in one of which it is said, that Valerian de Flavigny, Presbyter Laudunensis, had been reader of the Sorbonne for forty years.

(a) These are his titles in an instrument by a Public Notary, signed by him the thirteenth of August, 1668, and which is printed before the Vindicia ad Thesim Clevesianam.

(b) In the remark [F] of the article ECHELLENSIS.

(c) See the same act.

[A] Complaint was made of two propositions in that thesis. The first proposition was, 'Presbyteratum ea vestiri ratione sacramenti certum: Episcopatum ea decorari quicunque negat, probabiliorum tenet sententiam. II. Ad Episcopatum praevisue Presbyteratus? Aliquando negatum videtur. — I. That priesthood is a sacrament, is certain; that episcopacy is not, is probable. II. Whether priesthood be previous to episcopacy? It appears to have been sometimes denied.'

[B] Flavigny advised de Cleves to sign the declaration, and explication . . . they required of him.] This clause is added to the act from whence I take these words, 'referring to himself the liberty to say, and cause to be registered in the office of the said faculty in the assembly of the first of March following, that the said explanation should be no prejudice to the probability or seeming truth of the doctrine contained in them; as also to remonstrate, &c. The declaration they extorted from that bachelor was this: 'Non intendo negare absolute episcopatum esse sacramentum; imò agnosco in collatione episcopatus dari gratiam sanctificantem. Ad secundam propositionem. Cum dixi, Aliquando negatum videri presbyteratum praevisum esse debere ad episcopatum, non intendo, episcopatum conferri posse per saltum; imò existimo non posse episcopatum consecrari, nisi sit presbyter. — I do not intend to deny absolutely that episcopacy is a sacrament, nay, I acknowledge that a sanctifying grace is conveyed to the person inaugurated. As to the second proposition. When I said, that it appears to have been denied that priesthood ought to be previous to episcopacy, I did not mean, that episcopacy could be conferred all at once; nay I think that no bishop can be consecrated unless he be a priest.'

FLORA, if we believe Lactantius, was a courtesan [A], who, having got large sums of money by prostituting herself, made the Roman people her heirs, and ordered that the income of a certain fund, which she specified, should be employed in celebrating her birth-day. She would have that day remarkable by the games that were to be exhibited to the people, and were to be named Floral. They were celebrated in a very scandalous manner [B], and were in some sort the courtezans' feast

[A] If we believe Lactantius, she was a courtesan.] Reproaching the Pagans with the enormous abuses of their deification, he says: 'Jam quanta ista immortalitas putanda sit, quam etiam meretrices assequantur? Flora (cum magnas opes ex arte meretricia quaesivisset) populum scripsit haeredem, certamque pecuniam reliquit, cujus ex annuo fœnore suus natalis dies celebraretur editione ludorum, quos appellant Floralia (1). — How great then must that immortality be imagined, which the leudest women have obtained? Flora, having raised an immense fortune by her leud arts, left the people her heir, and set apart a certain sum, out of the yearly produce of which her birth-day might be solemnized with public games, which they call Floralia.' Neither Arnobius (2), nor St Augustin (3), say any thing like this of Flora, though they reproach the heathens with the impurities of the Floral games: but she is treated as a courtesan in the dialogue of Minutius Felix (4). No doubt St Augustin was sensible this story of Lactantius was without foundation. I have read in the scholiast upon Juvenal (5), that the Floral games were instituted in honour of the goddess Flora, by Flora the courtesan. This makes nothing for Lactantius. We shall see in the following article, that there was a famous prostitute named Flora; but it is not true that she was the founder of those games. The scholiast upon Juvenal is mistaken, and at most he does not say, as Lactantius, that Flora the courtesan founded the Floral games for herself.

[B] The Floral games . . . were celebrated in a very scandalous manner.] Here Lactantius is in the right. 'Celebrantur ergo illi ludi cum omni lascivia convenientes memoriae meretricis. Nam præter verborum licentiam, quibus obscenitas omnis effunditur, exuntur etiam vestibis populo flagitante Meretrices, quæ tunc mimorum funguntur officio, & in conspectu populi usque ad satietatem impudicorum luminum cum pudendis motibus detinentur (6). — These games are therefore celebrated with all the leudness imaginable, and in a manner that perfectly answers the memory of a prostitute. For besides the extravagant licence whereby obscene talking is encouraged, the courtezans, at the instance of the people, are stripped naked, and play their monkey gambols in the sight of the people, till the eyes of the most abandoned spectators are tired with their abominable behaviour.' St Augustin thunders, as he ought to do, in divers places, against this impudence. I shall only relate the following passage (7): 'Horum planè florum non terra fertilis, non aliqua opulens virtus; sed illa dea Flora digna mater inventa est, cujus ludi scenici tam effusore & licentiore turpitudine celebrantur, ut quis intelligat, quale dæmonium sit, quod placari aliter non potest; nisi illic, non aves, non quadrupedes, non denique sanguis humanus; sed multo sceleratius pudor humanus tanquam immolatus intereat. — Of these flowers neither is the earth productive, nor any fertile virtue; but Flora, the goddess of Flora, must be made the worthy parent of them, whose games feast [C]. Lactantius adds, that the senate found a way to hide from the public the original of so infamous an institution [D]; but, taking the advantage of the courtesan's name, they made them believe that Flora was the goddess presiding over flowers; and that, in order to have a good harvest, it was necessary to honour that goddess every year, and render her propitious to them. It may be questioned whether Lactantius affirmed that upon good authority; for since the worship of Flora was instituted in Rome by Tatius, king of the Sabins (a), and colleague with Romulus, that goddess must have been worshipped by the Sabins before the building of Rome: therefore it was not a courtesan who had chosen the Roman people for her heirs. They did not begin to celebrate the Floral games till the year of Rome 513 [E]. The way of paying the charges of them is a new proof against

' games are celebrated with such profligate licence and
' obscenity, that any one may understand, what demon
' it is that cannot be otherwise appeased. There no
' birds, no beasts, nor even human blood, but human ' modesty is butchered, and most impiously sacrificed.'

Pagan authors do not deny that naked women appeared before all the people at the Floral games, and they say that once Cato assisting at those games, and perceiving that his presence hindered the people from demanding those naked spectacles as usual, retired that he might not interrupt the feast: the people, at the sight of this condescension, followed him with repeated acclamations, and afterwards they did according to custom.

' timate friend who sat by him, he left the theatre, lest
' his presence might be a hindrance to the usual spectacle.
' The people followed him with loud acclamations, and ' then proceeded according to custom, declaring they had ' a greater regard for the majesty of that one man, than ' for that of the whole assembly.' Martial justly laughs at this behaviour of Cato. Why did he go to those games, since he knew what was practised there? Did he go there only to go out again? This is what the poet re-proaches him with. But he forgot the most material part, which is, that Cato ought not to have withdrawn, since he observed that his presence was so necessary to correct an ill custom.

[C] They were . . . the courtesans' feast.] Though this is clear enough from the passages I have cited in the preceding remark, yet I shall add the following verses out of Ovid:

Turba quidem cur hos celebrent meretricia ludos,
Non ex difficili causâ pendenda subest.
Non est de tetricis, non est de magna professus, Vult sua plebeio sacra patere choro.
Et monet ætatis specie, dum floreant, uti, Contemni spinam cum cecidere rosæ (11).

(11) Ovid.
Fastor. lib. v,
ver. 349.

But why should Flora chuse that motley train
Her sacred scenes to tread? the reason's plain.

No stiffness she, no rigid rules admires,

But calls her vot'ries to plebeian choirs.

Their charms she bids them use, e'er they decay:

The rose once fall'n, the stalk is cast away.

Fine morality this! The goddess Flora would have courtesans celebrate her festival, because it is fit to let women know they are to make the most of their beauty while it is in the bloom; for if they suffer their prime to slip away, they will be despised like a rose which has nothing left but its thorns: but how abominable forever this morality is, it is publicly taught among christians in assemblies that are honoured with the protection of the supreme power (12).

[D] The senate found a way to hide from the public the knowledge of so infamous an institution.] I shall cite Lactantius's words (13): ' Quod quia Senatui fla-' gitiolum videbatur, ab ipso nomine argumentum su-
' mi placuit, ut pudendæ rei quædam dignitas addere-
' tur. Deam finxerunt esse, quæ floribus præsit, eam' que oportere placari, ut fruges cum arboribus, aut vi-
' tibus bene, prospereque florescerent. Eum colorem
' secutus in Fastis poeta non ignobilem Nympham fuisse
' narravit, quæ sit Chloris vocitata, eamque Zephyro
' nuptam quasi dotis loco id accepisse muneris à mari-
' to, ut haberet omnium florum potestatem. — And ' because it seemed shameful to the senate, to give an ' appearance of dignity to that infamous practice, they ' took advantage of the name, and pretended she was ' goddess of flowers, that she ought to be appeased, that ' the fruits, trees, and vines, might flourish and pro' sper. The poet, following this fiction in his Fasti, says
' she was a celebrated nymph, named Chloris, who mar' ried Zephyrus, by whom she was presented with a ' sovereign power over all flowers.'

[E] They did not begin to celebrate the Floral games till the year of Rome 513.] This is Vossius's opinion (14): Pliny, corrected by father Hardouin, confirms the same. Before that Jesuit's edition, we read in Pliny,

' Floralia quarto Kalendas ejusdem (Maii) instituerunt
' urbis anno DXVI. ex oraculis Sibyllæ, ut omnia be' ne deflorescerent (15). — The Floral games were ' instituted by direction of the Sibylline oracles, the ' twenty eighth of April in the year of Rome 516, that ' all things might flourish and prosper.' But father

Hardouin, either by the help of manuscripts, or for chronological reasons, hath restored in this passage the year 514 (16). The following place in Velleius Paterculus was very serviceable to him: ' Proximo ' anno Torquato Sempronioque Coss. Brundisium (co' lonis occupatum) & post triennium Spoletium: quo
' anno Floraliū ludorum factum est initium (17).
' — The next year, Torquatus and Sempronius being ' consuls, a colony was sent to Brundisium; and three ' years after another to Spoletium, in which year the Flo' ral games were instituted.' According to Titus Livius and Pliny's chronology, the consulship of Torquatus and Sempronius falls out in the year of Rome 510. ' In' cidit prior ille consulatus in annum Urbis DX. ex
' Liviana Plinianaque Chronologia, quo fit ut triennio
' interjecto Floraliū celebritas ludorum incurrat in ' annum DXIV (18). — The first consulate was ' in the year of the city 510, as appears from the chro-' nology of Livy and Pliny: whence it follows, that the ' institution of the Floral games, which happened three ' years after, falls upon the year 514.' Since therefore the Floral games began three years after, the beginning of them must be placed in the year 513. Father Hardouin chuses rather to put it to the year 514, because no doubt he imagines there were three whole years from the end of that consulship to the founding of the colony of Spoletium. According to this account, it would be true that the Floral games began

Lactantius [F]. From that time to the year 580 they were not annually celebrated, but only in case the intemperance of the seasons required it, or the books of the Sybils appointed it (b). This is another proof against Lactantius. At last, in the year of Rome 580, it was found proper to make an edict, ordering that those games should be annually celebrated [G.] This decree was caused by the irregularity of the spring, which had often produced pernicious effects. Vossius's reflection upon Lactantius's objection is not relished by every body [H]. He did not understand a passage of this father [I]. Moreri's mistakes may be seen below, [K].

the fourth year after that consulship, that is to say, in the year 514. In my opinion, it is more natural to say that a thing, which happened three years after the year 510, fell out in the year 513. Note, that according to Pliny the Floral games began by order of the Sybil. Therefore it was not in execution of a court-zean's last will. Father Hardouin saw medals of the Servilian family with this inscription, FLORA PRIMUS, that is, according to him, Floralia primus edidit (19): from whence he concludes, that the first that exhibited those games was one of that family. But if the least credit is given to Ovid (20), it is certain the first that celebrated them were two ediles of the Publician family. This is confirmed by the medals (21), and Tacitus gives no little weight to the same, when he says that Lucius and Marcus Publicius caused the temple of Flora to be built in their edileship (22).

[F] The way they paid the charges of them is a new proof against Lactantius. They fined those who had appropriated to their own use any lands belonging to the common-wealth, and out of those fines they defrayed the expences of the Floral games. 'Non ex Floræ vel meretricis cuiusquam hæreditate, sed ex pecunia multatitia eorum qui peculatus damnati forent' quia publicum populi Romani agrum occupassent (23). — Not out of the inheritance of Flora, or of any court-zean, but out of the fines of those who had been condemned for male-administration as having appropriated to themselves the lands of the public.

[G] In the year of Rome 580, a decree was made for celebrating those games annually. Ovid proves this; for he introduces the goddess Flora, who relates that having suffered the blossoms of the trees and vines to perish, to be revenged of the Romans for not celebrating the Floral games every year, she forced the senate to make a decree concerning that anniversary, if there was a good harvest. It proved good, and thus the decree began to be put in execution under the consulship of Posthumus and Lænas.

[H] Vossius's reflexion upon the objection of Lactantius is not liked by every body. After having displayed the proofs which overthrow that objection, he adds, that truth has no need to beg the assistance of falsehood, and therefore all that the fathers have written against the Gentiles is not to be depended upon.

Cum veritas falsi minime sit indiga, non omnia alba signari linea oportere quæ veteres adversus pago dedites edisserunt (25). Blondel has freely enlarged upon this thought. 'We ought not, says he (26), to defend a good cause by ill chosen arguments, nor take up whatever seems to make for us, wherever it comes from. Yet this has been the practice of the fathers: for the desire of making an advantage of every thing, of forcing truth even from the mouth itself of falsehood, and of being like torrents which impetuously drive down their stream whatever comes in their way, has been the cause that many among them, that they might seem to let nothing escape their memory, have lost the best opportunities of giving proofs of their judgment, and have not only endeavoured to make all the thoughts of the Pagans, both solid and groundless, subservient to them, like great rivers that roll in their beds sands of gold mixed with mire, but have also gloried in this conduct, which has sometimes been fraudulent enough, as if they were allowed to say with Æneas in Virgil, Dolus an virtus quis in hoste requirat?

In war, or strength or stratagem's allow'd.

From hence it was that St Jerome * giving way to this strange prejudice, has made no scruple to alledge in his own vindication, that the fathers have been forced to say, not what was their own opinion, but what was necessary to refute what the Pagans believe. Nay he endeavours to justify them by St Paul's example, but without reason, since the apostle never authorized this abuse by his own example, nor believed all methods indifferent, nay praise worthy, provided they served to the overthrow of error, &c.

[I] Vossius did not understand a passage of this father. This father (27) upbraids the Romans with the apotheosis of a court-zean, whose festival was called Larentinalia. He adds that they paid divine honours to another prostitute, viz. to Paula, who, according to Verrius, was Hercules's whore. Afterwards he speaks of Flora in the terms above mentioned. Vossius pretends that Lactantius has not distinguished Paula from Flora, but that instead of Paula it should be read Flaura. Now Flaura was the ancient way of writing Flora: thus caudex was changed into codex, and many other words in like manner (28). All this comes to nothing, when it is considered that the Paula of Lactantius was Hercules's concubine, and that the Flora, he speaks of, left all her estate to the Roman people. Thus the most celebrated authors for want of attention fall into gross mistakes.

[K] Moreri's mistakes may be seen below. I. He says they made feasts to Flora the beginning of May. This is to understand the 4 Kalendas Maii in another sense than any body else, that knows the elements of learning. The fourth of the Kalends of May is the twenty eighth of April. It must not be said these feasts extended to the beginning of May; for the laws of a narration do not allow that the time of a festival should be described by the last days of it rather than the first. Good Rosinus (29) fancied that at first the Floral games were celebrated in the month of April, and afterwards transferred to the following month. The verses of Ovid, which he alledges, were beyond his reach, and yet they clearly signify, that those games took in the last days of April, and the first days of May.

II. None of the authors, cited by Moreri, say that during the Floral games, the ediles strewed the way with blossoms of peas and beans. He has got this from some modern, perhaps from the Jesuit Pompey, who says that during that solemnity the ediles distributed to the people peas and beans and such like pulse (31). He cites Valerius Maximus l. 2. c. 5. But look for it there as long you please, you will find no such thing. No doubt Pompey trusted to Tiræqueau's commentary upon Alexander ab Alexandro (32), where this false quotation is to be found. I believe he has not been more lucky in citing Plutarch: he says, by a strange and unpardonable way of quoting (33), that that author informs us that the image of the goddess Flora, in the temple of Castor and Pollux, was dressed in a tunic, and carried blossoms of beans and peas in her right hand (34). I am very much mistaken if Plutarch has said any thing more, than that Cecilius Metellus consecrated in the temple of Castor and Pollux the picture of Flora, the mistress of Pompey the great, who was one of the finest women in Rome. FLORA, a famous courtesan of Rome, was passionately loved by Pompey, and had so great value for him, that she would never submit to the pressing solicitations of another gallant (a), till Pompey himself interceded for him. Pompey did this, because that other gallant, who was one of his intimate friends, begged a word of recommendation from him to Flora (b). From that time Pompey, vexed no doubt at his great interest with her, and that he had found so much complaisance, went no more to visit that mistress, which threw her into so deep a melancholly, that she continued a long time sick of it (c). When she grew old, she took a particular pleasure in telling of the happy hours she had spent with Pompey, and even would observe that she never left his arms without being bit by him [A]. Plutarch observes, that Pompey had τίραν ἔσαν ἐπικῶς ἀεὶ μνημονεύειν τῆς γενο-μένης αὐτῇ πρὸς τὸν Πομπήϊον ἐμῆρας, λέγον-σαν ὅτι ἂν ἐκείνῳ συναναπαυσασμένην, ἀδύνα-τος ἀπελθεῖν.* Amiot's translation amounts to this: It is also reported that Flora the courtesan, when she grew old, took a great deal of pleasure to speak frequently of the familiarity she had in her younger days with Pompey, saying it was impossible when she lay with him to leave him without biting him. This is not the sense of the original. The Latin translator has not been more exact. Floram meretricem ejus natu jam grandiorē fere semper commemorantem suam cum Pompejo consuetudinem, dicere solitam non potuisse se ab illo concubitu sine aculeo discedere. I am not the first who made this remark against Amiot; I have read the same in Girac's reply, where he censures his antagonist for having compared his teeth to those of the fair Roman lady, who loved Pompey, and who never left him without fondly biting of him. He censures Costar in the following manner. 'This application betrays a great deal of ignorance; for it was not Flora who bit Pompey, but Pompey who bit Flora, as the Greek text has it in very precise and intelligible words. If Mr Costar does not understand that language, and if his Amiot has deceived him, should not the sequel of the discourse have set him right; for what reason would so judicious an author as Plutarch have observed, in the person of Flora, a lasciviousness common to women of her profession? his business was only to draw Pompey's character, to enter into his private life, and give posterity an account of the most secret motions of so illustrious a commander (1).' Mr de Girac was not satisfied with this criticism only, and he was in the right of it; it was more necessary to shew the moral fault his adversary was guilty of. Therefore he sharply reproaches him with not being ashamed to compare himself with a courtesan so famous in the Roman history for her prostitutions. He thinks it strange that an archdeacon and priest should have learned from that lewd woman, the fine art of biting gallantly. As for him he congratulates himself, that he was not under the slavery of love, since he is a master full of rage and fury (2). Which rage, continues he, as Lucretius says, never appears with more transport than in the enjoyment of the vilest pleasures; it urges them on to wound, and bite those they love most. The poets often mention these bitings.

He strains at all, and fast'ning where he strains,
Too closely presses with his frantic pains:
With biting kisses burts the twining fair,
Which sweets his joys imperfect, unsincere;
For stung with inward rage he flings around,
And strives to avenge the smart on that which gave the wound.

Immediately after he speaks of Flora and Pompey. The poets are not the only persons who mention these bitings. Cicero entertained the court with them in one of his pleadings against Verres. He affirmed that, if the accused would show his breast, there would appear, not those glorious scars which brave men receive in the wars, but such as lewd persons get in the exercise of infamous pleasures. 'Hic scilicet est metum endum ne ad exitum defensionis tuæ (3), vetus illa Antoniana dicendi ratio atque autoritas proferatur, ne excitetur Verres, ne denudetur à pectore, ne cicatrices populus Romanus aspiciat ex mulierum morfu vestigia libidinis atque nequitiae (4). — Here it is to be dreaded, lest, at the close of your defence, the Antonian method and authority of speaking should be introduced, lest his breast should be laid bare, lest the Roman people should behold those scars, the marks of female teeth, received in lewd embraces, and the war of lust.' Those who have a mind to see several passages of the poets concerning these bitings, may consult Dionysius Lambinus's commentary upon the following words in the XIIth ode of the first book of Horace.

Sive puer furens
Impresit memorem dente labris notam.
Non, si me satis audias,

Lædentem oscula, quæ Venus
Quinta parte sui nectaris imbuat.

When on those passive lips the marks I find
Of frantic boiling kisses left behind,
How fond's the hope, how foolish and how vain,
Of lasting love from the ungrateful swain!
Who that soft lip so roughly can invade,
And hurt with cruel joy the tender maid.
Quickly they're glutt'd who so fierce devour;
They suck the nectar, and throw by the flower.

GLANVILLE.

Not that this author has collected together all that the poets have said of this matter: perhaps he has omitted more than he has quoted. I have observed that among other passages he forgot that of Ausonius, concerning the amorous fury of certain Eunuchs. The Jesuit Theophilus Raynaud remembered it well (5). S. Basilus l. de vera virgin. sub finem distinguit duplicem eunuchismum scilicet. Unum quo excinditur tota virilitas . . . alium quo soli didymi auferuntur. Priores Eunuchos negat S. Basilus (6). De posterioribus ait, eos acrius atque ardentius inflammari libidine, & impatientissime ferri ad complexum. Et cum obstructis per excisionem superioribus meatibus, non possint humorem in lumbis inflammatum emittere: non alleviantur per complexum, ut ii quibus vasa sunt integra & expedita; & emissione concupiscentiæ flagrantis remittunt ardorem; sed pruritu assiduo stimulat, aguntur in rabiem, nec desistunt donec fatigatio cassos conatus disturbet. Probat hoc S. Basilus, gemino suæ ætatis exemplo, quorum alterum est de falsa ingenuæ Virgine sacra, spurcum Eunuchum totum toti affusum, cum non haberet, qui cœtrum concupiscentiæ sedaret, ardentem rabiem moribus ac infixis dentibus indicasse. had a particular talent of obtaining the love of women [B], and that Flora was so beautiful, that Cecilius Metellus got her picture drawn, in order to consecrate it with some others in the temple of Castor and Pollux (d). This was neither the first nor the last time that the picture of a courtesan has had the like honour [C]. I know not whether this action of Cecilius Metellus did not contribute to the error mentioned in the preceding article, in which I shewed that Lactantius was in the wrong to say the Floral games were celebrated in honour of a courtesan. A modern author, who no doubt was not ignorant of Lactantius's error, has not however totally avoided the same [D]. I shall observe whence Montagne had been informed that Flora the courtesan yielded herself to none less than a Dictator, or Consul, or Censor, and that her pleasure

A physician of Paris, much better skilled in the Greek tongue than Coltar, is mistaken no less than he in the passage in Plutarch. * Sic Flora, says he (8), * nobile apud Romanos scortum, & forma egregia, * cum ardentius Pompeium Magnum tum adolescentem deperiret, dicere solebat (ut quidem refert Plutarchus) nunquam se ab ejus amplexibus discedere potuisse nisi corpore ejusdem demorsio. — So Flora, says he, a renowned courtesan of Rome of exquisite beauty, and passionately enamoured of Pompey, who was then young, used, as Plutarch informs us, to say, * that she did never quit his embraces without leaving the mark of her teeth upon his body. Note, he observes some very curious things upon the brutality of love, and insinuates that it urges not only to bite the beloved object, but also to desire to eat it. He applies to this a passage in Plato, where love is compared to hunger, and to the eagerness wherewith wolves hunt after lambs. τὴν ἐρασὲν φιλιαν, ὅτι ἐστὶ μετ' ἐννοίας γίνεσθαι, ἀλλὰ σιτίῃ τρόπον, χάριν ὡς ποταμῶν, &c. [B] Pompey had a particular talent of obtaining the love of Women. He proves it both by the testimony of Flora, and the behaviour of his wife Julia. She was a young woman married to a Man, not young, and yet loved him passionately. Pompey secured this affection both by his strict adherence to his conjugal faith and by his engaging manner towards the fair sex. Καὶ γὰρ καὶ τὸ τοῦ λέγεται, καὶ περιέχοντο τὴν τῆς κόρης τὸ φιλιαν, ὅτι ἐστὶ μετ' ἐννοίας ποταμῶν τὸν Πομπηίου. ἀλλ' αὐτίον οἰκιστὴν ἵτε σωφροσύνην τὴν ἀνδρὸς εἶναι, μὴν γυναικὸς τὴν γυναικὸς, ἥτε σεμνότητι, καὶ ἀκριτον ἀλλ' εὐχάριν ἔχουσα τὴν ἐμύλιαν καὶ μάλα γυναικῶν ἀγωγὴν, εἰ δὲ μὴ δὲ φιλιαν ἀλῶναι τὴν ἐταίραν ψευδομαρτυρίαν. Visæ inquit quandoque in locis ubi non decuit divorum imagines viventium adhuc hominum ora vultusque referre, ut hoc umbratice velamento illorum quos amabant effigie pascere oculos. Ad quas selectas & procaciter venustas formas pingi solere imagines deiparæ Virginis probe norunt pictores. — Molanus, in his Treatise of holy Paintings, sheweth what practices have been used. Pictures, says he, have been seen in very improper places, representing saints, whose features have exactly answered to those of persons still living, that under this symbolical dress they might feed their eyes with the effigies of those they loved. From what select and beautiful, but dishonest originals, the pictures of the virgin mother have been drawn, painters well know. I shall conclude with a passage out of the News from the Republic of Letters. * The author (19) . . . explains a medal of Julian the apostate, upon which on one side is seen Serapis, perfectly resembling Julian, and on the other the figure of an Hermaphrodite. It was no unusual thing to see statues of men altogether like those of some God. Flattery or vanity has often been the cause of this disorder. Pliny mentions a painter who always drew the goddesses like the mistresses, he was in love with. This might give Justin Martyr occasion to say, laughing at the pagans, that they worshipped their painters mistresses. But I know not whether it is very fair to make the heathens responsible for the fancies of a Zeuxis, or a Lyfippus. What would be said of a man that should pretend, that those, who believe they worship the image of St Charles Borromeo, worship nothing but a picture made at pleasure, and the caprice of a painter? I say this because, tho' that saint was very homely, he is painted very handsome. This is an unavoidable thing in all religions where images are used: you must submit to the licence of workmen, and must depend upon them for the air and shape of the objects of devotion. Deos ea facie novimus quæ pictores & scultores voluerunt. We know the gods only by such faces as the painters and sculptors please to give them, said the men of sense among the pagans. Yet this ought not to encourage such abuses: for instance, it was not to be born, that the image of the Virgin should be made at Rome from the picture and resemblance of a sister to Pope Alexander VI, who was indeed very beautiful, but not very virtuous (20). See the remark [E] of the article DÜRER.

[D] A modern author . . . has not wholly avoided Lactantius's error. This modern is la Mothe le Vayer. These are his words which tend to show, that all things are but opinion, and that it is by this, and not by a natural and immutable law, that vice differs from virtue. * None, says he (21), but common whores and Hortacio's wenches are infamous among us; a Lais, a Rhodope, an Acca Laurentia, who leaves money enough to make the Roman people her heirs, a Flora, a Faustina, deserve temples and altars. The most celebrated of the Egyptian pyramids was built in honour of a king's daughter, who desired only one stone of each of those who lay with her, with which notwithstanding she built that prodigious edifice, after she had enriched her father Ethiopians by that pretty pastime. It is plain he did not believe, that the courtesan Flora made the Roman people her heirs, for he ascribes this action only to Laurentia. Yet he supposes that Flora, one of the goddesses of Rome, had been a famous courtesan: but this is a mistake; This is endeavouring to support the building when the foundation is ruined. There is no other courtesan Flora, but that mentioned by Lactantius, and the who loved Pompey. The latter did not come into the world till after the institution of the Floral games, and we have seen (22) that the other did not institute them. Our modern author did not pretend that she left her estate to the Roman commonwealth. Where then did he find the apotheosis of a courtesan named Flora?

[E] I shall observe whence Montagne had it . . . that her pleasure arose from the dignity of her lovers.] Horace censures certain debauchees for following the same maxims (23). See also Perseus's Patricæ immetat vulgæ, towards the end of the last satire. We shall see, in the following remark, that a very late writer (24) furnished Montagne with this fine particular.

[F] Brantome has . . . said many things without any foundation.] He says (25) that the courtesan Flora was of a good family and extraction, and in this was more commendable than Laïs, who, like a common strumpet, abandoned herself to every body; but Flora only to the great, so that she wrote over her door, let none but kings, princes, dictators, consuls, censors, pontiffs, questors, ambassadors, and other great lords come in. Laïs would always be paid before hand, but Flora not; saying she behaved thus to great men, that they might also act by her as great and illustrious persons; and that thus a woman of great beauty and high birth will always be esteemed according to the value she sets upon herself.

FLORIMONT (GALEACIUS) Disciple of Augustin Niphus, lived a long time at Paris in the quality of agent to Anthony Colonna, and made himself known to the learned men, who at that time were formed in the school of James Faber Stapulensis. He published in Italian a treatise of morality, and was made bishop of Sessa (a). Fracastor dedicates one of his poetical pieces to Marc Antony Flaminus, and to Galeacius Florimont, and thereby shews that they applied themselves to the study of divinity.

FONTARABIA, a city of Spain on the river of Bidasso, near the sea, was built, they say, by king Suintilla [A]. Alphonfus IX, king of Castile, took it from Sanchez, king of Navarre (a), and granted the inhabitants the same privileges that king Sanchez his father had granted to the city of St Sebastian. Some pretend that Fontarabia was formerly a city of Guienne under the viscount of Bayonne (b). It's situation on this side of the Pyrenean mountains favours their opinion: Besides that, in ecclesiastical matters, it was under the bishop of Bayonne till the year 1571 (c). See in Moreri an account of the taking this town by the French in the reign of Francis I, the succours they threw into it, and the cowardice of the governor, who surrendered it to the Spaniards. Moreri should not have omitted the disgrace the French suffered before this place in the year 1638, two days after the birth of Lewis XIV [B]; which no doubt

Sed quis credat Beutero sine teste loquenti in re adeo antiqua, & à nostro ævo remota? mihi certe nulla suppetunt argumenta quæ huic oppido tantæ vetustatis decus concilient (1). Beuterus affirms, that this town was built by Suintilla king of the Goths. But who can give credit to Beuterus when he speaks without any authority of a fact so remote from our times? at least I can meet with no arguments which can induce me to believe it has that antiquity.'

[B] The disgrace the French suffered before this place in 1638, two days after the birth of Lewis XIV.] This was one of the greatest disgraces of the reign of Lewis the just, and the ministry of cardinal Rich-lieu. Hear Balzac on this (2): 'Let us never speak a word of * * * *. It is the shame and ignominy of the French name; it is a day which the Romans would have called Scelerata, and we ought to call curfæd. Posterity must abhor it, or rather should be kept from the knowledge of it, and we should if possible efface it from the year one thousand. . . .

(2) It is a letter he wrote to Châlain, the eleventh of the third book. He has put asterisks in several places to leave the reader in the dark. I am confident, for the same reason, he has put a false date at the bottom of the letter. He has made it the 8th of May, instead of the 8th of October, 1638, because he would not offend a prince of the blood: it was the prince of Condé, who commanded at the siege.

* There

doubt was looked upon as a wonderful omen by the Spaniards [C]. Lewis the just, and cardinal Richlieu, were exceedingly exasperated against the supposed authors of that disgrace [D].

Joseph Moret, a Spanish Jesuit, has written a large account in Latin of this siege of Fontarabia. I do not find in the copy I make use of (d) the year of the impression; but the epistle dedicatory being dated from Segovia the twelfth of April 1654, and the approbation of the provincial of the Jesuits, bearing date the fifth of March 1655, it may be supposed this work was published soon after the defeat of the French.

(d) It is a book in 16mo, of 467 pages.

'There are some people to whom fortune owes a grudge, and in whose hands the fairest opportunities miscarry. When the design is to raise sieges and lose armies, none are fitter to be employed: immediately, all places become Acro-corinths, and all enemies meer Alexanders.' It is plain that by the people to whom fortune owes a grudge, he designs to hint at the prince of Condé (3). This was saying gravely and respectfully the jest of the song. He will take Fontarabia, Zest, just as he took Dole (4).

(3) He was grand father to the prince of Condé, living this present year, 1655.

[C] Which no doubt was looked upon as a wonderful omen by the Spaniards. Without doubt their poets and orators set off the circumstance of the time with all possible pomp: a signal triumph, a complete victory, two days after (5) the birth of a Dauphin, France had been so many years waiting for. What auspicious omen this for Spain! what may she not expect under the reign of a French prince, the first days of whose life are made memorable by a battle most glorious to the Spaniards, most shameful to France? perhaps the first courier that arrived at the court of France, after the Dauphin's birth, was he that brought the fatal news of the siege of Fontarabia being raised: what a horoscope! O happy presage for the Spanish monarchy! I am sure that all the poetic sallies of the Spanish writers on this subject might fill a volume, and after all what has been the issue of all these good omens? like the Sybilline oracles written upon leaves, the wind has carried them away (6). All poetical pens, whether they write in prose or verse, should know that it is not their business to prophecy. The queen of France was delivered of a prince, just at the time when express after express brought an account of the progress of Lewis XIVth's arms in Holland in 1672. Upon which what did not the French poets say? what triumphs did they not promise a prince who was born in the midst of so much good news? and yet he lived but a little while.

'ander was born the same night that the temple of Diana at Ephesus was burnt, adds, that it was no wonder the goddess should be absent from home, when the labour of Olympias called for her presence.'

[D] Lewis XIII and Richlieu were extremely exasperated against the supposed authors of that disgrace. The duke de la Valette, eldest son to the duke d'Espèron, was looked upon as the chief author of that miscarriage. He durst not surrender himself whilst his conduct was inquired into, but fled into England. The council of state declared him 'convict of high treason for having basely and perfidiously deserted the king's service at the siege of Fontarabia, and of felony, for going out of the kingdom contrary to the king's orders, and for this he was condemned to lose his head at the Greve, if he could be taken, or in effigy if he could not, to lose all his employments, and his estate to be confiscated (11).' I observe that the king cleared him from the charge of cowardice. 'The question is not, said he (12), either of the cowardice or unskillfulness of the duke de la Valette, for I know he wants neither bravery nor capacity, but he would not take Fontarabia.' Every body was not of Lewis XIIIth's opinion. See the following words of the Menagiana (13). 'At the time that Mr d'Espèron retired into England, being charged with running away in a fight, Monf. Peirec wrote to the great Bignon, and asked him if a man could be condemned to death for want of courage. Monf. Bignon answered that there was no law upon which such a sentence could be founded. The laws at most only condemn to death the first that flies, to make an example for the rest.' Mr Menage's memory, as good as it was, failed him here; for Mr Peirec died fifteen months (14) before the defeat at Fontarabia more or less: and it is certain the duke de la Valette retired into England merely on account of that defeat. After all, what the king said is more probable, and it was not upon this occasion alone, that hatred to the cardinal had cost that monarch the loss of a battle. There was no criminal attempt, the enemies of that prelate did not practise. They wished success to the Spaniards, and sometimes procured it for them, purely with a view to ruin the cardinal, who could never have maintained his credit unless the king's arms had been successful. But here is another fault. His creatures sometimes lost a battle out of complaisance to him; at least it was suspected the marshal de Grammont suffered himself to be routed at Honnecour, in order to do him service (15). The cardinal was retired from court: what could be more for his interest, than to put the affairs of the kingdom into confusion? was not this the way to have it said, that as soon as he quitted the helm, every thing went ill? and was not this the means to have him recalled, that he might remedy what had happened amiss in his absence? thus the happiness of a whole people, and even the honour of princes, are sacrificed to the interest of a minister.

FONTE (MODERATA). Under this name a Venetian lady has published her works. Her true name was Modesto Pozzo (a). She is author of a poem intituled il Floridoro, and of another Italian poem upon the passion and resurrection of JESUS CHRIST. Besides this poem, and divers others, she published in prose a book de Meriti delle Donne, in which she maintains, that the female sex is not inferior to the male sex. I have taken this from a book intituled Le Cose notabili & maravigliose della Città di Venezia, già riformate & accomodate da Leonico Goldoni, & bora grandemente ampliate da Zuanne Zilio. See there page 311 of the Venice edition 1655. I was surprized that there is no mention of the year of the birth or death of this lady, nor any other circumstance of her life; but I have found elsewhere something to supply this defect [A].

(a) She preserved the sense of her name under the word Fleur, which answers to Pozzo, and that of moderata, which answers to Fonte.

[A] There is no circumstance of her life in the supplied elsewhere. Father Hilarion de Costa informs me that this lady (i) was born at Venice in Modesto Pozzo 1555; di Zorzi.

See the remark. Mr Moreri, under the word Puy, relates something concerning this illustrious woman.

1555; that she lost her father and mother, the first year of her life; that in her youth she was put into the nunnery of St Mariba of Venice; that she learned with great ease poetry and the Latin tongue; that she had so excellent a memory, that when she had heard a sermon she could repeat it word by word; that her book of the merit of women was published presently after her death; that she was honourably married to Philip de Georgiis, and lived twenty years with him in great harmony, after which she died in childbirth the first of November 1592; that her husband erected a monument to her upon which was engraved this epitaph: 'Modeste à Puteo fœminæ doctissimæ, quæ

FONTEVRAUD, or rather FRONTEVAUX [A], a famous abbey in the diocese of Poitiers and province of Anjou, acknowledges for its founder ROBERT D'ARBRISSEL. We promised to say something here of this person, and shall now perform it. He was born about the year 1047, in the village of Arbriffel (a), seven leagues from Rennes. In 1074 he went to Paris, where he was made doctor of divinity. A certain bishop of Rennes, who, though he was not learned, yet was a lover of learned men [B], and bestowed upon them employments, called him back into Brittany, about the year 1085, and conferred upon him the dignity of Arch-Priest and Official, and had the pleasure to see him oppose the licentiousness which infested his diocese. The quarrels, simony, and fornication of the clergy, had introduced strange confusion there. After labouring four years to extirpate these disorders, Robert, finding himself exposed by the death of his bishop, to the ill will of the Canons, who were not at all pleased with his reforming spirit (b), bent his thoughts another way. He went to teach divinity at Angers; but he grew so weary of the world, on account of the corruption of manners, which he found prevailed every where, that he retired into a desert (c). The austere life he led there was soon known, and many persons resorted to him, both to hear, and see a saint. Some of these he kept with him, and, about the year 1094, began to form a sort of a college of regular canons. Urban II, being in France two years after, heard so good a character of him that he sent for him, and, being desirous to hear him preach, ordered him to pronounce a sermon at the dedication of a church (d). He was so edified by it, that he created him apostolical preacher. The baron de Craon was so moved with the sermon, that the next day he founded an abbey, and gave it to Robert (e). The new abbot discharged the functions of that office till the year 1098. Then he considered that his character of apostolical preacher did not allow him to be always confined to the same place with his regular canons; wherefore he renounced his abbey and travelled from place to place in order to exercise his talent of preaching. Having done this for two years, followed by a great multitude of men and women, he resolved to rest, and to fix his tabernacles in the forest of Frontevaux. In this place he wanted nothing; people from all sides zealously supplying all manner of necessities for the subsistence of the devout souls he had about him. So that he was very soon in a condition to give alms of what was over and above what he wanted. We must not forget that, at the same time, there were two other famous preachers who agreed with him to divide the two sexes

[A] Or rather FRONTEVAUX The Latin name in all the ancient charters is Fons-Ebraldi (1). According to that original, it should be called Fontevraux, and some call it so. But Mr Menage affirms it should be called Frontevaux, as the inhabitants of Anjou and Poitou call it. The letter r has been inserted here as in the word fronde derived from the Latin fundus, and in the word fromage derived from formaticum. It is long since this letter was inserted; for we find in Sivigni's chronicle, page 317: 'Anno Domini 1189 obiit Henricus Rex Angliæ, octavis Apostolorum Petri & Pauli, & sepultus est apud Frontevall (2). — In the year 1189 died Henry king of England, on the octaves of St Peter and Paul, and was interred at Frontevaux.

[B] A bishop of Rennes . . . not learned, but a lover of learned men.] His name was Silvester de la Guerche, and he had carried arms against Conan duke of Brittany (3). Here is what is said of him in the history of Robert d'Arbriffel. 'Licet non litteratus litteratos tamen inhianter complexabatur. . . convocabat igitur afluente si quos poterat litteratos, quod hominum genus Britannia tunc habebat rarissimum (4). — Tho' not a man of learning himself, he had a great affection for learned men: he therefore got together

'all the eminent men he could from all parts, which at that time were very scarce in Bretagne.' Upon the report of this Robert's merit, he invited him into his diocese, and made this ingenuous confession to him: 'Evectione præparata, venerandus Pontifex dirigit Parisius, & accessit taliter alloquitur. Vides inquit, Frater charissime, quomodo sancta Redonensis Ecclesia mater tua sine regimine vacillat, hoc præsertim tempore cum me pene Laicum ei contigerit præesse. Eilo igitur, quælo in responsis Ecclesiasticis noster interpres, audiam te, & loqueris in me. Poteris procul dubio Dei populo prodesse, si zelum Dei habens, volueris nobiscum aliquantulum militare. — The venerable prelate having caused him to be sent for, and brought from Paris, spoke to him in the following manner. You see, says he, my dear brother, how the holy church of Rennes, your mother, totters for want of regimen, and more especially at this time when I, almost a layman, am placed at the head of it. Be therefore, I entreat you, my interpreter in ecclesiastic affairs: I will listen to your directions, and you shall speak by me; you are able, no doubt, to serve God's people, if, out of a zeal for his service, you would enlist for a while under his banner.'

sexes, leaving him the care of the women, whilst they undertook that of the men [C]. No sooner had he established good laws in his monastery of Fontevaux; but he resumed his office of itinerant preacher. He ran over several provinces of France, and particularly Brittany and Normandy. He did at Roan the greatest exploit that any man of his profession could possibly do; for, by one single exhortation, he converted all the women of pleasure who were in a place of prostitution [D], where he entered on purpose to preach. In 1104 he assisted at the council of Beaugenci, and sat among the prelates. During the years 1107, and 1108, he went over the provinces of Anjou, Poitou, and Touraine, discharging his office of apostolical preacher. These travels, at least, produced this good effect, that the order of Fontevaux was spread in all those provinces [E], and found how powerful Pope Paschal II's exhortations were. The bishop of Poitiers went to Rome in 1106, to desire of his holiness the confirmation of that order. He obtained a bull of Paschal II, by which that pontiff declared he would take a particular care of, and put it immediately under the jurisdiction of the holy see, and earnestly exhorted all people to promote this new institution. He confirmed all their privileges by a new bull in the year 1113. The order was already grown pretty numerous; for the founder, as he went preaching through the other provinces of France, did not fail to establish convents there (f). He persuaded queen

(f) See the remark [F].

[C] Two other preachers . . . agreed . . . to leave him the care of the women while they took the charge of the men. This is an admirable partition, and not to be compared to that of the circumcision and uncircumcision, I mean that of St Peter and St Paul, when it was said that St Peter should apply himself to the conversion of the Jews, and St Paul to the conversion of the gentiles (5). The three preachers I mention here were Robert d'Arbrissel, Bernard of Tiron, and Vitalis of Moriton. Let us hear the words of an ancient Historian. 'In transmarinis partibus, sicut à majoribus accepi, tres memorabiles viri uno tempore fuere: scilicet Robertus cognominatus de Arbriculo, Bernardus, & Vitalis. Hi non ignobiliter eruditi, & spiritu ferventes, circuibant per castella & vicos, feminantemque secundum Isaiam super omnes aquas, de conversione multorum fructus coligebant, quo inter se placito constituto: quod Robertus quidem seminarum communi labore ad meliora conversarum sollicitudinem gereret; Bernardus vero & Vitalis maribus propensius providerent. Robertus igitur famosissimum illud Monasterium feminarum de Fonte-Ebraldi construxit, & regularibus disciplinis informavit. Bernardus vero apud Tironium, & Vitalis apud Saviniacum Monachis regulari institutis, suos quique ab aliis per quasdam preceptorum proprietates distinxit (6). — In the transmarine parts, as I have been informed, there were at the same time three men of distinguished characters, namely, Robert surnamed d'Arbrissel, Bernard, and Vitalis, all persons of great learning, and glowing with zeal: who traversed the country, sowing, according to Esaias, upon all waters; and from the numerous conversions which they made, gathered fruit in abundance; having entered into this pious contrait amongst themselves; that Robert should take upon himself the charge of their female converts, that Bernard and Vitalis should take care of the men. Whereupon Robert founded that famous nunnery at Fontevaux, in which he instituted the most regular discipline. Bernard and Vitalis each instituted a regular order of Monks, the first at Tiron, the other at Savigny, which they distinguished from each other by some peculiarities in their precepts. In vain did they represent to our Robert the hazard he would run by his zeal to instruct the fair sex: he rejected that advice as an artifice of the devil, and fortified himself with the example of St Jerome. Despexit ergo tentatorem, irritis ejus fallaciis, nec seminarum abiecit moderationem. . . . divum Hieronymum imitatus, cui insulsi obloquebantur Aristarchi, quod scriberet ad mulieres, easque viris anteponebat: quorum cavillationes venustissimè & copiosissimè retundit devoti sexus celebratione sacris ex literis deducta (7). — He despised the tempter, had defiance to his cunning, and persevered in his female charge. . . . imitating therein St Jerome, who was reviled by certain dealers in defamation, for writing to the women, and preferring them to men, whose counsils he refuted in a beautiful and copious encomium upon the fair sex.

(7) Joan. de la Maille, Tom. i, pag. 115.

[D] By a single exhortation he converted all the women of pleasure who were in a place of prostitution. They ascribe to him a very particular talent for this; and since the direction of women was fallen to his lot, it was necessary he should chiefly look after the scabby sheep. He went barefoot into the streets and squares to exhort women of ill repute to repentance, and he entered into the very stews to press his admonitions upon them. One day he went into one of those houses in Roan, and sat down by the fire to warm his feet. He was presently surrounded by women who imagined he came thither to satisfy his lust; but he immediately began to talk with them of very different things: he preached the word of life to them, and the mercy of the son of God. The chiefest of them, surprized at such language, told him that for five and twenty years that she had frequented that house, she had never seen any body come in there that had spoke of God, or given them any hope of mercy; but that if she could depend upon what he said, she would certainly change her course of life; and upon his repeated assurances of mercy, she and her companions threw themselves at Robert's feet, and promised to repent. He laid hold of that happy moment, and led them all out of the city into his desert (8). 'In Vita beati Roberti de Arbrissello legitur, quod Ordinem Sanctimonialium Fontis-Ebraldi instituit: & quod nudipes per plateas & vicos ire consueverat, ut fornicarias ac peccatrices ad medicamentum penitentiae posset adducere. Quadam ergo die, cum venisset Rotomagus, Lupinar est ingressus, sedensque ad focum pedes calefacturus, à meretricibus circumdatur, æstimantes eum causâ fornicandi esse ingressum. Sed prædicante eo verba vitæ, ac misericordiam Christi eis promittente, una ex meretricibus, quæ cæteris præerat, dixit ei: quis es tu, qui talia loqueris? Scias pro certo, quia per viginti quinque annos, quibus hanc domum ad perpetranda scelera sum ingressa, nunquam aliquis huc advenit, qui de Deo loqueretur, vel de ejus misericordia præsumere nos faceret: tamen si scirem vera esse, &c. (9).'

It is observed in the history of the works of the learned (10): 'That several other women of this sort being also converted, Robert was forced to make a particular cloister for them, which he dedicated to St Mary Magdalen, whilst August, 1690, he assigned another, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, to women of virtue and reputation.' This shews the particular talent he had to gain this sort of the creatures (11), and his attachment to the ancient discipline; for there are some fathers who were of opinion that those Nuns, which had been violated, ought to be separated from those who never had that misfortune (12).

[E] The order of Fontevaux was spread in those provinces. During his travels through Anjou, Poitou, and Touraine, in 1107, and 1108, he founded the monasteries of Chamfournais, Lapaie, Loges, Relais, Gaine, and Gironde. In the year 1110 he went through Berry, and Brittany, and founded the monastery of Orlan, in the diocese of Bourges. In the year 1112 he founded three in the dioceses of Orleans and Poitiers, la Lande en Beauchene, Tiron, and la Madeleine d'Orleans. In the year 1114 he preached in the Limosin, Angoumois, and Perigot, and in the diocese of Toulouse, and founded four monasteries, Bourbon, la Gascniere, Cadoun, and l'Epinaffe. It was at this time

Bertrade to take the habit of the order [F]; but she did not wear it long; the austerity of the order soon cost her her life [G]. In the year 1115 he found in himself a sensible decay, and by the advice of several prelates, abbots, and monks, whom he had assembled together, he conferred the generalship of the order upon a woman (g). This disposition has been very much censured [H]. The following year he recovered his strength, and went through the diocese of Chartres, performing his usual office of a preacher. He put an end to a dispute, which several other persons had attempted in vain, between Ives, bishop of Chartres, and Bernard, abbot of Bonneval. He was no less successful in a difference which happened between the count de Chartres and the canons, concerning the choice of a bishop after the death of Ives. He fell sick as he was preaching in the diocese of Bourges in 1117, and caused himself to be carried to the monastery of Orfan, where he died a few days after. The archbishop of Bourges, attended by his clergy, and a great number of gentlemen and plebeians, accompanied the body to the monastery of Frontevaux, where he solemnized his funeral twelve days after his decease. The earl of Anjou, the archbishop of Tours, the bishop of Angers, several abbots, and an incredible number of clergy and people went to meet the body before it came out of the diocese of Tours (b). Father de la Mainferme (i), a monk of Frontevaux, has published three apologetical volumes, in which time that having gone over Languedoc and Guienne, he went into Auvergne, where he had religious conferences with the blessed Raingarda the mother of Peter the venerable (13).

[F] He persuaded queen Bertrade to take the habit of the order. This BERTRADE was the daughter of Simon de Montfort, and sister of Amauri de Montfort earl of Eyreux, and of William de Montfort bishop of Paris. She was brought up in Normandy with her aunt, the countess d'Evreux, where Fulk Rechin, earl of Anjou, saw her, and fell in love with her. He married her in 1089. In 1092 or 1093, she left him, to marry Philip I, king of France, with whom she had had a private interview upon Whitsunday eve in the church of St John de Tours, while the canons of St Martin were blessing the fons of the church. She went to Orleans where the king received her (14), and afterwards married her at Paris. The Pope excommunicated him by his legate in 1094, at the council of Autun, and he himself excommunicated him the following year at the council of Clermont. Philip put away Bertrade in 1096, and took her again in 1100: he was excommunicated a-fresh; but both he and she obtained absolution in 1105, having sworn upon the holy gospels not to cohabit carnally together, and never to see or speak to one another but in the presence of unsuspected persons (15). The register book of St Nicholas of Angers says, 'that in 1106, the sixth of the ides of October, Philip was at Angers with Bertrade, and that Rechin received him there magnificently. No doubt it was at this time that Bertrade reconciled her two husbands, and made them a great entertainment, at which she served a table, as Orderic writes, who adds that Bertrade continued with Philip to his death (16). It is very probable the Pope approved of their marriage; for their two sons were declared capable of succeeding to the crown, as we are informed by Suger in the life of Lewis the burly. Bertrade had a dowry upon the demesnes of the crown . . . which dowry was the estate of Hautbriere in the neighbourhood of Montfort, and in the diocese of Chartres, which is the place where she founded a priory, having been received a nun at Frontevaux by R. d'Arbrissel, and in this retirement she led an exemplary life to her death.' She lived in Anjou after the death of king Philip, which happened in 1108. Mr Menage, from whom I borrow this (17), has corrected a prodigious number of faults which he had observed in several historians concerning this Bertrade. He does not say whether or no she lived long after she entered into a religious life; but we learn from William of Malmesbury that she died soon after. 'Philippus, says he (18), in extremo vitae, tactus morbo monachicum apud Floriacum accepit habitum (19). Pulchrius & fortius illa (Bertrade), quod etate & sanitate integra, nec specie rugata apud Fontem Eivaldi Sanctimonialium appetit velum. Nec multo post praesenti vitae vale fecit: Deo forsitan providente, non posse delictae mulieris corpus religionis laboribus inservire. — Philip, says he, being in a bad state of health, and near his end, took the monk's habit at Fleury. Bertrade took the veil at Frontevaux with more honour and better fortune, as she did it in full health, and the flower of her age, & her charms were impaired by age. She died soon after; the providence of GOD perhaps being mindful, that a woman of so delicate a frame could not sustain the austerities of a religious life.' The conversion of this lascivious queen did a great deal of honour to Robert. She was so artful a woman that she did what she would with the king, and her first husband was frequently seen at her feet after she had left him, saying a thousand submissive things. A baseness equal at least to the abject behaviour of Menelaus. 'Amore ejus ita captus est (Philippus) ut illa sibi in omnibus imperaret, cum ipse omnibus imperare cuperet (20). Bertrade virago faceta, & eruditissima illius admirandi muliebris artificii, quo consueverunt audaces suis etiam lascivis injuriis maritos suppeditare, Andegavensem priorem maritum, licet thoro omnino repudiatum, ita mollificaverat, ut eam tanquam Dominam veneraretur, & scabello pedum ejus saepius residens, ac si praestigio fieret, voluntati ejus omnino obsequeretur (21). — Philip was so passionately enamoured of her, that she enjoyed an absolute power over him, tho' he was affected an universal power over others. Bertrade was a woman of great wit, and so exquisitely skilled in that species of female cunning, by which the bold are used to work upon their husbands when they have unjustly provoked them, that she so far mollified the duke of Anjou, though she had entirely abandoned his bed, that he recovered her as his sovereign, and often sitting on her footstool, as if constrained by magic force, entirely submitted himself to her pleasure.' It is thought she took the veil at Frontevaux about the year 1115.

[G] The austerity of the order soon cost her her life.]

We have already seen (22) that William of Malmesbury conjectured that the providence of GOD so ordered it, that the delicate body of this queen was unable to undergo the toils of religion. It was better perhaps that she should soon sink under them; for if they had only emaciated her body, it were to have been feared that a tedious languishing state would have given her a distaste for a monastic life, and made her regret the flattering pleasures she had forsaken. However that be, here is the proof of my text. 'Anno 1115 aut circiter Bertradam Reginam ad institutum Font-Ebraldense tandem pellectam Robertus in monasterio Alta-Brueria dicto collocavit. Vestu cultusque in primis aspero atque horrido utens, vita statim privata est' (23). Upon this occasion was verified the maxim, Nullum violentum durabile.

[H] This disposition has been very much censured.] There is nothing more singular in the monastic world (24), than to see a large order of monks and nuns acknowledge a woman for their head and general; as the monks and nuns of the order of Frontevaux are obliged by their institution to do. Robert d'Arbrissel their founder would have it so. He made a law diametrically opposite to the Salic law: he was not satisfied with allowing that the order might fall to the distaff, but appointed that a woman should always succeed a woman in the dignity of head and general of the order. Father de la Mainferme sets apart the third volume of his work to vindicate this conduct of the founder. He answers all the common objections that which he takes abundance of pains to justify his patriarch, who had been charged by some with going to bed to his nuns [I], not indeed with a design to enjoy them, but in order to expose himself to greater temptations. This scene has been represented in the News from the republic of letters [K]. That monk's vivacity and zeal against the authors that are made, and insists very much upon this, that the Blessed Virgin commanded God himself; for it is said in scripture that JESUS CHRIST was subject to his mother. If God, the eternal being, the creator of all things, made no difficulty to obey a woman, shall we men, inconsiderable creatures as we are, dare to refuse it? If ever the church of Rome did willfully what it is pretended she did without knowing it under the reign of Pope Joan, she would find her apology ready drawn up in father Mainferme's book; and I do not see, if the apology of Frontevaux passes muster, why they should make any scruple of creating a she-Pope. Add to this, that, according to the hypothesis of the votaries of the church of Rome, God has given the empire of the world to the holy Virgin: nothing is more common in the writings of those men than the titles of queen of heaven, queen of the angels, when they speak of the Virgin; and this is also the language of their public worship, I mean of the church hymns. A monk of Frontevaux one day made use of this reason: father Mainferme relates it without finding any fault with it (25). 'It happened once that a monk who shall be nameless, who could hardly digest that part of our institution, speaking of this matter, told me, that our kingdom was under petticoat government. In which indeed he spoke better than he thought, and did us a great deal of honour contrary to his intention. For it is true, it is under petticoat government, as is also the whole kingdom of the universe of heaven and earth, under female government, in as much as it is governed by the power and sovereign authority of her, who, like a virtuous woman, manum suam misit ad fortia; & digiti ejus apprehenderant fenum. Pr. 31. v. 19.'

[I] Some have charged him with going to bed to his nuns. The accusation is founded upon a letter of Geoffry abbot of Vendôme. That abbot's letters were published by father Sirmond, in 1610, from a manuscript in the abbey of la Couture. One of those letters was written to our Robert, to inform him of the scandalous report that was spread concerning his conduct, and of the inconveniences which might arise from it. Let us hear the words of the letter (26): 'Fœminarum quædam, ut dicitur, nimis familiariter tecum habitare permittis, & cum ipsis etiam, & inter ipsis, noctu frequenter cubare non erubescis. Hoc si modò agis, vel aliquando egisti, novum, & inauditum sed instructissimum martyrii genus invenisti Mulierum quibusdam, sicut fama sparsit, & nos ante diximus, sæpe privatim loqueris, & eorum accubitu novo martyrii genere cruciaris. — It is said, you suffer some of the women to live with you in too great familiarity, and scruple not to lie with them and amongst them frequently in the night. If this be or has been your practice, you have found indeed a new and unheard of, but a fruitless kind of martyrdom? It is reported, as I said before, that you converse in private with some of the women, and insist upon yourself a new kind of martyrdom by lying with them.' There is another letter which is ascribed to Marbodius bishop of Rennes, containing the same informations (27): 'Mulierum cohabitationem diceris plus amare. Has ergo non solum communi mensa per diem, sed & communi accubitu per noctem dignaris, ut referunt. — It is reported that you are too fond of living with women, and that you do not only admit them at your table by day, but into your bed at night.' He blames Robert for making young girls take the habit too rashly, and represents to him the ill success of such a proceeding. Some of them, perceiving the ninth month draw on, had broke out of the cloister to live in elsewhere, and others had been brought to bed in the middle of their cells. 'Taceo de juveniculis, quas sine examine religionem professas mutata veste per diversas cellulas protinus inclusisti. Hujus igitur facti temeritatem miserabilis exitus probat. Aliæ enim urgente partu, fractis ergastulis elapsæ sunt, aliæ in ipsis ergastulis pepererunt (28).'

Note, I. that in the letter to Geoffry of Vendôme, Robert d'Arbrissel is related with having a respect to persons. There are some women, says he, with whom you are always in a good humour, brisk, active, free, so complaisant, that you take all occasions to express your civility; but for others, if at any time you condescend to speak to them, it is to reproach them; you treat them with great rigour, and leave them exposed to hunger, thirst, and cold. 'Illis siquidem te semper sermone jocundum ostendis, & alacrem actione, omne neque genus humanitatis exhibes, nulla servata paritate. Et iterum. Aliis verò, si quando cum ipsis loqueris, semper locutione nimis durus appares, nimis districtus correctione: illas etiam fame, & siti ac nuditate crucias omni relicta pietate (29).' This is insinuating what Theophilus Raynaud affirms (30), I mean that Robert chose out the prettiest, when he had a mind to expose himself to temptation by lying with a woman. Note, in the second place, that Father Mainferme does not quote the whole passage in Marbodius's pretended letter. I have seen it much more complete in Mr Menage (31), and there I find that they put Robert in mind of his having formerly been faulty with respect to women. I find also another reflexion upon him, which I shall hereafter mention (32).

[K] This scene has been represented in the news from the commonwealth of letters. See the second article of the month of April 1686: it is an abstract of the first volume of the Clypeus nascentis Fontevrauldensis Ordinis. The author of the abstract has compared to Tantalus a man that should pitch upon such a kind of mortification as that imputed to our Robert. But as there is no comparison but what is lame, this of Tantalus in some respects would not agree to the director of these nuns. He would suffer hunger and thirst in sight of a remedy, but he could not be certain that the remedy would retire from him in proportion as he advanced towards it. The comparison with those curious physicians, who study so attentively the causes of phenomena, would only be true in some respects. Their meditations, their searches are only glancing upon nature; the secret they look for is in a vessel which they can only touch the brim of; in vain do they turn and wind about, they find no more than the circumference of the circle, without ever arriving at the centre of it. This is an emblem of Robert, with this difference, that he was not desirous as they are of penetrating to the bottom of the mystery (33). I am far from affirming what they say of him; for I find a great strength in his apologist's arguments; but it cannot be imagined how many heretics there have been, who, professing to abstain from marriage, and the full enjoyment of the fair sex, yet would lie with women, embrace them, and omit no manner of prelude. See the proceedings of the inquisition of Toulouse (34) printed at Amsterdam 1692: I shall quote something out of it in the article GUILLEMETE. See also what the bishop of Meaux reports from St Bernard against the Henricians, at the sixty ninth paragraph of the eleventh book of the history of Variations. It is a sign that there is no delusion or chimera, which does not enter into the heart of man. The greatest danger they can fall into, who are under vows of continence, is to think upon the objects they have renounced, or to see them in certain circumstances. Witness the Hermit who saw Brandimart in the arms of his dear Fleurdellis (35):

Hor stando inginocchiato in oratione,
Vide far' à color quel gioco strano:
E vengnegli si fatta tentatione, Ch'il Breviario gli cade di mano.

Whilst the holy hermit is on his knees, he spies the strange transaction between the two lovers, which raises such a ferment in his breast, that he lets his breviary fall out of his hand.

What would have become of him in a prelude: Admissus circum præcordia ludens (36)? Would he have had the resolution of St Aldhelme? But not to be too tedious, I shall speak of this saint in the remark [C] of the article FRANCIS of ASSISE.

[L] That monk's vivacity and zeal against the authors of such a charge is not to be wondered at. He takes several methods to do this: he denies the genuineness of the two letters; he maintains that Geoffry of Vendôme did not write that which goes under his name; and thinks it very strange that the Jesuit Sirmond should publish it as genuine, and should put in the index, mira Roberti simplicitas et confidentia. He disputes against father Alexander, who maintained that it was Geoffry of Vendôme's letter, and lays hold of that Dominican's confession that the letter ascribed to Marbodius is supposititious (37). He pretends (38) that the heretic Roscelin, condemned as a tritheist in a council, is the author of a letter that Sirmond has published among those of Geoffry of Vendôme. This is the opinion of cardinal Bona, and of the Jesuits Bollandus and Henschenius, as he does not forget to observe (39). He adds, that father Sirmond, having considered all things, came into the same sentiment (40). He quotes Theophilus Raynaud, who was of the same opinion (41). He blames father Alexander for denying that Sirmond had retracted and designed to have left out this letter in a new edition. He complains that this Jesuit did a great injury to the blessed Robert d'Arbrissel, and he alleges a passage out of father Theophilus Raynaud (42), which is founded only upon the letter published by father Sirmond. These are the words he quotes. 'Fecisse

'of the convent received him with joy, and treated him with the greatest honour and hospitality, most humbly intreating him to refresh their souls with the food of his holy preaching.' The passage in Marbodius's letter, cited by Mr Menage, and which may be seen below in remark [P], citation †, testifies that Robert was reproached with taking a great many women with him in his travels, and dispersing great numbers of them in divers provinces in the inns and hospitals promiscuously with the men, under pretence of serving the poor and strangers. It is added that this fine management had produced a sufficient number of children, to put it beyond all doubt that Robert had exposed the honour of his she-followers to very great danger.

[M] It is certainly a delicate point. Sins of uncleanness are not of the same nature with those that are to be vanquished by attacking, by preventing, and falling upon them. The surest way to obtain the victory is by a running fight, or rather a downright flight. Is it not then strange rashness, and a criminal contempt of that wise advice, Quiquis amat periculum peribit in illo, He that seeks danger will perish in it, to go and provoke to dangerous an enemy, and to attack him even in his strong holds. Arbrissel ought scarce to have looked him in the face, and he was rash enough to take him by the neck, as it is reported, in order to wrestle with him:

Cervi, luporum præda rapacium,
Sectamus ultro, quos opimus

Fallere & effugere est triumphus (49).

We feeble flag the rav'nous wolf defy,

And madly follow what we ought to fly:

To scape from such a foe is victory.

(49) Horat. Ode iv, lib. iv, vers. 50.

Those who make a vow of chastity, if they are wise, ought ardently to seek the gift of forgetfulness, and expel the images of impurity at their very entrance, so far from being allowed to lie near the living objects. Though they were sure of success, yet are they obliged to avoid such a combat like the plague: charity to one's neighbour enjoins such a flight. Are they sure of their she-companion? Is it not morally certain that a woman, who suffers a man to lie by her, is very much inclined to refuse him nothing? Is she not fortified in this disposition by the nearness of a man's body to her? and does not this neighbourhood raise thoughts and desires in her, which she would be free from if she was left to sleep alone (50)? See what Montagne (51) says of women married to old men. 'They are, says J.-P., Qui me be (51), in full wedlock in a worse condition than maids and widows. We think them well provided, because they have a man lying by them. . . . But on the contrary, they are therefore the more distressed, because the contact and company of a male excites that warmth which would be less moved if they were alone.' So that these devout adventurers, these seekers of alluring opportunities, these anchorites, who, to signalize the bravery of their continency, creep into bed with a young girl, only throw oil upon a fire hid under the ashes. Are they not answerable for the lascivious desires they kindle there? It is very probable that most of them do not desire a complete victory. If they do not fully satisfy, at least they amuse their filthy lust. They put themselves upon the same foot with those who say, Amare liceat, si potiri non licet. Est quodam prodeire tenet, si non datur ultra. Let us have a little moriel: let us enjoy the forestales. They do as those husbands mentioned in Seneca's controversies. 'Novimus, inquit, istam maritorum absinentiam, qui etiam si primam virginibus timidis remittere noctem, vicinis tamen locis ludunt (52). — I know, says he, that some husbands have had so much abstinence as to indulge the maid's fears the first night, yet they play about the confines.' It is therefore a nice point, and father de la Mainferme is to be commended for attempting the apology of the founder of his order.

[N] The truest triumph is to keep as far as possible from such an enemy. I have already touched upon this in the beginning of the preceding remark; but I ressume it, in order to fortify this salutary advice with good authorities. First let us see what Socrates advised his disciples. 'Thinkest thou, fool! says he (53), that amorous kisses are not poisoned, because thou dost not see the poison of them? know that a beautiful woman is a more dangerous animal than a scorpion, because that cannot wound us unless it touches us, but beauty strikes us at a distance; on what side soever we perceive it, it darts its venom upon us, and overthrows our reason. It is perhaps for this cause that love is represented with a bow and arrows, because a fine face wounds us from afar. Wherefore I advise thee, Xenophon, when thou spiest a beauty, to fly from it without looking behind thee, and as for thee, Critobulus, I believe it will be proper thou shouldst be absent a whole year, nor will that be too long a time to cure thee of thy wound.' Add to this what Jerom said to those who did not approve of a retirement into the desert, and who pretended that this was not to combat vice, but to fly from it, and that only those who combated and overcame deserved the crown. He answered among other things, that the safest way was always to be chosen, and that therefore it were better to fly than to remain in the field of battle, where, if on the one side we may be victorious, on the other we may also be overcome. We are not safe, added he, when we sleep near a serpent: it may happen that he will not bite us, and it may happen that he will. He expresses himself so well upon this head that I cannot forbear transcribing his own words, which are so many thunder-bolts, with respect to the conduct attributed to d'Arbissel. 'Qui sciens imbecillitatem suam, & vas fragile, quod portat, timet offendere, ne impingat, corrumpat, atque frangatur. Unde & mulierum, maximeque adolescentulatum vitat aspectum & in tantum castigatorem sui est, ut etiam quæ tuta sunt, pertimescat. Cur, inquires, pergis ad eremum? videlicet ut te non audiam, non videam, ut tuo furore non movear, ut tua bella non patiar, nè me capiat oculus meretricis; nè me forma pulcherrima ad illicitos ducat amplexus. Respondebis: hoc non est pugnare, sed fugere; ista in acie: adversarii armatus obstitit: ut postquam vicis, coroneris. Fateor imbecillitatem meam. Nolo te pugnare victoriæ, nè perdam aliquando victoriam. Si fugero, gladium devitavi; si stetero, aut vincendum mihi, aut cadendum. Quid autem necesse est certa dimittere, & incerta festari? Aut secuto, aut pedibus mors vitanda est. Tu, qui pugnare, & superari potes, & vincere; ego cum fugero, non vinco in eo, quod fugio: sed ideo fugio, nè vincam. Nulla securitas est, vicino serpente, dormire. Potest fieri, ut me non mordeat: tamen fieri potest ut aliquando me mordeat (54). — Who being conscious of his own infirmity, and sensible that the vessel which he carries is brittle, is afraid to make a false step, lest he should fall, and break it. For which reason he shuns the sight of women, especially of the younger sort, and keeps so strict a guard over himself as to be afraid in the midst of security. You will ask the reason of my retiring into solitude. It is that I may not hear, or see you, that I may not be moved with your fury, that I may not be exposed to a war with you, that no lewd eye may enslave me, that no ravishing beauty lead me to forbidden embraces. You will answer, this is not to fight but to fly; keep your rank, stand to your arms, that when you have conquered you may receive the crown. I own my weakness. I would not fight in hopes of victory, lest I should fail in the success. If I fly, I escape the sword. If I encounter, I must conquer or fall. But where is the necessity of quitting certainty and following uncertainty. Death may be avoided either by fighting or by flying. You who fight may be either conquered or a conqueror. I, who fly, do not conquer in that I fly; but I fly that I may not be conquered. No man can sleep in safety when a serpent is near him. It is possible it may not bite, and it is possible it sometimes may. The author of a book, printed at Paris in 1630, intitled Le Miroir des Chanoines, has collected together a great number of sentences which loudly condemn the rash behaviour of those who come as near danger as they can. Joseph, says he (55), left his mantle without staying to contend with Potiphar's wife, because the touch of a woman is contagious and venemous, and ought to be as much dreaded as the bite of a mad dog. This is St Jerome's comparison. Ipse mulieris contactus quasi contagiosus & venenatus est, viro fugiendus, non minus quam rabidissimi canis morsus (56). Our author adds that St Jordan, in St Antoninus's, severely rebukes a monk for only touching a woman's hand. Why, said the monk, she is a devout woman. No matter for that, replied St Jordan, the earth is good, and water is good: but if those two elements are mixed, from thence proceeds nothing but dirt St Jerome knowing what prejudice the conversation of Women, though free from suspicion and scandal, did to clergymen; Hospitalium tuum (says he) aut rari, aut nunquam mulierum pedes terant: quia non potest toto corde cum Deo habitare, qui fœminarum accessibus copulatur: fœmina secum pariter habitantis conscientiam exurit, fœminæ nomen tuum noverint, vultum nesciant. Let the feet of women seldom or never tread thy chamber floor, because he that delights in the conversation of women cannot devote his heart entirely to God. A woman burns the conscience of him she dwells with, let women know thy name, not thy face . . . nor do thou know theirs . . . St Cyprian subtilly and learnedly confutes those daring spirits, who presume upon their own integrity so much, that they fear nothing from women, generously hoping to come off clear without engaging in the least of their holy affections. His words are as follow: It is impossible to be surrounded with flames and not to be burnt; it is more expedient to fear well than to presume ill. It is better for a man to confess himself weak, that he may become strong, than to pretend to be strong and prove weak. He deceives himself, who thinks himself to be something and really is nothing. Who can carry fire in his bosom, and his cloaths not be burnt? true, but I would conquer that I may triumph. Hast thou not thy own flesh to contend with and overcome? why shouldst thou desire laurels from another climate? the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. Let it be said once for all. The conversation of women is the devil's bird-lime to catch and enslave men . . . (57) Horrid blindness! to chuse to live in a place where we must every day necessarily either perish or overcome, and to imagine to sleep safely near a viper. * Quid tibi necesse (says St Jerome) in ea versari demo, in qua necesse habes quotidie aut perire, aut vincere? * quis unquam mortalium, juxta viperam securos somnos capit? Our author afterwards, giving some prescriptions against the motions of the flesh, places abstinence in the first place, frequenting good company in the second, and then he says (58), that the third will be never to come near women, but to see them afar off, as Lacides, in Laërtius, told king Attalus he should look at pictures. . . . * St Austin upon these words of St Paul, fly fornication, observes that St Paul does not say resist, but fly, because victory is surer by flight than by resistance. Contra libidinis impetum apprehende fugam, si vis obtinere victoriam, nec tibi verendum sit fugere, si castitatis palmam desideras obtinere.

Defeat by flight, what flight alone defeats,

These maxims, so true and so important in themselves, and besides so considerable on account of the veneration that is paid to those great saints, who have laid them down in their writings, are very often inculcated into the minds of those who have most need of them. The same things are preached every day to them; they are pressed in an infinite number of books; and yet those persons continue in the custom of willingly exposing themselves to danger. One would think they set up for bravery, and that flight seems to them as ignominious an act of cowardice as lar men, who have passed whole nights in bed with women without enjoying them [O], with much more reason it ought to be supposed that a monk should be able to refrain upon such occasions. Mr Menage deserves to be consulted upon the proofs father de la Mainferme has rejected [P]. But more particularly should we consult the

it does to military men. They advance to the combat with boldness and cheerfulness. The fair sex, in whom courage is not required, yet shew a great deal of intrepidity upon this account: they are as ready to receive visits in their cloisters as the others are to pay them: both parties behave themselves as if neither feared to be vanquished, and it is very probable this security is not so much founded upon a knowledge of their own strength, as upon an unwillingness to come off victorious in this conflict; and at the worst the conflict itself, whatever may be the event of it, is not without its charms: if a victory follows, it is so much gained upon nature; if they are foiled, it is so much gained for her. Let this be said without prejudice to those, who sincerely keep the vows of chastity they have made, and who without doubt, if they do not happen to follow St Jerome's advice, are sure their visits, their long conversations, &c. will not excite ill desires in them. But they would infallibly condemn that excess of rashness which some have thought the founder of Fontevaux guilty of.

[O] There have been men, who have passed whole nights in bed with women without enjoying them. Montagne affirms this. 'I do not look upon it, says he (59),

(59) Montagne, Essais, lib. ii, cap. xi, pag. m. 272, 173.

(60) Id. ibid., cap. ii, pag. 21.

(61) That is Montagne's father.

'as a miracle, as the queen of Navarre does in one of the tales of her Heptameron, (a diverting book in its kind) nor a very difficult thing, to spend whole nights with the utmost freedom with a mistress long courted, and keep a promise of going no farther than mere kissing.' He says in another place (60), that his father would tell of strange intimacies, that he had had with very honest women without any suspicions. And as to himself, he swore (61) solemnly that he had known no woman before his wife, tho' he did not marry till he was thirty three years of age, and had been a long time in the Italian wars. If we may credit leud men, the case mentioned by this writer is nothing extraordinary. When these people are to tell their adventures, they protest they have sometimes been forced to proceed gradually, and have not been allowed the last favour, till they have been proved whether they would keep their promise of being contented with lesser ones. Some tell, without naming persons, they could have done what they would, but they have abstained, that they might not be embarrassed with ill consequences, or would not expose the woman to the dishonour she was afraid of. Let us grant to those, who would make use of such adventures, to make it probable that some Monks have been victorious over the most alluring opportunities; let us grant them, I say, that the passion of leud men is not always so impetuous, but that sometimes it will stop of itself by the consideration of certain circumstances: what use will they make of this to justify those Monks? do these debauchees refrain, without committing impurities, which in the judgment of moderate casuists come up to mortal sin, and sometimes in the opinion of other casuists to a sin exceeding that of enjoyment? if the pretended victory of these Monks was something of this nature, would it not really be the triumph of lust, and not of chastity? and in proceeding thus against them, we must not spare their she-companions: their rashness was still more unwarrantable than that of the men. Nor can the prudence of women, who thus expose themselves, be better defended than their chastity. Common prudence would tell them, that neither promises nor oaths are to be depended upon, but that they ought to secure themselves in a better way. This puts me in mind of an adventure I have read in a little book which was printed at Paris and in Holland in 1682. The story is this: the adventurer speaks; his name is Pontignan.

(62) Academie Galante, pag. 160. Holland Edit.

'I was in the country, says he (62), with two amiable ladies, and I loved them both after my manner. I had declared to each of them singly my kindness for them, and had no reason to be dissatisfied with their answer. One evening, as I was alone in my apartment, and in my night-gown, in came the two ladies, and told me that, to put a trick upon a gentleman, who was with us, they must swaddle me up. They told me what the trick was. I was pleased with the conceit, and contented very merrily to be swaddled. They took me in my night-gown just as I was, and wrapped me about with I believe more than a hundred ells of linnen, cut like swathes. I was just like an Egyptian mummy . . . when I was thus equipped like a mummy, they told me, well, Pontignan, a well bred gentleman does not refuse to lie with ladies when they desire him. We have both of us promised thee favours, which we are ready to grant. Ah! wicked creatures, cried I, take away these swathes, and do what you will with me. No, no, said they, those will be no hinderance: and upon that they ordered me to be carried to one of their houses, and put to bed all swaddled as I was, and the two gypsies placed themselves on each side of me. The chamber was full of lights, and I could see them in fine and alluring night dresses. I had neither hands, legs, nor any thing in the world at liberty.

'I was buried in linnen, and had only my eyes out, which made me mad. You may easily imagine the condition I was in: sometimes I begged them to let me have an arm, or hand, or only one finger. Sometimes I struggled hard to get free from my bands; so that once the ladies thought I had broke them, and jumped out of bed, crying out both of them, we are undone. They were in the right of it; for truly if I had been in a condition to have been revenged, I should have forced them to have cried for mercy. Sometimes I threatened to disgrace them by falling asleep by them, which yet I should have found it hard to have done. They only answered me by insulting me for the good fortune I lost, and by little caresses, for which I could freely have beaten them. I never passed such a night in my life.'

'This was a well contrived caution (63): (63) One might apply to this a parody of these two verses in Horace, lib. i, Epist. ii, ita facite proci that father de la Mainferme has rejected.

[P] Mr Menage deserves to be consulted concerning the proofs that father de la Mainferme has rejected. Bollandus, in his annotations on the life of R. d'Arbrissel, says, that father Sirmond, who published Geoff. fry of Vendôme's letters, repented he had made that public which we have mentioned, judging it spurious after a strict examination, and that he signed to give notice of the same in a second edition. But I can assure you, that father Sirmond never had any such design, nor ever repented the publishing the said letter. I knew him intimately and long, even to his death. Mr Pavillon in the preface to his history of R. d'Arbrissel, says (64) Supposing that this letter of Geoffry of Vendôme, not being to be found in the manuscript of the monastery of Vendôme, as father Sirmond knew well, and plainly insinuates, it ought to be suspected (65). Mr Menage, having mentioned some other things, and particularly the certificate of Vincent Marfole, goes on thus: 'Since he affirms that letter was not in the manuscript, I am persuaded it was not there when he affirmed it. But on the other hand, as narration than the father Sirmond, who is a man of the utmost sincerity, and who had seen that manuscript, has not observed in his notes upon that letter, that it was not in the manuscript, and never told me so, tho' I have talked with him more than once upon the letter, I am also firmly persuaded that it was there, when father Sirmond printed his Geoffry of Vendôme. Therefore it must have been torn out afterwards at the request of Joanna Baptista de Bourbon, legitimate daughter of France, abbess of Fontevaux; at whose desire also Theophilus Raynaud retracted in his Trias fortium David, what he had wrote concerning R. d'Arbrissel in his De sobria utriusque sexus conversatione: this was told me by father Commire the Jesuit. And what serves to convince me, that it was torn out, is, that they no longer shew the said manuscript, but tell you, in the abbey of Vendôme, that they know not what is become of it. But what sufficiently refutes the Apologetical dissertation for the blessed Robert d'Arbrisselles . . . concerning what I have said of him in the first edition of this work. It is an apology so well turned, and so solid [Q.], that every reasonable man ought to acquiesce in it; and though I have sufficiently shewed, that I did not give any credit to the common reports of sharing a bed, &c. I declare here, that wherever I mention it, without adding my own opinion, I desire to be so understood. They reckon thirty two, or thirty three abbesses of Frontevaux, from Petronilla de Chemille, who was the first, to the present abbess (k) [R]. The order is divided into four provinces [S], in each of which they have several priories.

(k) La Mainferme, Tom. III, pag. 172.

* opinion of Bollandus, Theophilus Renaud, Cofnier, Pavillon, and father de la Mainferme, is, that Marbodius, a man of great virtue, who, from a school-master of the church of Angers, was made bishop of Rennes, and afterwards became a Monk of St. Aubin of Angers, wrote such a letter to Robert d'Arbrissel. This letter is to be seen in the collection of Marbodius's letters printed at Rennes. It is true that, in a manuscript of the letters of Ildebert, bishop of Mans, and archbishop of Tours, which is in the library of St. Victor at Paris, the same letter is attributed to Ildebert. And Mr Baluze, who has promised us an edition of Ildebert's works, thinks it is rather Ildebert's than Marbodius's. But in this I am not of his opinion, hardly believing that Ildebert, who was charged himself with loving women, should accuse Robert d'Arbrissel of the same thing.

But tho' the letter should be Ildebert's, yet it would prove what I intended it to prove, which is, that Arbrissel was looked upon as a man fond of women. And this I prove also by one Petrus Salmurienfis. This Peter of Saumur, who was a Monk of St. Florant, wrote something like Geoffry of Vendôme's letter. This piece was in our time in the hands of father Vignier of the Oratory; who suppressed it at the request of Joanna Baptista de Bourbon, abbess of Frontevaux. This I had from Mr de Herouval, Dom Luke d'Acheri, and Mr de St Beuve; all men worthy of credit, to whom father Vignier told these particulars. But let all this be laid without any prejudice to the memory of Rob. de Arbrissel, for which I have a great veneration, being persuaded that the report concerning him, and on account of which Geoffry, the abbot of Vendôme, Marbodius bishop of Rennes, and Peter the monk of St. Florant, had written the things abovementioned, is without any true foundation. As Robert d'Arbrissel had instituted a monastery of women, to whom he had subjected the men; which du Moulin, in his notes upon the decree, has expressed in this manner: "In Monasterio Fontis Ebraaldi, adhuc præpositore Monachi sunt infæmæ, Monachæ verò sunt supæne." In the monastery of Frontevaux, the Monks are preposterously placed under, and the Nuns above. And as this institution seemed contrary to St Paul's words, that women are not to rule over men, it was thought he loved women; and this gave birth to certain jests upon him, and from those jests arose the scandalous report. Mr Menage in his additions (66) informs the public, that the letter of Geoffry abbot of Vendôme to Robert d'Arbrissel is found in the manuscript of the letters of that abbot, which is in the Franciscans library of S. Croix of Florence. This puts it past all doubt, that it is that author's: for it is also in the manuscript of the abbey of la Couture at Mans, but in a different order from that of Florence. It is the first in the latter manuscript, and the forty seventh of the fourth Book in the other. Mr Menage adds to the authority of these manuscripts two arguments from the letter itself. Mr Magliabechi informed him of what concerned the manuscript of Florence.

The reader need not be told what reflexions he ought to make upon the complaisance shewn to an abbess of Frontevaux, who was a legitimate daughter of France. At her desire an original piece is torn out of an old manuscript. How many other pieces have been suppressed to gratify several people? on the other hand, how many have been forged? how many words have been razed out of manuscripts to substitute others in their stead? see a book printed in 1699, and intitled Lettres Critiques où l'on voit les Sentimens de Monsieur Simon sur plusieurs Ouvrages nouveaux publiés par un Gentilhomme Alleman. Have not several facts by this means been turned into meer problems, and made matter of dispute without being ever determined.

[Q.] It is an apology (67) so well turned and so solid. It is in the form of a letter, which they have done me the honour to address to me, and contains 315 pages in 12ves. The civility, politeness, wit, and learning, of the author shine with great splendor in it, and I am very sorry I am so little worthy of the encomiums so ingenious a writer compliments me with. His work consists of nine articles, which he has proved in a manner, as I am informed, very much to the satisfaction of the world. I. That Geoffry's contested letter is really his, and is even in the manuscript of Vendôme (68). II. That the letter imputed to Marbodius, bishop of Rennes, or to Ildebert, bishop of Mans, and afterwards archbishop of Tours, belongs to neither of those two authors, and is more probably Roscelin's. III. That at the worst it is evidently proved, that those three prelates had always a constant and uninterrupted esteem for that holy founder, and believed the quite contrary to that report spread of him by obscure and unknown people. IV. That the letter said to be written by Peter de Saumur, let it be what it will, concludes nothing to his disadvantage, no more than a fragment of a council of Albi, against the Albigenes. V. That all those writings were founded upon meer HEARSAY, without any shadow of proof, or even probability; that every confederate reader ought to despise uncertain rumours, which were spread abroad, when compared with an infinite number of positive evidences which can be brought to the contrary. VI. That the boldness with which Robert preached and exclaimed against the vices of the great men and ecclesiastics, together with his actions at the councils of Poitiers and Baugency, are a triumphant proof of his innocence and purity. VII. That even those, who are pretended to be his enemies, may be brought as witnesses in his behalf. VIII. That it would be very surprizing that a man, who openly had defiance to so many sinners, should not at least have made them murmur; and that, being so generally esteemed, it is impossible but some must envy him: but he forced even envy itself to respect him. IX. That his death, as well as his piety, at last crowns all these proofs. That from all together results a plain evidence of the falsehood of the new kind of martyrdom imputed to him; and is sufficient absolutely to destroy the least suspicions in all judicious and considering minds.

[R] They reckon thirty two or thirty three abbesses of Frontevaux . . . to the present abbess. (69) She is Mary Magdalen Gabriele Adelaide de Rochechouart, daughter of the duke of Mortemart, and sister to the marshal de Vivonne. She was made abbess of the order in 1670 (70). She is a lady of extraordinary merit: I am assured by several persons, who have had the honour to see, and converse with her, that she is universally admired for the agreeableness, the strength, and solidity of her discourse. Her virtue and knowledge (71), and other shining qualities, give her a place among the most illustrious persons of the age. Read, in the third volume of the Clypeus nascentis Font-Ebraaldensis Ordinis, page 192 and 193, the encomiums which are given her in the dedication of a dramatic piece.

She died the fifteenth of August 1704. See her elogy in the Memoirs of Trevoux, December 1704, page 2118, and following.

[S] The order is divided into four provinces. Which are those of France, Aquitaine, Auvergne, and Brétagny. There are fifteen priories in the first, fourteen in the second, fifteen in the third, and thirteen in the fourth (72).

FONTIUS (BARTHOLOMEW) born at Florence, was one of the learned men of the XVth century. He wrote some books which are printed [A]. Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary, honoured him with his friendship, and gave him the direction of the famous library of Buda. Picus Mirandula, Marfilus Ficinus, Jerome Donatus, Robert Salviati, and other learned men of that age, had a respect for him, if we may credit the two verses of Verin, which I have inserted in the remark. He taught rhetoric successfully in his own country.

To assign the time when he taught rhetoric in his own country, I should have said that he was Politian's colleague in 1488. Gaddi gives a good proof of this (a).

[A] He wrote some books which are printed. Among Picus Mirandula's letters there is one written by Fontius to Robert Salviati (1), to thank him for a book (2) he had sent him. One of Fontius's chief works is his Commentary upon Persius, printed at Venice, in 1491. The abbreviators of Gesner's Bibliotheca, only mention this Commentary as a manuscript kept in the emperor's library; but, as Gaspar Massi (3) upbraids them with it, they did not know that it had been printed about a hundred years before. The public were better pleased with Fontius's harangues than with his Commentary (4). A collection of his works was printed at Franckfort in 1621, in which is inserted the life of Paul Ghiaccetti. The two verses I mentioned are as follow:

Fontius est Rhetor pubis moderator Hetruscæ,
Judicio & nulli morum pietate secundus.

Fontius, preceptor to the Tuscan youth,
For rhet'ric sam'd, for judgment, and for truth.

FORBES (PATRIC) in Latin Forbesius, a Scotch Gentleman in the XVIIth century, devoted himself to an ecclesiastical life. By the persuasions of his bishop he was prevailed upon to undertake the service of a private cure in the country (a). He was then forty eight years of age. He discharged his duty so worthily, that a few years afterwards he was promoted to the bishopric of Aberdeen, which he held about seventeen years. It was with great difficulty that king James made him accept of that dignity, and for several months he refused it, having proposed to himself to live in a less conspicuous state. It was soon seen how much he deserved to be a bishop; and that his refusal was not counterfeit, but the real effect of his humility. In all his behaviour he has displayed the character of a truly apostolical man (b). We shall see this more particularly here-under [A]. He died in 1635, at the age of seventy one years (c). He wrote something upon the apocalypse (d).

[A] We shall see this more particularly here-under. He visited his diocese without pomp and noise, attended only by one servant, that he might more easily be informed of what belonged to his care. When he was told of the negligence or weakness of any his clergy, he would go and lodge near his church upon Saturday in the evening, without making himself known, and the next day, when he was in the pulpit, he would go and hear him, that by this he might be able to judge what his common sermons were, and as they appeared to him he encouraged or admonished him. He took so much care of two colleges he had in his diocese, that they soon distinguished themselves, and became famous all over Scotland; and when the church was involved in troubles, it appeared by the writings that came out against the covenant, that none but the doctors of those colleges were able to defend her cause; and though they were the first that entered the lists in that famous controversy, yet hitherto we have seen nothing that has eclipsed or excelled their writings. Their exemplary piety, and profound erudition, were equally beneficial and honourable to that diocese. . . . He commonly assembled his clergy twice a year, and before he entered upon any business, he made them a short speech to excuse his own infirmities, and told them, that if they observed any defect in his conduct, if his errors were secret, they might privately reprove him, or before the whole assembly, if they were public, in the manner they should think proper. Then he retired a little, lest his presence should hinder particular persons from speaking. There never was but one turbulent fellow that abused this liberty, for which he was reprimanded by every body, except the bishop, who treated him with that civility his character required (1). This I have taken from the famous Dr Burnet now bishop of Salisbury's preface to the Life of William Bedell.

FORBES (JOHN) son of the preceding, was of a much more extensive learning than his father, in which perhaps he was excelled by none of that age: Those who shall read his book of historical and theological institutions, will not dispute this title with him; for it is so excellent a work, that if he had been left in quiet in the retirement he had chose, to apply himself to his studies, and could have finished it by a second volume, it would perhaps have been the most valuable treatise of divinity that has yet appeared in the world. He filled the professor's chair (a) which his father had founded (b) when the covenanters expelled him, and forced him to fly beyond sea. The letter he wrote to Vossius, dated from Amsterdam the seventeenth of January 1645, and that which Vossius wrote to him some months after, are worth considering [A]. Note, there was one FORBES, a Scotchman, and a great puritan, who was expelled his country in the beginning of the XVIIth century, and took shelter in Holland, where he hotly opposed the Arminians (c).

I add, that having continued in Holland a little above two years, he returned to his country, where he spent the remainder of his life upon his estate of Corfe, and died there the twenty ninth of April 1648 (d). There was an edition of all his works in

(1) It is the 402d among those written to Vossius.

[A] The letter he wrote to Vossius . . . and Vossius's letter to him, are worth considering. The letter he wrote to Vossius (1) accompanied a copy of a Latin treatise he presented to him, which he had published, wherein he shewed, that the doctrine of St Augustin, concerning grace, was agreeable to the constant doctrine of the Catholic church. He excused himself to Vossius, that he was not of his opinion. I never saw the answer to it; but Vossius's letter (2), that I mentioned, is in the collection printed at London.

FORBES (WILLIAM) bishop of Edinburgh in the XVIIth century, was born at Aberdeen in Scotland, where he went through his classical learning and philosophy. At sixteen years of age he was master of arts, and presently after professor of logic, which office he discharged for four years with great success. He applied himself strenuously to defend Aristotle's logic against the cavils of the Ramists. Afterwards he travelled, and made a prodigious progress in divinity and Hebrew in the universities of Germany, during the four years he continued in that country. After this he visited the university of Leyden, and got the esteem of all the great men who flourished there. The ill state of his health not permitting him to undertake a journey into France and Italy as he designed, he went over to England. The same of his learning soon spreading there, the university of Oxford offered him a professorship in the Hebrew tongue. He did not accept of it, for the physicians advised him to return to his native country. The magistrates of Aberdeen expressed a particular esteem for him. He recovered his health and accepted the cure of Alford in the diocese of Aberdeen. His stay in this parish was but short; his great learning, eloquence, and piety, requiring a more conspicuous station. Being called to preach in his own country, he accepted the call, and discharged the duty of a true minister of the gospel. He was admitted doctor of divinity, when king James, among other things, had agreed with the deputies of the clergy (a), that the academical dignities and degrees should be restored to their ancient course. The ministerial functions, and preaching, impairing his health, they assigned him a less toilsome employment, by making him principal of Marshal college. He read lectures three times a week, as the statutes required, and was afterwards declared dean of the faculty of divinity, and then rector of the university; a post immediately next to the chancellor. The city of Edinburgh invited him to be their pastor: he humbly thanked them for this mark of their esteem, but at length was forced to accept of it, the supreme council, and the provincial synod, having ordered him to do so. He was received at Edinburgh with all possible signs of friendship; but the tempers of men being afterwards altered [A], he withdrew from that flock, and returned into his own country, where he was passionately desired. Some years after he was sent for by king Charles I, who had been crowned with great pomp at Edinburgh in 1633. He preached before this prince with so much eloquence and learning, that he was admired by the whole auditory. The king, having founded an episcopal church at Edinburgh, found no body so worthy to fill the new see as our Forbes. He was consecrated with the usual ceremonies, and applied himself entirely to the functions of his dignity; but he fell sick soon after, and died the first of April 1634, having enjoyed his bishopric only three months. He was forty nine years of age (b). He had printed nothing, and composed but very little. He wrote a tract tending to pacify controversies [B], which was printed in 1658, and reprinted at Helmstad in [A] The tempers of men being altered.] The difference of opinions concerning episcopacy was the cause of this alteration. The pastor taught, that bishops are above priests: the people did not believe this episcopal primacy, being violently attached to the discipline of Geneva, and zealous for the equality of ministers. Forbes maintained modestly and solidly in his sermons, that the primacy of bishops is not a humane institution, but founded upon the word of God, the practice of the apostles, and the custom of the primitive church. His auditors rejected this doctrine, reproaching their pastor, and charging him with Popery. (1). When he found that his labours were unprofitable to his flock, and that it was only seed sown upon a barren ground, he resolved to lay down his charge, and the rather because his lean and macerated body could hardly bear the smoke of Edinburgh, without great danger (2). I act herein only the part of a translator, without interposing my judgment in the dispute between the Episcopians and Presbyterians.

[B] He composed little: he wrote a tract tending to pacify controversies.] The title of this book is, Considerationes modestae & pacificae controversiarum de justificatione, purgatorio, invocatione sanctorum, & CHRISTO mediatore, Eucharistia (3). It will not be unacceptable to infer here the character the author of his life has given of it: "Opus hoc posthumum, quod jam in lucem prodit, est pacati ingenii & moderati animi ingens specimen & indicium: in quo tanquam alter Cassander & Catholicus moderator, rigidus & austerus, utriusque tam reformatae quam pontificae partis, opinionibus in quibusdam religionis controversiis, componere, saltem mitigare satagit. Quanti moderatio-

nem fecerit ostendens dicto illo frequenter ab ipso usurpato: Si plures fuissent Cassandri & Wicelii, non opus fuisset Luthero aut Calvino (4). — This posthumous work, which now appears in public, is an extraordinary proof and specimen of moderation, and a pacific temper, wherein, like a second Cassander and Catholic moderator, he strenuously labours to compose, or at least to mitigate, the rigid and austere opinions, both of the reformed and romanists. The great regard he had for moderation sufficiently appears by that common saying of his; that had there been more Cassander's and Wicelii's, there would have been no occasion for a Luther or a Calvin. These last words are not relished by zealous and hot men: they are a tacit censure upon Luther and Calvin; they seem to blame them for having carried a thousand things to extremities, which moderate men, such as Cassander and Wicelius, would have tolerated for the sake of peace. Observe that he had filled the margin of Belarmin's four volumes with notes. These notes were so well liked by Robert Baron, professor in divinity in William Forbes's place, that he preferred them to all that had been published against that Jesuit. He would have published them if death had not prevented him. For the rest, the resolution our prelate took not to write much was very good, and as solid as the advice he gave to one who used a great deal of paper. Read more, said he, and write less. Pauca scripsit, scire enim maluit quam scribere, & hoc differtur scripturienti cuidam, & ei magnos labores ostentanti, lepide sed solide usurpavit: Lege plura, & scribe pauciora (5). The number of excellent writers would not be so small as it is, if those, who at length acquire a talent of writing well, could bring themselves to a resolution of publishing but once in four years; but they abuse the facility of writing they have obtained, and injure their reputation, by heaping volume upon volume: they will not be at the trouble of revising and polishing, and therefore do nothing that is good, or that comes near the merit of their first performances. To conclude, I believe that, if the man who wrote so much had come some time after, and told William Forbes, I have followed your advice, I have read such and such a number of books, he would have given him this farther advice, for the future, read less and meditate more. I have heard say that Mr Claude advised a very learned person, who had been a prodigious reader, to be three or four years without reading any thing, and to do nothing but meditate: as if he had said, you have eat enough, now digest. Those who are called belluones librorum have need of this advice.

1704 (c). We shall see below what the bishop of Salisbury says of the merit of this prelate [C]. Mr le Fevre, doctor of the Sorbonne, made an ill choice of his witnesses, when he quoted the opinion of William Forbes, to prove that the Calvinists do not adhere to the decisions of the synod of Dort. Monf. Arnauld knew how to make the most of his advantage on this occasion [D].

[C] We shall see below what the bishop of Salisbury has said of the merit of this prelate. William Forbes was also one of the doctors of Aberdeen: while king Charles was in Scotland, he was promoted to the bishopric of Edinburgh, which that prince had then founded, and this gave him occasion to say that he had met so excellent a clergyman, that he deserved to have a new episcopal see erected for him, and indeed he was a great and sublime divine. . . . He preached with so much zeal and ardour, that frequently forgetting the measure of time, he continued his sermons for two or three hours: this toil greatly diminished his strength, together with his fasting and ascetic way of life, which he carried to such a height, that he took no more nourishment than was just sufficient to retard his death, which happened one year after his promotion to a bishopric. He enjoyed this dignity long enough to exhibit the virtues of an excellent minister in his person, but too little a while to perform what might have been expected from a longer life. The few books he published are a sufficient proof of his great and extensive learning, though his ardent desire after peace and unity among Christians, made him too favourable to a great many corruptions in the church of Rome: Thus an unlimited charity engages great men to entertain imprudent opinions; but when the principle or motive they act by is truly good, they ought to be excused, or at least censured with moderation (6).

[D] Mr Arnauld knew how to make the most of his advantage on this occasion. He had maintained in his great book of the overthrow of morality, that the in-

missibility of grace, or impossibility of falling from grace, was an article of faith among the Calvinists determined by the synod of Dort. Mr le Fevre opposed this assertion, and endeavoured to prove that the Calvinists were at liberty to believe what they pleased concerning it. He cited several Protestant writers who did not hold the inmissibility of grace, and particularly William Forbes. Let us see what Mr Arnauld replied to this (7): 'The very title of William Forbes's book ought to have convinced Mr le Fevre that he was not a fit person to be objected to me. For he was the most moderate and equitable of those pacific episcopians, who, desiring a union between the Catholics and Protestants, made no difficulty to declare for the Catholics against the Calvinists, when they believed the Calvinists were in the wrong, as he himself believed they were in several points of controversy he has handled. Therefore in the abridgment of his life, in the beginning of his book, he is called another Cassander. . . . His friends durst not publish his book till 1658, twenty years after his death: and yet, long before it appeared, he was hated by the Calvinists, as one that maintained against them the Arminian doctrine of the inmissibility of faith, probably because he could not forbear saying in his sermons, that, when the presbyterians undertook the ruin of episcopacy, being supported by the parliament rebels, one of the reproaches they threw upon Laud, the unhappy archbishop of Canterbury, was, that he encouraged Arminianism; and the proof they brought of it is, that he persuaded the king to promote to the bishoprics of Scotland, men who had hardly any thing to distinguish them, but being known to be zealous Arminians, such, said they, as was Forbes promoted by that king to the see of Edinburgh. This liberty which he took to dislike the Geneva opinions made him so obnoxious to Calvin's party, that, having been called to Edinburgh, to be pastor there, before it was erected into a bishopric, those who were the most powerful in that city could not bear him, and branded him with the name of Papist.' This, and other things specified by Mr Arnauld, shew so evidently that our Forbes's private sentiments, concerning the inmissibility of grace, cannot be brought as a proof that the Calvinists are at liberty to reject that doctrine, that it is unnecessary to inquire what Mr le Fevre answered; for it may easily be supposed that it could not be to the purpose. And indeed his reply is so weak that I will not relate it (8).

FOULQUES, prior of Deuil in the XIIth century, was an intimate friend of Peter Abelard. He is little known, I believe, but by the consolatory letter (a) he wrote to that friend upon the loss of his privities. We have given an account in another place (b) of the violence done to Abelard, who, instead of well instructing his pupil, had got her with child. This young woman's relations, to be more completely revenged, went to the very root of the evil, and plucked it up so well, that they put it out of the power of the criminal ever to relapse. Foulques, knowing that Abelard was inconsolable on account of this mutilation, wrote him a letter, wherein he set out all the advantages that might accrue to him from such a misfortune. He represented to him, that his great gifts, the subtilty of his wit, his eloquence and learning, which drew an admirable number of auditors to him from all parts [A], had filled

cens, & undarum procella terribilis non terrebat, sed omni periculo contempto, auditu tuo nomine ad te confluebat. Remota Britannia sua animalia erudenda destinabat. Andegavorum eorum edomita feritate tibi famulabantur in suis. Pictavi, Wascones, & Hiberni: Normannia, Flandria, Theutonicus & Suevius tuum colere ingenium, laudare & predicare assidue studebat. Præterea cunctos Parisiorum civitatem habitantes, & intra Galliarum proximas & remotissimas partes qui sic à te docere studebant, ac si nihil disciplinæ non apud te inveniri potuissent. — Rome transmitted her sons to your tuition, and she, who formerly infused into her pupils the knowledge filled him with unsufferable vanity. He gently touches upon another thing that had not a little contributed to make him so proud, which was, that the women ran after him [B], and gloried in making a conquest of him. He told him, the loss he had sustained would cure him of his pride, and deliver him from the snares of women, which had reduced him to very great want [C], though his profession was worth a great deal of

of all arts, did, by committing her scholars to your care, own the superiority of your wisdom. No distance of climate, no height of mountains, no depth of valleys, no ways however difficult or dangerous to travellers have prevented them from hastening to you. The interposition of seas, the threats of storms and tempests, could not deter the British youth, when they had once heard your name, from crowding to you. Remote Bretagne determined to shake off her savage ignorance. Anjou having softened her native fierceness learned from you to obey. Poitou, Gascon, and Spain; Normandy, Flanders, and Germany, owned, courted, and continually extolled the greatness of your genius. All the inhabitants of Paris, all the people in France, whether neighbouring or remote, had such an insatiable desire of being instructed by you, that they seemed to think all discipline was engrossed by you. Foulques is not the only one that mentions this great affluence of scholars. There is a chronicle writer (1)

(1) Auctor Chronici Morinensis, apud And. du Chesne, Not. in Bibl. Colbert. Abelardi, pag. 2155.

— Peter Abelard, monk and abbot, was a man of great piety, and a master of excellent schools, which were crowded by learned men, from almost all parts of the Latin world. It cannot be denied they came some of them from beyond the Alps, since St Bernard writes that Peter Abelard had nothing to fear, because he believed he had protectors at the court of Rome among the cardinals, and other ecclesiastics that had studied under him. Securus tamen est quoniam cardinales & clerici curiae se discipulos habuisse gloriatur (2). Cardinal Gui du Chatel, who was afterwards Pope Celestine II (3), was one of these patrons. If you consult Abelard himself upon the number of his disciples, you will find, that when he retired into the country, he was followed by such crowds of scholars, that they could get neither lodgings nor provisions enough for them: Ad quas (scholas) tanta scholarum multitudo confluit, ut nec locus hospitii, nec terra sufficeret alimentis (4).

[C] . . . Women reduced him to very great want.] Foulques, who had heard say that Abelard was so poor, when this misfortune happened to him, that he had nothing but rags to cover him, begs him to consider what great damage that little part of his body, which was cut off, had been to him, and how much he would save and get by losing it. You ruined yourself, says he; by your leud intrigues; all your estate was swallowed up by that abominable gulf. 'Hæc corporis particula quam omnipotentis Dei judicio & beneficio perdidisti, quantum tibi nocuerat ac nocere quamdiu permansit non desistebat, melius tuarum diminutio rerum quam mea possit monstrare oratio, docet. Quicquid verè scientiæ tuæ venditione perorando præter quotidianum victum & usum necessarium, sicut relatione didici, acquirere poterat, in voraginem fornicariæ consumptionis demergere non cessabas. Avara meretricum rapacitas cuncta tibi rapuerat. Nulla audierunt secula meretricum velle alteri misereri, vel perpericulis rebus appetitorum quas quoquo modo auferre potuerunt. Videtur hoc probare tua profunda paupertas, qui nihil, ut dicitur, præter pannos ex tanto quæstu habebas, cum his primis casibus subiacuisti fortunæ. . . . Adde quod pecunia tua si quam tibi habere licuerit (non enim est monachorum sine licentia proprium quid habere) vexationi distrahendum non erit obnoxia. A modo incipies possidere quod multis paulo ante distrahebatur eviscerationibus. — The diminution of your fortune is a more ample testimony, than any thing I can say, of the mischiefs continually brought upon you by that troublesome member, which by GOD's good will and favour you have now lost. All the fruits of your labours, and the produce of your knowledge, except what was laid out on a bare subsistence, was perpetually sunk in the all-craving gulf of fornication. The rapacious avarice of leud women stripped you of all. No age ever heard of a wretch that knew compassion, or that spared the fortune of her followers, if she could get it into her power. Your extreme poverty seems to be a proof of what I advance; since, if report be true, you had nothing to shew of all your vast income, except a few old cloaths, when you lay under those circumstances.

. . . Besides all this, your money, if you be allowed to have any (for the monks without permission cannot call any their own) will no longer be subject to the depredations of those rovers. From hence forward you will begin to enjoy what lately was embroiled by the most lavish profusion.' No doubt common report had amplified things: I cannot think that Abelard at the time of his disaster was reduced to the condition of the prodigal son, who, having spent his living among harlots (5), was ready to perish with hunger (6). I confess his comforter does not represent him as actually reduced to a bit of bread; but only in general as brought to rags. Nay it may be objected that it is more probable a leud fellow should ruin himself to such a degree, as to want cloaths rather than food; for the same leeches, that suck out his money, are glad he should be lusty: it is their interest that he feeds well; but his cloaths are nothing to them; it is to their damage if he is not vigorous, and they would rather supply him with food, than let him starve. Yet I believe Foulques had heard that Abelard was so ruined by women, that he wanted both nourishment and cloaths: I do not suppose Foulques minded those subtle distinctions between diet and cloaths (7); but I am sure he gave too much credit to fabulous stories; for though it should not be supposed that Abelard's profession, and marriage with Heloïsa, kept him within bounds, yet it is hard to think that a handsome man as he was, a fine speaker, a subtle logician, in great repute, loved by the women, should have spent upon them the last penny. A man of wit in his place, and acquainted with the world, would perhaps have got more money than he spent in such a way. But here was Abelard's mistake: he knew nothing of the practices of the loose world, he was a scholar: and therefore, though he returned the ladies love for love, he knew not how to increase his income by it. He was a man to be fleeced on all hands.

I fancy it may be affirmed without rashness, that our Foulques was but little acquainted with the old poet Archilochus, and little versed in Ælian: yet he makes use of a thought something like an expression in Archilochus quoted by Ælian. Πολλάκις τὰ κατ' ὄρεσιν μετὰ πολλῶν πόνων συναχθέντα χρηματά, κατὰ τὸν Αρχιλοχόν, εἰς πόρνης γυναικὸς ἔντεσιν καταρυσσίν (8). The translator has not fully hit upon the meaning of the Greek poet: the word ἔντεσιν there signifies a purse only in a metaphorical sense: the learned Kühnius saw it very well: κακῆμενον, says he (9), & sensus turpitudinis subest voci ἔντεσιν. Ita Stoici τὴν συνείσταν προφύλακτον εὐθυμίας ἀποκαλεῖν ἔντεσιν παρατελεῖν, ἔσθ, Nicetas Choniates applies this thought of Archilochus to the reign of Alexis Manuel Comnenus (10): Τὸ τὸν Αρχιλόχου ἀντικρὺς ἐπεσείνετο, ὃ φησιν, εἰς ἔντεσιν πόρνης πολλάκις μεταρρυσσέσθαι τὰ χρόνῳ συλλεγόμενα μακρῶ. Ut plane id fieret quod Archilochus scribit ea sæpe in scorti pudenda confluere quæ longo labore & tempore sint congesta.

— That saying of Archilochus was entirely verified, namely that the produce of many years hard labour is often sunk in a wretch's lap. Foulques's expression, in voraginem fornicariæ consumptionis demergere non cessabas of money to him. He assured him the loss of those parts, he had made an ill use of, would stifle several passions in him that torment other men. That he would now be at liberty to keep his thoughts collected within himself, instead of suffering them to wander upon a thousand lascivious subjects. He adds, that his meditations being no longer interrupted by the emotions of the flesh, he would be better able to discover the secrets of nature, and the reasons of things; besides, that he would not now ruin himself by intrigues, nor his purse be again the prey of those vile and voracious courtizans, who knew so well how to fleece him (c). He reckons it as a great advantage to him, that for the future he would not be the terror of any husband (D), but might safely lodge any where; for being out of the reach of suspicion from his landlord, he would be a welcome guest in all houses, and screened from jealousy. He does not forget to tell him, that he might go in and out among the best dressed ladies, and view the most beautiful maids, without the least danger or fear of those criminal temptations, with which the sight of such objects can fire even the breasts of old men themselves. He congratulates him upon being freed from those impure illusions which invade our sleep (E);

(7) These distinctions might do, supposing that a woman could not get another gallant; but Abelard was at Paris, where if a gallant has not money, he is neglected, and others look for, who can maintain a mistress, and then the diet of the first is as little minded as his cloaths.

effabaz, may also be compared with a passage in Sidonius Apollinaris, where the like extravagance is called sumptuositas domesticæ Charybdis. The passage is good, and describes the behaviour of a young man, who, after having ruined himself by profligate women, at length opened his eyes, and forsaking his infamous intrigues married a good fortune. The author would have had his change more holy, and that from debauchery he should have passed to continence; but, says he, few men can go such lengths at first, and immediately deny themselves every thing, who have been accustomed to the most abandoned liberties. 'Hic proximè abrupto contubernio ancillæ propudiosissimæ, cui se totum consuetudine obscenæ junctus addixerat, patrimonio, posteris, famæ subitâ sui correctione consuluit. Namque per rei familiaris damna vacuatus, ut primum intelligere cepit, & retractare quantum de bonisculis avitis paternisque sumptuositas domesticæ charybdis abligurisset, quamquam serò respiciens, attamen tandem veluti frænos momordit, excussitque cervicem, atque Ulyxeas (ut ferunt) ceras auribus figens, fugit adversum vitia furdus, meretricii blandimenta naufragii: puellamque (prout decuit) intactam vir laudandus in matrimonium assumpsit, tam moribus natalibusque summatem, quam facultatis principalis. Effet quidem gloria, si voluptates sic reliquisset, ut nec uxori conjugaretur: sed est forte contingat ad bonos mores ab errore migrare, paucorum est incipere de maximis: & eos qui diu totum indulerint sibi, protinus totum & pariter incidere

(11) Having broke off all commerce with his infamous maid, to whose leud embraces he had before abandoned himself, by this sudden and happy change he consulted his interest, his reputation, and the honour of his family; for being reduced by the frequent damages which his fortune had sustained, no sooner did he begin to consider what sums had been swallowed up by this domestic Charybdis, though his repentance was late, yet, having at last broke his reins, and disengaged himself, like Ulysses, he filled his ears with wax, became deaf to the music of vice, and the charms of a wanton syren. Having gained so noble a conquest over himself, he then married, and, as prudence directed, chose a maid of spotless virtue, whose family and fortune might claim the highest regard. The conquest however had still been more glorious, had he so far subdued his desires as not to have married; but tho' it sometimes happens that a man may bid adieu to his error, yet very few at the first spring rise to the heights of virtue, and, after they have allowed themselves an unlimited indulgence, cut it entirely short at once. See Rigaltius, and Gudius's notes upon a passage of Phædrus (12), where you will find a great many sentences concerning the address with which a leud woman reduces her gallants to beggary. Foulques was not ignorant of this truth, and he believed Abelard had experienced the same. He could not have expressed himself more strongly, even though he had been in a condition to profit by reading Signor Stefano Guazzo, who has the following words. 'So no più dannose le donne vecchie che le giovani, perché secondo il volgar detto, la capra giovane mangia il sale, & la vecchia mangia il sale, e' l'faccio . . . così alla fine vi risolverete, che siamo posti al mondo dalle donne, per esser ruinati dalle donne: Et perciò diceva un melchino, che se ne moriva di mal franchise: Donna m'ha fatto, & donna m'ha disfatto. quel gentil poeta, che disse. — Old women are more pernicious than the young; for according to the proverb, the young kid eats the salt, the old goat eats salt, and bag and all . . . So that it must be confessed, as by women we are brought into the world, by women we are ruined. This made a poor sinner just ready to die of the pox cry out: a woman gave me life, and by a woman I am deprived of life: and it is certain they destroy us two ways, if we may believe the poet, who has said,

(D) The terror of any husbands. I have not translated literally, for fear of falling into an expression a little too comical; for Foulques's words are: 'Hoc quoque magni exilimare debes quod nulli suspectus ab omni hospite hospes tutissimè recipiaris. Maritus uxoris violationem ex te vel lectuli concussionem minime formidabit.'

(E) And view the most beautiful maids without danger . . . free from those impure illusions which invade our sleep. That I may not be thought to amplify things, here I shall produce the author's own words. 'Decentissime ornatarum turmas matronarum inviolabiliter pertransibis, virginum choros flore juventutis splendentium, quæ etiam senes jam calore carnis destitutos suis motibus in fervorem libidinis inflammare confueverunt, non timens earum inceffus & laqueos, securus & sine peccato miraberis . . . Omnino post hos hujus fragilissimæ fragilitatis fluxus, quod magnum Dei gratiæ munus in hoc ordine ætino, noturnas somniorum illusiones te minime sentire ita certum est, sicut certum est quoniam voluntatem si forte aderit, nullus sequetur effectus. — You will now run no risques amidst the assemblies of ladies, however their charms may be set off to advantage; you may now securely, and without danger of falling, frequent the balls, and gaze on the nymphs that are adorned with all the pride of beauty, and who by their air have often inflamed old age itself, destitute of the warmth of the flesh, with the fervour of desire . . . After this deprivation of the most frail of all frailties, which I look on as a signal mark of divine favour in this order, 'tis as certain you will no longer be subject to the nocturnal illusions of dreams, as it is, that no effect can be produced by the will if ever such should happen to be your case. It is needless to prove that Foulques rightly places this among the greatest advantages of a clergyman's life. It is certain a man devoted to continency must think it happy to have a heart proof against love and beauty: he ought to wish to have the same qualities with respect to that fire, as the Hircæ had for common fire (14). It is not only the easiest but the surest way to be chaste; for those, who cannot persevere in this way without frequent conflicts, are much to be pitied: they live in continual agitation and trouble; their state is always doubtful; victory is sometimes wavering (15), and even sometimes goes against them: they are too often convinced that success is uncertain, nor do they scarce ever come off conquerors in those contests without being covered with wounds. We justly conclude that those are miserable, who are never out of the physician's hands (16). This is no less true of those an exemption, says he, that is a great gift from God. The matrimonial functions, continues he, and the care of a family, will not hinder you from applying to please God (d); and what a happiness is it to be placed out of danger, and assured of sinning no more: He urges the example of Origen, and some holy martyrs, who are now rejoicing in heaven, that they were on earth in the same condition, which Abelard was lamenting. those who are always forced to combat with a sanguine constitution, and be in a constant opposition to the irruptions of the flesh. This is a lamentable state: a man is often beat back to his intrenchments; his conscience fighting and groaning for the defeat: what progress would he not make towards perfection, could he walk without those obstacles, and without fighting the enemy at every step? As to the other point, I mean the impurities of sleep, St Austin will tell us what the happiness is, that Foulques congratulates his friend for; St Austin, I say, who begs of God the grace of being delivered from the inconvenience he felt on that account. He submitted in sleep to what he would not have done when awake, and laments that remainder of infirmity in him. 'Adhuc vivunt in memoria mea, says he (17), talium rerum imagines, quas ibi consuetudo mea fixit: & occurrant mihi vigilantique carentes viribus, in somnis autem non solum ulque ad delectationem, sed etiam usque ad consensionem facillimeque simillimum. Et tantum valet imaginis illusio in anima mea & in carne mea, ut dormienti falsa visa persuadeant, quod vigilantem vera non possunt. . . . Numquid non potens est manus tua, Deus omnipotens, sanare omnes languores animarum mearum, atque abundantiore gratia tua lascivos motus etiam mei soporis extinguere? Augebis, Domine, magis magisque in me munera tua, ut anima mea sequatur mea ad te, concupiscentiarum visco expedita, ut non sit rebellis sibi: atque ut in somnis etiam, non solum non perpetret istas corruptelarum turpitudines per imagines animales usque ad carnis fluxum, sed ne consentiat quidem. — The images of such things, says he, as custom had left in my memory, are still fresh therein; and tho' whilst I wake they present themselves without making any impression, yet in sleep they not only excite a pleasure, but a consent, and the resemblance of an act. Such moreover is the power of these illusions on my soul, and my flesh, that false appearances in a dream have a greater influence upon me, than the real objects whilst I wake. Is not thy hand, O almighty GOD, able to heal all the infirmities of my soul, and by thy more abundant grace to extinguish all the wanton emotions of my slumbers? Pour down, O Lord, more and more thy mercies upon me, that my soul being freed from the power of concupiscentia, may no longer rise in rebellion against itself, but be directed to thee, and that even in sleep it may not only be free from pollution, and the illusion of animal images, but also from a consent.

[F] He tells Abelard that his loss is irreparable. This is most certain: it does not happen here as to the Sybil's tree; that when one golden branch was cut off, another presently sprouts up in the room of it.

— . . . Primo avulso non deficit alter

Aureus; & simili frondefcit virga metallo (18).

When one is pluck'd, behold a second rise
And glitter on the tree.

(18) Virgil. Æn. lib. vi. ver. 143.

He who, speaking of a maidenhead, said it could be lost but once, and that no artifice could repair it, was right in the main:

— . . . nulla reparabilis arte

Læta pudicitia est, deperit illa semel (19).

No arts, no means, can honour lost restore,
When that once sinks it never rises more.

(19) Ovid. Epist. v. ver. 103. Heroid.

(20) There are cheating women who pretend to restore maidenhood. Forthwith, at the word Pucelage.

(21) Cypressi mœnem domumque pœnemque totum idem quia huius generis arbor excois non renascitur. Item ex mœnem nihil est jam speciem. Fagus.

But probably he knew that, though the original is not to be recovered by any contrivance, yet sometimes a copy of it at least may be recovered (20). But it is not so with Abelard's wound: it is incurable; there are no restorers of that kind, no false pieces to be had for money; it is a cypress tree (21). The inference Foulques draws is not so certain: grieve not, says he, for the loss of your member; for it will never grow again, nature will not allow it to be restored. 'Ergo, frater, ne doleas, nec contristeris, nec perturbatione huius incommodi quatiaris, præsertim cum hoc tam plures, ut dictum est, utilitatis afferat fructus, & quod hoc modo factum est semper & irreparabile permaneat & evallum. Sic hoc tibi solamen affidue quod redintegrari natura non patitur, levius potest tolerari. — Grieve not therefore, my brother, be not despondent, torment not your self with the thoughts of a disaster, especially since, as I have before observed, it will be attended with so far larger a train of advantages; besides, whatever is affected in this manner remains for ever disunited and irreparable. This therefore may be a perpetual consolation, that as nature will never suffer what is thus lost to be retrieved, so the loss may the more easily be supported.' One would think that in these last words Foulques had a view to this sentence in Horace,

Levis fit patientia quidquid corrigere est nefas (22).

The worst of ills by patience milder grows.

(22) Horat. Od. xxiv. lib. i. ver. 19, 20.

But he does not well express the sense of it: the poet does not mean that an irreparable loss is easier to be born than a reparable one; he only says that the weight of an irreparable loss becomes lighter, by a resolution to bear it patiently.

It must be confessed that most of the common-place consolations have two faces, and two handles. They have this defect that they may be retorted: for instance, what can be more reasonable than to do nothing in vain? Upon this foot you argue well with a mother, mourning for the loss of her dear son, when you tell her, that her tears are to no purpose, and let her say or do what she will, she can never restore her son to life: but she may answer, that is the very thing that makes me inconsolable; for if I could repair my loss, I should bear it patiently: if I could hope, as they do in trade, to regain upon one ship what I had lost upon another, I should have little want of consolation. I doubt not but Foulques would have had more success in comforting Abelard, if the latter had only lost his beard: what are you grieved for? would he have said: they have robbed you of your beard: a great misfortune that: stay a month or two and you will have another. No doubt this would have been a great ground of comfort; but the single thought that his wound was incurable, and subject as much or more than any thing to that severe philosophic rule, à privatione ad habitum non datur regressus; this thought alone, I say, which his comforter urged as a strong argument for patience, was the chief cause of his despair: nor would it mend the matter to tell him that at last that rule would prove false, viz. in the resurrection at the last day (23); for then he might answer, that then he should have no need of such things, since at the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of GOD in heaven (24).

EXAMINATION of some common-places of consolation.

(23) John xi. 24.

Note, what I have said above concerning an irreparable loss may be confirmed by the testimony of the chief of the seven wise men of Greece, that it renders men more inconsolable. Solon was lamenting the death of his son: his friends represented to him that his tears could be of no service; for that very reason, says he, I weep. Ἀνὴρ φησὶ Διοσκυρίδης ἐν ταῖς ἀπομνημονεύμασιν ἐπεὶ δὴ δακρυοὶ τὸν παῖδα τελευτήσαντα . . . πρὸς τὸν εἰπόντα, ἀλλ' ἐδὲν ἀνύτλεις, εἰπεῖν, δὲ αὐτὸ δὲ τὸ δακρυόν, ὅτι ἐδὲν ἀνύτλω. Ipsum refert Diocorides in commentariis cum lacrymaretur ac lugeret defunctum filium . . . dicereturque à quodam, at nihil proficere, respondisse, & propter hoc ipsum illarum quia nihil proficere (25). See in the remark [K] of the article AMPHIARAEUS how Carneades confuted certain common-places of consolation.

ought to bear it patiently. That he did not receive the wound in an ill action [G], since he was alone in bed, fast asleep, and designing mischief to no body. Then he comforts him by other arguments; shews how greatly the bishop, canons, and clergy of Paris were concerned at his disgrace [H]: How much he was pitied by the inhabitants,

[G] That he did not receive his wound in an ill action.] He means that he was not taken in the fact with a woman, which has cost some people the same parts he lost. 'Per & hæc, ut ait ille, solatia tecum, quoniam tempore hujus diminutionis vel thorum violando, vel in aliquo fornicationis veneno minime deprehensus es.' This consolation was better than the former, though it must be owned Abelard had drawn this disgrace upon himself, by a crime no less sinful than adultery. So that he could not say with the same confidence as that other Eunu- chus:

Quid fortunæ, stulte, delictum arguis?

Id demum est homini turpe, quod meruit pati (26).

*Why dost thou, fool, the crimes of fortune trace?
That only, which a man deserves, is base.*

However, the crime was over, and when he was mutilated he had no thoughts of injuring any body. Generally speaking the rule is true, Quæ venit ex merito pœna, dolenda venit, whether Abelard could or could not make the application of it to himself. Besides, there are good authorities, which prove that those who were taken in the very fact leave the instrument of their crime behind them. Thus Plautus (27) brings in his Sycerastus saying:

--- SYN. Facio quod manifesto hi mœchi haud fer-me solent.

MI. Quid id est? SYN. Refero vasa falva.

That is, I have done what adulterers seldom do. MI. What's that? SYN. I have brought away my tackle safe and sound. I make use of Mr Dacier's translation, who quotes this passage in his note upon a place in Horace, where that kind of punishment is mentioned (28). Periplectomenes in the same Plautus (29) will not only use the hectoring spark in the same manner, but also hang his members, when they are cut off, about his neck for a child's play-thing.

Vide, ut tibi istic sit acutus, CARIO, culter probe.

CA. Quin jamdudum gessit mœcho hoc abdomen adimere

Ut faciam quasi puero, in collo pendeant crepundia

PE. Cur es ausus subagitare alienam uxorem? impudens!

Look to it, CARIO, that your blade carry a good edge. CAR. Fear not, sir, 'tis keen set, and longs to be about his what-do-ye-call-ums. I'll make a boy of him again, and hang a new fashioned coral and bells about his neck.

Terence only says (30) that the criminal was bound and they were just going to inflict on him the punishment of adulterers; but, either because he was more modest than Plautus, or because it is a servant maid that speaks, he does not say what the punishment was. It was well enough understood.

--- Ut ne viderem, misera huc effugi foras

Quæ futura exempla dicunt in eum indigna ---

--- Colligavit primum eum miseris modis ---

--- Nunc minatur porro sese id quod mœchis

Quod ego nunquam vidi fieri neque velim.

Dear heart! I left the house in haste to get out of the fight on't. What a dreadful example do they say they'll make of him! He first bound him hand and foot, 'twould grieve your heart to see it And now he threatens to serve him like a common adulterer, a fight he never saw, nor would I for the world.

See in Valerius Maximus (31) two examples of this punishment. By the Egyptian laws (32) it was inflicted on those who violated a woman. Zonaras says that the emperor Justinian condemned all Sodomites to this punishment. 'In eos Justinianus pœnam planè convenientem statuit. Nam qua parte erant tam ignominiosi, hac eos privari imperabat, ut Zonaras prodidit. Quid enim? (ajebat) si sacrilegium commisissent, nonne eis manus amputassem (33)?' What, said he, if they had committed sacrilege, should not I have condemned them to lose their hands? the punishment was well proportioned to the crime, and was a means to prevent it for the future: a gallant who escaped with his members might charge again; as a soldier that runs away may rally again. To prevent this they proceeded to amputation (34).

One of the authors I have cited (35) quotes a short epigram of Martial, in which he laughs at a husband that cut off the nose of his wife's gallant. She loses nothing by that, says he; that is not the part that had offended you.

Quis tibi persuasit nares abscindere mœcho?

Non hac peccatum est parte, marite, tibi.

Stulte quid egisti? nihil hic tua perdidit uxor,

Cum sit salva sui mentula Deiphobi (36).

What could, my friend, your bar'rous blade engage,

On your wife's lover's guiltless nose to rage?

Fool that thou art! thy spouse no loss sustains,

The guilty part, that injur'd thee, remains.

A poet of the XVIth century, exercised his muse upon the like thought; but he changed the circumstances of the fact. This is his epigram:

De marito, cujus mœcha erat conjux.

Cum mœcha sensit mœchum dormire maritus,

Extremplu uxori construit ille dolos.

Nocte semel media repetens sua limina, mœchum

Cum mœcha in tepido conspiciet esse toro.

Distringit gladium, mœchæ duo brachia scindit,

Atque duos mœchi diffeccat ense pedes.

Non sic debuerat facinus punire nephandum:

Pars, qua peccatum est, hæc rescanda fuit (37).

On a husband, whose wife used to cuckold him.

The husband found his spouse leud pranks bad play'd,

And for the wanton dame a trap he laid:

Returning late one night, with silent pace,

He found a stranger had usurp'd his place;

His sword he drew, of arms bereft his wife,

Her minion's legs compounded for his life.

But why this rage on guiltless members shewn?

The part that injur'd should the crime atone.

[H] He represents to Abelard how much the clergy of Paris were concerned at his disgrace.] Nothing shews better the great esteem they had for that philosopher. No doubt our Foulques exaggerates things in his letter; for one would imagine by what he writes that almost the whole city of Paris was afflicted and dismayed for the loss of Abelard's members. From hence the comforter draws one of his best arguments: as if this signal mark of the affection of the Parisians Felix le nequit was worth more than all that Abelard had lost (38). amari. Pene I do not believe the sufferer would acquiesce in this valuation, and would without doubt rather have been ignorant all his life of the friendship they had for him, than to have known it upon such terms. This lessons in te might have been said to people who made no use of what they had; but Abelard used his talent stoutly, and drew a good income from it, and always pre- tended to make the most of it: be this as it will, let us hear the comforter's own words. tants, and lamented by the women [I]. He describes the whole in a very lively manner; but in touching upon the last head of consolation, he does not say a word of Heloisa [K]. As he seemed inclined to fly to the Pope for justice, he desires him to lay self of the grief his misfortune caused him.

[I] Lamented by the women.] They wept as bi-terly for him as if each had lost her husband, or lover, in the field of battle; it is true no man's life was lost, but yet they had lost their champion. These are Fouiques's words (39). They had lost their Adonis; therefore their sorrow for him must have been more sincere than that of those women of old, who annually celebrated the memory of Venus's mourning for Adonis (40). Plangentes Adonidem (41). Methinks the comforter should not have touched this string; it was by no means proper to his design, and could only exasperate the grief of the unhappy Abelard for two invincible reasons; for first, he saw by that, in a very particular manner, the importance of the good he had lost; secondly, he was made sensible of a favour which he found himself utterly unable ever to make a grateful acknowledgement of. I cannot therefore but say it over and over again, that our Fouiques was too bombast an Orator who confounds two things that ought to be distinguished. He will have the tears of all the women, singularum feminarum; to proceed from their having lost their champion, militem suum; but this could only be true of a few that Abelard was intimate with, or who hoped one day to partake of his favour. Therefore he should have said, either that the others did not lament him, or, if they did, it was less out of love to Abelard, than fear of the consequences. I mean, they were under apprehensions that that barbarous manner of punishing lewdness should be introduced in the world, and the example of the canon be practised upon others. So pleased with this woman's ingenuous declaration, that they restored her husband to her, and all they had taken from her. As she was going away, Thedbold asked her what she would be willing should be done to her husband, if he was found in arms again. He has eyes, said she, a nose, hands, and feet: these are his own, which you may take from him if he deserves it; but leave him, if you please, what belongs to me (43).

Note, that, in all probability, this woman had rather they should have taken away her husband's life, than see him an enunch, a condition in which she would have known all the evils without the conve-nienices of widowhood: she would have had neither liberty to marry again, nor right to dissolve her marriage on account of impotence: for the courts of justice would not have admitted her plea: they take no notice of impotence that comes from such accidents. Observe, by the way, that the Romans would not have censured this woman's taste. They would rather chafe to lose their lives than their virility.
This Caesar represented to the ambassadors of Phar-naces, when he complained of the cruel treatment the Roman merchants underwent in the kingdom of Pontus. 'Se magnas & graves injurias civium Romanorum qui in Ponto negotiati essent, quoniam in integrum restituere non posset, concedere Pharnaci. Nam neque interfectis amissam vitam, neque excessis virilitatem restituere posse, quod quidem sup-plicium GRAVIUS MORTE cives Romani subissent (44).

[K] Without saying a word of Heloisa.] This is not to be wondered at; for as she was the most injured of all, her grief was sufficiently known, and it would have been no news to her husband to have been told how bitterly she lamented his loss. It is true, she was then in a convent, but had only the dress of a nun: the secret visits she received from her husband were for something more than meer chat; they had the skill to withdraw into some corner to be free and easy (45); and she had long enjoyed these conversations under the habit of a nun (46). So that she had not renounced what her husband was deprived of. To judge of the grief which pierced her soul, when she heard this news, I will not confine myself to the new translation of her letters (47). How cruel were they (thus the translation has it) when their blind fury incited an assassin to surprise you in your sleep! had I been with you, I would have defended you at the expense of my own life; my very cries would have stopped his arm. But here love itself is wounded, and my modesty, joined to my despair, render me speechless. It is not lawful for me to say all I think about it, and if it were I could not possibly do it. And indeed there is an eloquence in silence, when the greatness of a calamity is beyond all expression. How significant is this! nature herself speaks; one would think it not the language of the fancy, but the voice of sensation and experience, and of one that really was in Heloisa's place (48). I wish these were her own words, and am sorry not to see, in the original Latin, what I read in the French paraphrase. But if she did not say she would have ventured her own life to have saved her husband's virility, and that her out-cries would have preserved that inestimable jewel from the murderer's hands, at least she ought to have said it, and the translator is not to be blamed for lending her a thought so natural. Nevertheless, I shall not make this my rule to judge of Heloisa's sorrow.
Her own Latin is enough. Her murmur against the divine providence come little short of blasphemy, such as never fell from the lips of Job, when he had lost his wealth and children, and was miserably tormented in his own body. Heloisa thought her loss greater than his, though she and her husband were both well; after all, says she, the only comfort that remains, is, that I know he is not dead, being for ever debarred from all other joys coming from him.

lay aside all thoughts of it, since it would require too much money to succeed there [L]; that the authors of the injury had been punished [M]; that he was to blame to complain of the cathedral church, and that being a Monk, he ought to renounce all desire of revenge, leaving it entirely to Almighty God, and love even his worst enemies. To conclude, he exhorts him not to lament the happiness he had lost, since that pretended happiness is always accompanied with a thousand inconveniences: And he assures him, that if he perseveres to the end, he shall recover at the day of judgment what to die, tho' daily expiring. 'O si fas sit dici crudelem

' mihi per omnia Deum! ô inclementem clementiam! ô
' infortunatam fortunam! quæ jam in me universi cona-
' minis sui tela in tantum consumpsit, ut quibus in alios
' seviat jam non habeat. Plenam in me pharetram exhau-
' sit, ut frustra jam alii bella ejus formident. Nec si ei ad-
' huc telum aliquod superesset, locum in me vulneris
' inveniret. Unum inter tot vulnera metuit ne morte ' supplicia finiam, & cum interimere non cesset in' teritum tamen quem accelerat timet.' All the rest of her discourse shews that her horrible murmurings were founded upon nothing else but the loss of her husband's conversation, as appears from her own confession, page 59 (50). She takes an unbounded liberty to arraign providence, as if God had chastised them, when they did not deserve it, and bore with them, when they deserved punishment. God, says she, spared us when our pleasures were criminal, delaying our punishment till marriage had made them innocent;
' Et ut ex injuria major indignatio surgeret, om-
' nia in nobis æquitatis jura pariter sunt perverbia.
' Dum enim solliciti amoris gaudiis fruemur, & ut
' turpiore, sed expressiore vocabulo utar, fornicatione
' vacaremus, divina nobis severitas pepercit. Ut au-
' tem illicita licitis correximus, & honore conjugii
' turpitudinem fornicationis operuimus, ira Domini ' manum suam super nos vehementer aggravavit, &
' immaculatum non pertulit thorum qui diu ante sub-' stinuerat pollutum (51). This poor woman was strangely deluded, if she imagined her love was pure because she did not cease loving her husband after he was made impotent. She upbraids him for having only had a lascivious passion for her, since he neglected her, when he could no longer enjoy carnal pleasures with her (52): but does she not confess (53) that she laments past pleasures, that she thinks night and day on their mutual enjoyments? does she not own a desire after their continuance (54)? if this is not a lustful love, a love of flesh and blood, what can be so? Abelard was sensible of this, and exhorted his wife to entertain other thoughts, least she should be justly charged with impure love. 'Cave obscuro

[L] He told Abelard it would require too much money to be able to succeed there.] Our Foulques speaks so much to the disadvantage of the court of Rome, that if they have not placed him in the catalogue of the witnesses of truth, it is not his fault. He says, the avarice of the Romans is insatiable, and that if Peter Abelard visits the Pope without good store of money, his journey will turn to no account. Let us hear his own words; the language he speaks in will bear the harshest terms better than ours. 'Nunquid
' non audisti aliquando de Romanorum avaritia & ' impuritate? quis unquam suis potuit opibus mere' tricum voraginem satiare? quis potuit sacculis cu-
' piditatis eorum sufficere crumenis? . . . Substan-

' corruption of the chiefs at Rome? who ever could ' glut a whore's all-craving appetite with his sub' stance? or who from his purse could fill the bags
' of their restless desires? . . . Your stock of wealth, ' which cannot be great, and may be nothing, is far ' from being sufficient to defray the expences of a ' visit to the Roman Pontif. Wherewith will you an' swer the cravings of the Papal court? . . . If money should ' fail when you come to your journey's end, every body ' knows what success you will meet with. Whoever ' in our times has undertaken such an expedition, be' fore he has laid in an immense store, has had the ' mortification to see himself baffled, and his suit rejected.
' This mischief continues to this very day, if we may believe Mr Hallier, in his letter from Rome to father Dinet, the Jesuit, dated the 16th of June 1653. Mr Hal-lier was one of the deputies that solicited the condemnation of Janesism. 'It would be very just,
' says he (56), that they should have a greater ' regard for us, after the extraordinary charge we ' have been at on this occasion. You cannot ima' gine how much money goes away in presents and ' bribes. Every little saint must have his fee . . .
' The Janesists have spent here above a hundred ' thousand livres, and perhaps above a hundred and ' fifty thousand.'

[M] The authors of the injury had been punished.]

Only two of them were taken, one of which was Peter Abelard's footman. They were not only dismembered by way of retaliation, but also had their eyes put out. Abelard says (57): 'Quibus mox con-' versis in fugam qui comprehendi potuerunt oculis
' & genitalibus privati sunt, quorum alter ille fuit su-' pradiatus serviens qui cum in obsequio meo mecum
' maneret, cupiditate ad proditionem ductus est. —
' Who being immediately put to flight, two of them,
' whom we seized, were deprived of their eyes and ' genitals, one of which was my servant before men' tioned, who, altho' he lived in my house, and was ' bound by the most solemn ties of duty, was pervert-
' ed by the love of money to that perfidious act.'

Foulques says in general, that some of the villains were condemned to be castrated and lose their eyes, and that the canon himself was deprived of his whole estate, tho' he denied he had any concern in the action

(58). Abelard was not pleased with this sentence; he illorum qui tibi had been taken from him, and that then that maxim in dialectics in habitu nunquam potest redire privatio would prove to be false. It is pity we have not Abelard's answer to this consolatory letter. It is probable we should have seen there a kind of picture of Job's dispute with his friends; I mean, that Abelard would have found answers and replies, and Foulques, in some things, would have been a miserable comforter.

For the rest, the priory of Deuil, possessed by our Foulques, is situated near Montmorency, three leagues from Paris. See upon this father Chifflet (the Jesuit's Genus illustre D. Bernardi assertum, where he mentions one Eudo of Deuil, and Velasius, in his Notitia Galliarum, at the word Parisi (e).

ing this affair. I think they were too favorable to the canon; who ought to have had the Lex Talionis inflicted upon him. Mr du Cange (61) having told us, that the Salic law condemned to castration slaves taken in adultery and theft, that the law of the Visigoths condemned sodomites to the same punishment, and that the laws of William the conqueror inflicted the same upon those who ravished a woman, adds that Sugerius, in page 308 of the life of Lewis VI, makes mention of a traitor who was condemned to have his eyes put out, and his privy members cut off. Mr Hofman (62) has not copied Mr du Cange aright; for instead of these words apud Sugerium in Ludovico VI page 308, he has made it apud Eugenium in Ludovico VI page 1308. The traitor Sugerius speaks of was a man that the king of England had heaped favours upon, and yet he entered into a conspiracy against his master: he came off with the loss of his privy-members and eyes, and was not changed as he well deserved. Tam horribili fazione deprehenfus oculorum & genitalium amissione, cum la- queum suffocantem meruisset, misericorditer est damnatus (63). Father Theophilus Raynaud, who had read so much, yet was ignorant that Abelard's assassins had been punished by order of justice, which plainly appears by Foulques's letter. This Jesuit had therefore forgot that letter, since he affirms, that to punish those who mutilated Abelard, without public authority, was as criminal as their action. 'Petrus Abelardus. . . . privata auctoritate est eviratus, quam fuisse vindictam illicitam est manifestum. Et aequae nefaria fuit, si privata auctoritate facta est, repensia exsecutoribus truci illius ultionis excoelatio simul & excoelio (64). — Peter Abelard was castrated by the contrivance of some private persons, and it is plain that action was illegal. Nor was the privation of sight, and castration, executed on the authors of that barbarous revenge left to be condemned, if it was only founded on private authority.' I shall perhaps speak in another place of the punishment inflicted upon the gallants of Philip the fair's three daughters in law (65).

FRACHETTA (JEROME) native of Rovigo in Italy, made himself famous by some political works [A]. He spent many years at Rome, very much esteemed by the duke of Sessa, ambassador of Philip II, and Philip III, kings of Spain, and was employed in affairs of state as well as war, in all which he behaved well. But notwithstanding all this, he had like to have been overcome, even to have been in danger of his life in the persecutions that were raised against him. He retired to Naples, and being not altogether void of friends, he made his innocence appear to the court of Spain, who ordered the count de Benevento, viceroy of Naples, to employ him as a faithful servant whenever an opportunity should offer. This was put in execution, so that Frachetta lived honourably at Naples with a suitable pension (a). I know not what grounds Moreri goes upon, when he says, bis indiscreet zeal involved him in a troublesome affair. For Ghilini, the only author he cites, insinuates no such thing.

(a) Taken from Ghilini, Tom. I, pag. 120, 121.

[A] He made himself famous by some political works. The most considerable of all, is that intitled il Seminario de' Governi di Stato, & di Guerra. He has collected together in 110 chapters about eight thousand state and military maxims, taken from the best authors; and has added to each chapter a discourse by way of commentary. This work was printed at least twice by the author. It was reprinted at Venice in 1647, and at Genoa in 1648, in 4to, to which was added, il Principe nel quale si considera il Principe & quanto al Governo dello Stato, & quanto al maneggio della Guerra, of the same author. This last treatise was reprinted at Venice by John Baptista Ciotti, in 1599, in 8vo, and it was an edition corrected and enlarged by the author. The first edition was certainly done in 1597; for the epistle dedicatory is dated from Rome the seventh of November in that year. It informs us that the occasion of Frachetti's composing that book was a conversation, in which the duke of Sessa had said, among other things, that it was his opinion, it was no less necessary than difficult to let princes know the truth of what passes in their own dominions. Note that, before he published his il Seminario de' Governi, he published a general idea of it in 1592. His other writings are Discorso della Ragione di Stato: Discorso della Ragione di Guerra: Esposizione di tutta l'Opera di Lucrezio (1).

FRANC (MARTIN) provost and canon of Lausanne, and secretary to the Popes Felix V, and Nicholas V, flourished about the middle of the XVth century. He was one of the best French poets of that time. He wrote a poem against the Romance of the Rose, and intitled it Le Champion des dames, or the Ladies Champion, in which are several Verses concerning Pope Joan [A]. errors of some men in respect of this writer. I say then, first of all, that he is called, by Du Verdier Vau-privas, Honoratus Bonnor, prior of Salon, who supposes him to have been the author of a book, containing 165 chapters, intituled, L'Arbre des Batailles, and dedicated to Charles V. He further adds, that this book was printed at Paris by John Dupré, in the year 1495. Here we find three several variations between Du Verdier and Marefius: I. As to the name of the author; II. As to the name of his priory; and, III. As to the name of the prince, who was the hero of the book. For my own part, I take Marefius's testimony, as to the first and last article, to be of better authority than Du Verdier's, because father Labbe does not censure him in this particular. The epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca has still a greater blunder than all this, in metamorphosing the title of a book into an author. You will find there, page 534, these words; L'Arbre Batailles de bello & duello. Page 360, it is said, Honoratus Bonbor, scriptor de bello & duello. You find then already three different names (5) given to the author of that book. But let us now pass on to father Labbe's criticism upon Marefius (6). "In Honorato Bonneto, auctore libri vernaculi, qui inscribitur L'Arbre des Batailles, multa peccat: I. Priorem de Challon vocat, cum fuerit de Salon. II. Secondly, he says the book was written three hundred years ago; whereas Charles VI, to whom it was dedicated, reigned only from the year 1388 to 1422. Thirdly, he translates Challon Catalaunensis; that is Chaalons, when he ought to have called it Cabillonensis: for so those cities are distinguished; the one situated on the Marne in Champagne, the other upon the Soane in Burgundy; and both bishops seen. Fourthly, and hence the allusion, otherwise more cold than Alpine snow, appears far more absurd. Had Blondel, who was himself of Challon, seen his testimony, he would have taken less pains in opposing the truth of that story."

[C] The learned differ about the place where he was born. President Fauchet (7) assures us, that he was a native of the county of Aumale in Normandy. But, according to John le Maire de Belges, he was born in the city of Arras (8).

FRANCIS of Assisi, a great saint of the Romish church, and founder of one of the four orders of the Mendicants, was born at Assisi in Italy, about the year 1181. His father was a merchant, whose profession he followed till the year 1206, when, being strongly moved with the precepts of the gospel, he resolved to forsake the world (a). And, devoting himself to solitude and mortifications, he acquired such a ghastly countenance, as made all the inhabitants of Assisi believe, that he was mad (b). His father resolved to bring him back to his profession; and, the better to effect it by his severity, confined him to a close prison: But finding his endeavours unsuccessful, he brought his son before the bishop of Assisi, where, on this occasion, he not only renounced his right to all his paternal estate, but pulled off his very cloaths, his shirt not excepted [A]. Thus, by his example, he induced a great many people to devote themselves to an evangelical poverty; and he drew up for them an institute, which the Popes did approve. To quench the fire of lust, he would lie upon ice and snow [B].

But

[A] He pulled off his cloaths, his shirt not excepted. Let us see after what manner Mr Ferrand has endeavoured to justify this new saint, at the expence of the prophet David: "Michal, says he (1), the wife of David, perceiving, through the window, her husband, who, transported with a holy zeal, was leaping and dancing before the ark of the lord, despised him in her heart, and . . . said to him in derision; how glorious was the king of Israel to day, who uncovered himself in the eyes of the handmaids of his servants, as one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncovereth himself! Now these last words of holy writ seem to imply, as if David had stripped himself stark naked. Nevertheless, because the same scripture (ver 14.) speaking of David's dancing before the ark, says, that he had a linnen ephod on; I cannot think that he stripped himself stark naked. But he stripped himself so as to look as if he had been naked; which therefore was censured, and accounted by all unbecoming the majesty and gravity of a king, and the more because it was done publicly, and before a great concourse of people. David's behaviour, considered with all its circumstances, is not more becoming than that of St Francis, who was seen but by very few; so that, if the behaviour of the one ought to be blamed, the other must be so too; and therefore we read, that Michal laughed at it. But let us see whether the Holy Ghost derided it; and we may guess by that, whether St Francis's behaviour is an object of laughter. He relates afterwards what David answered to Michal, and what the scripture observes concerning the barrenness of that woman. I will make use of Mr Ferrand's words, to expose Francis's nakedness; and thus I shall not be afraid of those reproaches, wherewith he loaded his adversary (2). (3) As for (2) He accuses what the apologist specifies concerning St Francis's Mr Jurieu of stripping himself stark naked, I will relate the story fairly, when he as St Bonaventure hath written it. . . . This terrestrial related the and carnal father (says † St Bonaventure, speaking actions of Francis of St Francis's father) after he had deprived this of Assisi; and he son of grace of money, brought him before the quotes some of his father's, bishop of the city, that he might quit all right besides those two, and title to his father's estate, and return what which are in the was in his hands. Francis did it, and restored to remark [H]. his father even all his cloaths, under which was Ferrand's Answer to the Apology for the Reformation, pag. 364, 365. found a hair cloth, wherewith he macerated his flesh: afterwards †, moved by a wonderful fervour of zeal, wherewith he was transported, he stripped 361. himself stark naked before all those that were present, and thus addressed himself to his Father. Hi- (3) Id. ibid. therto I have called you my father on earth; but pag. 362, 363. hereafter I may certainly say † our father which † Tentabat ari in heaven, since I have put all my treasure and deinde pater carnis, &c. ibid. confidence in him. The bishop, seeing this, and admiring so excellent a fervency in the man of God, rose from his seat, and, as he was a devout and kind man, he, with tears in his eyes, took up admiringly Francis in his arms, and covered him with his cloak. † vore, &c. ibid.

(1) Ferrand's Answer to the Apology for the Reformation, pag. 364, 365.

[B] To quench the fire of lust, he would lie upon the ice and snow. Let us go on with Mr Ferrand's † Matth. vi. 9, translation. "Blessed Francis (says St Bonaventure), at the beginning of his conversion, would often, in winter, throw himself into a ditch full of Ice, that he might get a complete victory over his domestic enemy, and to preserve the robe of chastity from the conflagration of pleasure. He asserted, that a spiritual man would rather chuse to suffer great cold in his flesh, than to feel the least heat of carnal pleasure in his soul. Being one day strongly pressed by

But that was all he thought fit to imitate of St Aldhelme. He durst not come near women, in the height of his eager desires [C]; and perhaps he acted prudently; for he was not sure, that he could have withstood temptation, as St Aldhelme did. Let us speak more positively, and say, that his behaviour was, without comparison, more discreet than that of the other saint. It is a mad rashness for people, who aspire to the greatest purity, to come so near the borders of a condition, which, according to the doctrine by a temptation of the flesh, he pulled off his cloaths, and scourged himself soundly. Then, warmed with an admirable fervency of zeal, he opened his cell; and, coming out of it, he went into a garden, where, having thrown himself naked into a great heap of snow, he made of it seven balls, and laying them before him, he thus spoke to his external man: the largest of these balls is thy wife; the other four are thy two sons and two daughters; and the remaining two are thy man and maid servants, which thou must keep. Make haste then to cloath them, for they are starved with cold. But, if the trouble, they put thee to, is uneasy to thee, serve carefully one only God. The devil, who then tempted St Francis, being balked, immediately left him, and this holy man returned victorious into his cell. For the cold, which he endured externally, so extinguished the internal flames of his concupiscence, that he was never after troubled with them (4).

(4) Ferrand, ubi supra, pag. 368.

[C] He durst not (like St Aldhelme) come near women in the height of his eager desires. Aldhelme, who, from a monk, became a bishop in England, towards the end of the VIIth century, dipped himself in water in the middle of winter, as high as his shoulders, to quell the rebellion of the flesh. However, he would upon some occasions expose himself to danger; he did not avoid women, when he found himself tempted; on the contrary he would get one, and lie by her till the temptation was over, and nature was quiet. He made the devil mad by his great triumph; for this did not hinder him from singing psalms; and he dismissed the woman as unpolluted as she came to him. This is a coarse translation of the Latin, which I insert in the margin (5); but here is a paraphrase of it full of inimitable ornaments. St Aldhelme was an English monk of the VIIIth century, who was raised to a bishopric for his learning and piety. But the most shining part of his holiness was an invincible chastity, which was more to be valued, because it had cost him a great many sharp conflicts. For the author of his life relates, that he would dive into cold water, or snow, to extinguish the flames of concupiscence. He was, no doubt, pressed very hard, since he applied such violent remedies. Nevertheless, he got so perfect a mastery over his flesh, that the finest woman made no impression upon him. Nay, he proceeded further; for he went to bed to a young maid, that he might triumph over the most dangerous temptations, and which would perhaps embarrass the greatest saints. Any other, but he, would have had his mind very much taken up in so nice a circumstance; but he repeated the whole Psalter, and the motions of his heart tended only to heaven. They say here, that the devil fretted and fumed, seeing him look danger so unconcernedly in the face, and his virtue strengthen where it commonly sinks. Father Henchenius would not however advise the present saints, of either sex, to expose themselves to such trials of virtue. He thinks this an example, which ought rather to be admired, than imitated; and that there is a great deal of rashness in presuming so much on one's self (6). I wonder, that father de la flo. Si quando Mainferme hath not mentioned this adventure, because it might have admirably helped him out at a corporis amore; non solum illecebræ denegabat effectum sed aliis insolitum reportabat triumphum. Neque tunc consortium fecundum repudiabat ut ceteri, qui ex opportunitate timent prolabi. Immo vero vel afflicti vel cubitans aliquam detinebat; quoad carnis tepescere lubrico, quieto & immoto discederet animo. Derideri se videtur Diabolus, cernens adhærentem fecundam virumque alias avocato animo insistentem cantando Psalterio. Valescebat ille mulieri salvo pudore, illæsa castitate. Residebat carnis incommodum: dolebat nequam spiritus de se agitari ludibrium. Wilhelmus Malmesbur. in vita Aldhelmi apud Angliam Sacram. Part. II, pag. 13.

dead life. Although Aldhelme lay by a woman, and there rehearsed the praises of God, in spite of temptation, and triumphed over nature in the midst of so imminent a danger; yet he hath been ranked among the saints, and deserved that honour by a great many miracles. Why then should it be thought strange, that the blessed Robert d'Arbrissel went to bed to one of his nuns, to obtain a victory so much the more meritorious because it was hard to be obtained? If people will blame this, as indeed it is very much to be condemned; at least it must be acknowledged, from the example of the English bishop, that it doth not hinder the gift of miracles.

I have spoken, in another place (7), of an honest hermit, who let fall his breviary at the sight of a couple, who were diverting themselves at the sport of love. This had not happened to him, had he been as strong as St Aldhelme. This saint, though he had by his side a pretty woman, yet did not lose one word of either breviary, or psalmody; and I do not question, but that, if he had had the case of conscience, which Peter Damianus examined, propounded to him, he had answered as Peter Damianus did. You may find this in La Mothe le Vayer. Agnes, says he, (8), Widow to Henry II (9), asked, by a bishop, this pretty question of Peter Damianus, one of the most understanding churchmen of his age, 'Utrum licet ceret homini inter ipsum debiti naturalis egerium aliquid ruminare Psalmorum (9a)? — Whether it was lawful for a man, during the performance of matrimonial duty, to repeat to himself any part of the psalms. It was decided in the affirmative, as Baronius informs us, upon the authority of the text of St Paul, in the first epistle to Timothy, which says, 'that God may be prayed to every where.' Is it possible, that there has been an empress so weak, as to propose such questions? and if the curiosity of a woman extended so far, ought any grave Casuists to have examined them? It is a true saying, that a man's mind will leave nothing unstirred: the most gloomy and dark recesses are not without it's reach; and, against all the rules of decency, it will carry thither a torch. I will observe, by the way, that one of the most celebrated of Aristotle's commentators would have answered the empress's question quite otherwise than Peter Damianus did. He had maintained, that the public welfare requires, that, in this action, as much as in any other, bona age, and nothing else, should be remembered: for he pretends, that the reason, why the children of ingenious and learned men are commonly dull and stupid, is, because their fathers let their thoughts wander when they should be thinking on what they are doing, when they beget them. On the contrary, says he, you see some blockheads, who get children of admirable parts, because they get them in earnest, and not for fashion-sake: they mind what they are about, and nothing else, and wholly apply themselves to the business in hand. Read this Latin: 'Alexander Aphrodisæus magno fe labore conficit, dum causam conatur investigare & tradere, cur non raro contingat, ut crassus quispiam, tardus ac propemodum hebes, liberos gignat solertes, prudentes & acutos. Cujus rei causam hanc tandem statuit, quod qui tardiore est ingenio, is in ipso coitu ita se totum presenti voluptati percipiendæ addicit, ut nihil aliud animo cogitet, quem totum corpori immersum detinet. Itaque ex eo corpore ductum & haustum semen, cui spiritus admixti sunt, multum habet ipsius facultatis intelligendi: quo fit, ut liberi nascantur ipso patre prudentiores. E diverfo, qui ingenio sunt acuto, aut etiam eruditione præstant, quia eorum animus in perpetua quadam cogitatione versatur, in ipso venereo complexu alias res agunt. Quare semen quod tunc profuit, quum nihil nisi corporeum habet (animo nempe tum peregrinante) non multum illius præstantissimæ facultatis habet (10).' A great many physicians have vended this fine doctrine. Read only Gaspar à Reies, in his seventy sixth question, where he says, among other doctrine of the greatest philosophers, far from leaving room for pious ejaculations, allows not the soul a freedom of thought [D]. What is most extraordinary in St Francis, is, that it is pretended, that JESUS CHRIST stamped upon him the marks of his five wounds. The Monks of his order relate a thousand wonderful things on this subject.

other things, that wife and thoughtful men, who perform matrimonial duties not so much to gratify their inclination, as to keep peace at home, and who, even in the very performance, have their mind taken up with philosophical notions, see their children degenerate. He adds, that, for a contrary reason, bastards are generally strong, and ingenious: 'Nec ipso quidem venereo congressu, omnino à rerum studio, & contemplatione deflunt prudentes, à quibus cerebrum debile redditur, quo fit ut plerumque tales minus salaces, minusque fervidi sint, & qui non magnopere hanc monomachiam ardentius expetant, imo detrectent potius, & velut inviti accedant, tantummodo ut uxoris gratificentur, easque paciores experiantur, sicque ad concubitus debitum solvendum magis videntur accedere, quam avidè expetere (11).' His advice is very wide of the decision sent to the empress Agnes (12), and of the doctrine of the Rabbins (13).

[§ (a) The casuists, building on the canon law, have declared for the negative. John Nevissan, l. i. n. 25. of his Forè Nuptiale: 'In actu coitus semper impeditur ratio ab actu suo, & in omni illo actu Propheta non habebat influxum spiritus Prophetici, secundum Tabienam in verbo Matrimonium iii. §. j. imo etiam in actu matrimonii quod est tantum Sacramentum, Spiritus Sanctus adest usque quo venit ad copulum, quia tunc recedit. Cap. Connubia xxxij. quæst. ij. — In the act of copulation reason is always hindered from exerting itself, and in all that act the prophets had not the influx of the prophetic spirit, according to Tabiena on the word Matrimonium, 3. sect. 1. may, even in the act of matrimony, which is so great a sacrament, the HOLY GHOST is present no longer than till they come to copulation, because then he retreats. See his chapter Connubia, 32. quæst. 2.' See the new Menagiana, edit. of Paris, 1715, tom. i. p. 367. REM. CRIT.]

Cicero would have laughed at this pretended cause of the dulness of children: for he says, that the soul is so absorbed, that it is not capable of any reasonable act: 'Cujus (voluptatis) motus ut quisque est maximus, ita est inimicissimus philosophiæ, congruere enim cum cogitatione magna voluptas corporis non potest. Quis enim cum utatur voluptate ea qua nulla possit esse major attendere animo, inire rationem, cogitare omnino quidquam potest (14)?' He has confirmed this, in another book, by the authority of a great Pythagorean philosopher (15). 'Cumque homini five natura five quis Deus nihil mente præstabilibus delisset: huic divino muneri ac dono nihil esse tam inimicum, quam voluptatem. Nec enim libidine dominante temperantæ locum esse, neque omnino in voluptatis regno virtutem posse consistere; quod quo magis intelligi posset, fingere animo jubebat, tanta incitum aliquem voluptate corporis, quanta percipi posset maxima. Nemini censere fore dubium, quin tandem dum ita gauderet, nihil agitare mente, nihil ratione, nihil cogitatione consequi posset; quocirca nihil esse tam detestabile, tamque pestiferum, quam voluptatem: siquidem ea, cum major esset atque longior, omne animi lumen extingueret (16). —

And, as the mind is the most excellent gift of nature, or some God, nothing, he said, is more pernicious to this divine present, than sensual pleasure. For, under the dominion of lust, there is no room for temperance; nor, indeed, can virtue consist, where pleasure reigns. The better to prove this, he bids us suppose a man excited as strongly as possible by corporeal pleasure: and no one, he thought, could doubt, but that, during such an enjoyment, he could have no room for thought and reflection: for which reason nothing is so detestable and contagious as pleasure; since if we suppose it to rise higher, and continue longer, it would extinguish the whole light of the mind.' See the following remark.

[D] A condition . . . which, according to the doctrine of the greatest philosophers, allows not the soul a freedom of thought. You have just now seen Cicero's opinion, which is agreeable to that of the greatest men of antiquity. We have already seen (17) that Hippocrates and Democritus called the venereal act, a little epilepsy. What can be added to this definition? doth it not emphatically express what is contained in our text? but let us not here forget the divine Plato. It is reported, says he, that the gods forgive false oaths to the pleasures of love, as if they were children void of understanding: 'Ἡδονὴ μὲν γὰρ πάντων ἀλαζονέστατον, ὥς δὲ λόγῳ, καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἡδοναῖς ταῖς περὶ τὰ ἀφροδίσια (αἱ δὲ μέγισται δονῶσιν εἶναι) καὶ τὸ ἐπιτρέψαι συγγνώμην εἰληθε παραθεῶν ὥς, καθάπερ παίδων, τῶν ἡδονῶν ὅν ἐδὲ τὸν δαίμονα κεκμηῖαν. Voluptas enim maxime omnium temeraria: fertur enim de veneris voluptatibus, quæ ingentissima omnium æstimantur, quæ peccantibus illis Dii prorsus ignoscunt, quasi pueri quidam voluptates sint, nullius intelligentiæ compotes (18). Aristotle observes, that pleasures are obstacles to the faculty of thinking well; and that those of love give not the soul leave to meditate, or examine any one thing: 'Ἐν ἐμπόδιον τῷ φρονεῖν αἱ ἡδοναὶ καὶ ὅσω μᾶλλον χαίρει, μᾶλλον οἷον τῇ τῶν ἀφροδισίων ἡδονῇ γὰρ ἂν δυνάσθαι νοῦσαι τὴν αὐτῇ. Deinde prudenter sentiendi facultatem impediunt voluptates, eoque magis quo quisque magis delectatur: qualis est ea quæ ex rebus veneris percipitur. In ea voluptate enim neminem quicquam animo agitare, aut ratione explicare posse (19). Montagne was not altogether of this opinion, and he went upon his own experience. Here are his words (20): 'Those, who cry down sensuality, gladly make use of this argument, to shew that it is intirely vicious, and unreasonable, and that, when it is at it's height, it masters us so much, that reason is shut out of doors; and they alledge the experience we find of this in the conversation of women,

- - - Cum jam præfagit gaudia corpus Atque in eo est Venus, ut mullebra conferrat arva.

When now the limbs preface approaching joys,
And the whole man for the attack prepares.

'Where it appears to them, that pleasure transports us so much beside our selves, that our reason, being charmed and captivated, cannot exert itself. I know that it may happen otherwise, and that, if a man will, he may arrive, at that very instant, at bending his thoughts on something else; but they must be purposely forced and stretched. I know that the effort of this pleasure may be checked, and I have some insight into it; for I have not found Venus so imperious a goddess, as many, and more moderate, men than I, pretend.' This would be a slender excuse for those monks, whom we attack here: the observation, which an Italian physician has made, would better teach them their duty. The very thought, says he (21), of such an action oversets reason, and inspires a sort of fury. 'Atque utinam in ipso Veneris actu tonus Ulmus, duntaxat mente privaremur, non etiam in previa meditatione ad eundem, quam furorē & rabiem dixit Sect. II. cap. iii, & descriptis Virgilius, lib. 3. Georg. hilce carminibus (22). . . . Transimus consulto carminis majestatem, leporem, possuntne apertioribus argumentis physice comprobati, quas furias addat sola mentis ditatio Veneris non homini tantum, sed & brutis quoque cæteris (23). Pudenda itaque, vel partes reprehensibiles existunt, quod animalia omnia in rabiem agant, naturæ cancellis propriis amoveant, in homine verò maxime omnium jugulent ipsam rationalem animam. — And I could wish we were deprived of reason only in the very act of venery, and not driven, even by the previous meditation on it, to that madness, and rage, described by Virgil . . . I purposely take no notice of the grandeur and elegance of the verses, and whether the truth of them may not be physically proved by plainer arguments, as also what that kind of madness is, which the meditation alone on venereal pleasure raises, not only in man, but in the brute creation. Those parts therefore are deservedly termed Pudenda, (or what we may be ashamed of), since they drive all animals to madness, break down the proper fences of nature, and, in man particularly, destroy the very rational soul.' ther place (24) a passage of Melancthon, which has some affinity with this. But we must not refer St Augustin's fine maxim to another place. He concludes, that, since the soul is affected with such an excess of pleasure, as to be incapable of any intellectual function, every man, who is truly wise, and sensible of holy pleasures, had rather that the conjugal duty were separated, if possible, from the voluptuous sensation, which accompanies it (25). 'Hæc autem (libido) sibi non solum totum corpus, nec solum extrinsecus, verum etiam intrinsecus vendicat, totumque commo- vet hominem, animi simul affectu cum carnis appetitu conjuncto atque permixto, ut ea voluptas sequatur, qua major in corporis voluptatibus nulla est: ita ut momento ipso temporis, quo ad ejus pervenitur extremum, penè omnis acies & quasi vigilia cogitationis obruatur. Quis autem amicus sapientie sanctorum gaudiorum, conjugalem agens vitam, & sicut apostolus monuit *, Sciens vas suum possidere in sanctificatione & honore, non in morbo desiderii, sicut & gentes quæ ignorant Deum, non mallet, si posset, sine hac libidine filios procreare; ut etiam in hoc serendæ proles officio, sic ejus menti, ea quæ ad hoc opus creata sunt, quemadmodum cætera: suis quæque operibus distributa membra fervirent, nutu voluntatis acta non æstu libidinis incitata? — But lust governs the whole man, the affection of the mind being united with the carnal appetite, whence follows that pleasure, which is the greatest of all corporeal enjoyments; inasmuch that, at that instant of time, when it is raised to the highest pitch, all thought and reflexion is taken away. Who therefore, that is a friend to wisdom and heavenly joys, leading a married life, and, as the apostle advises, Knowing how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour, not in the lust of concupiscence, as the Gentiles, which know not God, would not rather, if he could, get children without this lust; and wish, that, in the very act of propagating his species, the faculties of his mind, no less than his body, were subservient to his will, not under the government of lust.'

[E] The monks of his order obtained a festival in honour of these holy marks, and leave to recite the office of it. See Alcoran des Cordeliers (26), and you will find there a marginal note, very satirical, in these words: As for the marks of this idol, the Jacobins say, that it was St Dominic, who made them with a spit, as he was sitting under the bed, upon a quarrel between them. And thus these abominable sects worry one another. The author of this note is at least guilty of a very great omission; for he quotes no body, who relates, that the Jacobins say this. Now it is so unlikely, that they have ever reported it, that twenty witnesses would not be too much to make them suspected of it.

Observe, that Faber Stapulensis very freely condemned, as superstitious, the feast of the holy marks of Francis of Assisi. See his comment on the seventeenth verse of the sixth chapter of the epistle of St Paul to the Galatians (27). The superstition of this festival is very contagious, and able to delude devout minds; for the preachers on that day are so pathetic, and full of high flights, that they sow enthusiasm and extasies in many weak brains; and, when some certain incidents chance to concur, these seeds never fail to spring up. I remember a passage of Balzac, which is worth inserting here. 'There was some time ago, in a town of Spain, a society of devout women, who meditated for many hours in the day, and who forsook the care of mean concerns, to live, as they pretended, a more sublime life. But what think you was the event of this? a thousand domestic disorders, and a thousand public extravagancies. The less credulous mistook the pricks of pins for holy marks; the most humble thought their husbands profane; and the wisest talked to themselves, and were continually making grimaces. In fine, when only three or four of them run mad in the month of May, it was thought a good year (28).'

[F] They have published so many things of their patriarch, and with so little judgment, that they have exposed him to many invectives. See the book, intitled, Liber Conformitatum Divo Francisci ad vitam JESU CHRISTI, and you will need no arguments to prove the text of this remark. Those, who compiled, in the XVIth century, the Alcoran of the Franciscans, took their materials from thence, and only published some abstracts of this book, with marginal notes. They made use of the edition of Milan, 1510. In all likelihood, the Franciscans would have been a little wiser, had they foreseen what happened by the means of Luther and Calvin. But those, who dared exclaim against the Romish church, were, for so long a time, crushed by the secular power, that they easily believed those, who should follow their steps, would meet with the same fate. But they were mistaken. A large body of a church arose before the middle of the XVIth century; and this large body as yet maintains itself, subsists, and is still in a capacity to make itself dreaded. It has had abundance of writers of all sorts, who have taken notice of the impertinencies of former authors. Therefore, as the impression of the book, intitled, Liber Conformitatum, &c. was imprudently allowed, the Franciscans have been obliged to smart for it. This is not a blow, that is soon over, as when a whole sect is extirpated, with all its books. But those, who gave this blow, have a great many authors among them, and a great many libraries, and printing houses.

[G] Some of those jests are, without doubt, too biting and malicious. I reckon among them what I have already said concerning the marks of Francis. Those blows with a spit, which he received from St Dominic, must be looked upon as a ridiculous and malicious story. Some body framed to himself a comical notion of the two founders of these orders, and fancied, that, one day, they quarrelled, and came to blows; and that, St Francis hiding himself under a bed, his antagonist, armed with a spit, thrust it five or six times into his body: whereupon another carried the jest so far, as to say, that St Francis's marks proceeded from this quarrel. I also rank, among these jests, this rally of d'Aubigné (29): 'If any bishop, or cardinal, falls in love with his page, let him comfort himself after the example of St Francis, who calls his love to brother Maceus, sacred. And, in truth, they expressed their lust even at the altar; for, as the said book says, St Francis was all in a flame, when he looked upon brother Maceus, and would often cry out, as he did one day, when he held the chalice, and Maceus the burette: or cruel, as if he had been transported with fury, Præbe mihi te ipsum!' Lastly I reckon, among those malicious jests, Conrad Badius's glosses, which I am going to relate. I put them, as he does, in the margin. As for the text, taken from the book intitled, Liber Conformitatum, &c. here it is in the body of this column. 'We must know how St Clara † was dedicated and consecrated to CHRIST. The night after Palm-Sunday, being in honest company, she went out of the town of Assisi, and came to St Mary of the angels, in the convent of the brethren, where St Francis and his companions stayed for her; where, being honourably received by St Francis, and his companions, she was conducted to the altar of the virgin Mary; and there, in the first place, she was shaved; then her worldly cloaths were pulled off, and the habit of the order put on her: which being done, St Francis, and his companions, conducted her to the monastery of Panzo, which is now of his order, and was before of that of St Benedict. . . . One time, St Clara told St Francis, that she had a mind to eat with him; but he would by no means agree to it; for which he was blamed by his guilty of so many extravagancies during his life [H]. He died the fourth of October 1226 (d), and was canonized by Pope Gregory IX, the sixth of May, 1230. His festival was appointed to be on the fourth day of October. The most violent satire, that hath appeared against him, is one intitled, Alcoranus Franciscanorum. A Monk of his order has endeavoured to refute it [I].

He has said before, that the was 43 years that up, without stirring out of the monastery. Recall these two things, if you can. In the mean time remember what I have already observed, That, if these things are true, it may well be conjectured, that lewdness was mixed with his holiness. For what decency is it, for two monks to go along with two monks, from one place to another, for dinner? Moreover, whence came this locution in this holy man, to feast with the holiness of this fine father? He tells that he had a mind to rump, and to move their former acquaintance? lib. pag. 225.

his brethren, and therefore at last he consented. Thus having with her a she-friend, and two of St Francis's companions, she came to St Mary of the angels; and, after she had bowed before the altar of the virgin, where she had married CHRIST, she went to eat the dinner, which St Francis had ordered to be laid on the ground. For the first course, St Francis began to speak of God so sweetly and holily, and so divinely and sublimely, that the good faint himself, St Clara, and her friend, with the other brothers, were charmed with it; and, on a sudden, as they were thus transported, having their hands and eyes lifted up to heaven, a great fire appeared over the convent of the brethren, so that the place and the forest seemed all in a flame. The inhabitants of Assisi, seeing this, made all the haste they could to the convent, to put out the fire; but they saw that nothing had been damaged, and that the brethren, and St Clara, were in ecstasies; and then they perceived, that the fire was a divine fire, which had visibly appeared to comfort those, who were there assembled, wherewith they were mightily edified. Now when they came to themselves, not caring for any other vicuals, St Clara and her friend returned to her monastery (30). Nothing can be more dull and impertinent, than what Badius says in his last gloss: A great fire appeared upon the convent; that is to say, it was reported abroad, that the monks diverted themselves there with some nuns. What sort of interpretation is this? Is not this to transfer Anaxagoras's principles of physics into morality (31). At this rate, one may find any thing any where.

[H] He gave so many marks of extravagancy during his life. He, who had a wife, and daughters, of snow, might very well have swallowed, and graphoppers, for his sisters, and hares and lambs for his brothers; for thus he called these animals. Swallows, my sisters, you have chattered enough: my brother leopards, dost thou let thyself be thus deceived? Graphopper, my sister, sing and praise the creator. He told a countryman, who carried two lambs upon his shoulders, why dost thou thus torment my brothers? his mercy extended even to lice and worms; for he would not suffer them to be killed; because it is said, in the twenty first psalm, I am a worm, and not a man. . . . He himself killed the eldest son of a physician, in a place, called Nuceria, to have the pleasure of raising him again from the dead (32). Compare this passage of Mr Jurieu with that of Mr Ferrand, which I am going to quote, and you will see what facts cannot be disputed: they are those, which Mr Ferrand durst not deny. 'I omit here,

(Mr Ferrand speaks) (33) those things, which are either of no moment, or which are notoriously false; as is, for instance, St Francis's clemency to lice and worms, which he would not suffer to be killed; and the murder, which the apologist says this saint committed on the eldest son of a physician, to have the pleasure of raising him from the dead. This is either so weak, or so evidently false, that we ought not to insist upon it. The bare proposing of it is its refutation. These are the only falsties which Mr Ferrand upbraids his adversary with; he therefore grants the rest; and that is enough to shew, that Francis had unhinged his mind by some very false notions of devotion. I pity Mr Ferrand, for having engaged to apologize for these fine fraternities. 'If the apologist, says he (34), was like St Bonaventura, he would take care (35) not to censure the name of sister and brother; which St Francis gave to animals. He would admire that, as well as St Bonaventura. Whose interpreter I cannot forbear to be here again.' St Francis, considering the first origin of all things, and being full of an abundant charity, called, by the name of brother and sister, the minutest creatures. He did it, because he knew, that these animals came from the same principle, as he, that is, that God was their creator: but he embraced, with more tenderness and friendship, those animals, which, both by their own nature, and by the application, which the scripture made of them, represented the meekness of JESUS CHRIST; as, for instance, lambs. As he was one day at Santa Maria della Portiuncula, there was a graphopper on a fig-tree, near the cell of the man of God. This graphopper invited often, by her notes, the servant of God to praise him; for he had learned to admire the magnificence of the creator, even in the smallest beings. He called her one day, and, as if she had been inspired from above, she flew upon Francis's hand. This saint said to her; sister graphopper, sing, and praise God by your tunes. The graphopper obeyed immediately, and fell a singing. If it be true, that St Francis placed himself stark naked in the room of a crucifix, we cannot doubt, but that he was mad. I do not affirm it positively, because I have only read it in the Confession of Sancy. Let us see the passage, and fetch it a little higher. 'When we read of St Francis cohabiting with his wife of snow, it must be said, that it was an antidote against his own natural heat, and that which appears in his posterity. When he preached to fishes, it implies, that, when his posterity preaches, they want dumb hearers. When he preached to them, as a miracle, that God preserved them from drowning at the flood; it means, according to Richeome, that the miracles of the Romish church are to proceed from natural causes. When he called wolves his brothers, and gave them his hand, it was to foretel, that the Franciscans would be a ravenous crew, who would endeavour to surprize innocent sheep. He called swallows his sisters, because his brothers, as well as they, in the time of matins, nestle in the bores houses. When the angel told him, in his prayers, that Antichrist would come out of his order, it was, that the Franciscans might not be thought unworthy of being Popes. And, when he laid aside his shirt, to stand naked before the ladies, in the place of a crucifix, it was to shew the beauties of nature, as not having eaten of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, and to represent, if not the knowledge, at least the nakedness of father Adam (36). I conclude with this observation; none have done more prejudice to St Francis, than his own children. If, when they published his history, they had expunged several things, which were not fit to be rehearsed, they had not given the Protestants occasion to laugh at him. What grief was it not for the Irish Capuchins, when they came to settle at Sedan, to find themselves entertained with three sermons from Mr du Moulin (37) full of the ridiculous passages of their patriarch's legend, which that minister, who naturally loved bantering, seasoned pretty high?

[I] A Franciscan monk has endeavoured to refute the Alcoranus Franciscanorum. The author of this refutation is a Franciscan of the Low-Countries, called Henry Sedulius. He published his book (38) at Antwerp, in the year 1607. He observes, 1. that the book intitled, Liber Conformitatum, &c. was composed by brother Bartholomew de Pisis in the year 1389; and that in the year 1513, a book intitled, The Alcoran of the Franciscans, appeared, in High-Dutch, against it, without the name either of the author or bookseller. 2. That this Alcoran, enlarged by half, appeared at Geneva, in Latin and French, in the year 1578, and that it was printed in Dutch at Dort in the year 1589 (39). He observes, 3. that the author of this Alcoran is called Erasmus Alberus, and styles himself minister of the church in the country of Brandenburg. Now as, in the year 1513, Luther had not yet declared against the Pope, Sedulius fancies, that the date of the impression is supposititious; for before Luther, the title of Ecclesiæ minister was not in use. In the 4th place, he observes, that it is a calumny to affirm, as Alberus does, that the Liber Conformitatum, &c. hath as much authority among the Franciscans, as the Alcoran among the Turks. 5. He denies, what Conrad Badius asserts (40), that, since the reformation, this Liber Conformitatum, &c. which was often reprinted before that time, is as much suppressed as can be. He sets, upon that account, Badius in opposition to Luther (41), and observes, that this book was printed at Bologne

(37) They were printed in the year 1641. Father Joseph wrote against these sermons; but du Moulin replied by a book, intitled, De Capuchin, which he published at Sedan, in the same year 1641. See the remark [M].

(f) Author of the book, intitled, Liber Conformitatum, &c., which is the ground and foundation of the Satire, intitled, Alcoranus Franciscanorum.

The method he has taken will rather please, than displease, his enemies (e); for, instead of condemning what is evidently blameable, in the Liber Conformitatum, he has attempted either to justify, or excuse, it all. It was impossible to succeed in this; and therefore his book is only fit to inspire these thoughts into the minds of the Protestants, viz. that the monks, unwilling to abate any thing, do still approve the greatest excess of superstition, which was occasioned by the gloomy ages of ignorance. Would they but abandon the cause of Bartholomew de Pisis (f), they might, in some measure, stop the mouths of those, who lay a great stress upon the Alcoran of the Franciscans; but with might and main to defend it, is to put new arms into their hands, and to give them the satisfaction of seeing that this satire was reasonable, and that it attacked an inveterate Disease, against which the most caustic remedies were not too strong. I know, that the Franciscans might have feared something, had they confessed themselves in the wrong: And this gives me occasion to say, that those are under very unhappy circumstances, who, being assaulted by their enemies, afford them matter of triumph, whatever course they may take [K]. The Franciscans find themselves in this plunge, when they are reproached with the extravagant and scandalous propositions of the book of Conformities. They are not the only people, that are resolved, right or wrong, to acknowledge Bologne in the year 1590. Lastly, he observes, that the names of the compilers of this Alcoran appear neither in the German, nor in the French and Dutch editions; and that he will not answer the marginal observations, but only the objections that are grounded on the words of Bartholomew de Pisis.

The notes on the Confession Catholique of Sancy (42) inform us, that the Alcoran of the Franciscans was printed with this title, De stygmatisato Idolo, quod Franciscum viscant, blasphemiarum & nugarum lerna, seu Alcoranus Franciscanorum, in 1543; and that it was only a translation from the High-Dutch, which was published in 1513, or rather in 1531; for, in 1513, there were as yet no Protestants; and that this year, 1531, which is only a transposition of the two preceding numbers, is set down † for the epoch of the life of Dr Erasmus Alberus, who at first wrote, in High-Dutch, the Franciscan Alcoran. Let us see Andrew Rivet's judgment upon this work of Sedulius. A certain Franciscan, called Henry Sedulius, says he (43), who attempted to mimic Lipsius, both endeavoured to defend all these idle tales and scandalous propositions, heaping together several sentences out of ecclesiastical authors, and others, which only swell his book, and perplex the subject: and, though, at the beginning, he grants, that there is something too free in this book, by reason of the simple age it was writ in, yet there is no freedom of expression there, but he strives to justify: and therefore he compares them to some few drops of water, which do not alter the nature of wine, instead of acknowledging them a rank poison, that choke the understanding of those, who delight to drink of it. This book is approved by the censors of Antwerp, as very useful against heretics. Truly, it is so useful to us, that I could wish, for the glory of God, that there was not one Papist of sense, but what had one, and read it with attention, that he might say to the author, and those like him, thou hast a whore's forehead, and thou refusedst to be ashamed †. To make this appear, requires a larger volume than this; but this is sufficient.

[K] Those are under very unhappy circumstances, who, being assaulted by their enemies, afford them matter of triumph every way.] Those authors, who are exposed to such attacks, are like the Roman army, who suffered themselves to be hemmed in ad furculas caudinas (44). They could not get out, but by submitting to great ignominy. They could neither resist, nor capitulate, but at a great disadvantage. There are some controversies, which have the same fate. Peace cannot be sued for, nor war continued, but to one's confusion. This was the case of the Franciscans in the XVIth century, when the Protestants attacked them, concerning the book of Bartholomew de Pisis. To acknowledge, that this work contained many blasphemies, many ridiculous, extravagant, and impious propositions, &c. was to sacrifice the glory of the order, scandalize devout souls, and acknowledge that the heretics were obliged to teach them how to think and speak better. Besides, it was to make those heretics proud, to give them a large scope to insult the Franciscans, and to prepare them the way to overthrow many other things, by acknowledging, that they were mistaken in some, and that they had left the world, for so long a time, in a gross superstition. They thought it better neither to give way, nor to capitulate, but to defend themselves as well as they could, though their post was not well fortified. They then saw themselves within the reach of the ancient proverb, A fronte præcipitum, à tergo lupi; Go forward and fall, go backward and mar all. There was a necessity to choose one of two evils, and they thought the worst was to confess themselves vanquished: they hoped, some apologies might be made, which would satisfy devout souls; and that their adversaries replies, though never so strong, would not stagger the faith of good Romanists. In a word, they found, that, if it was dishonourable to contend, it was much more so not to resist (45). Generally speaking, it is true, that, in a dispute, he, who attacks, has more advantage, and can better maintain his ground, than he, who is attacked: but this was more particularly true, with reference to those, who declared war against the book of Conformities. They fought, sure of the victory; they run no risk; and they were certain to get the better, which way soever the enemy turned. If he holds his peace, they might have said, he will acknowledge our objections unanswerable: if he suppresses the book of Conformities, he will grant the same thing; for he will confess himself ashamed of the extravagancies of his predecessors, and confirm our charge against them. If he pretends to justify this book, he will as much confirm our accusation: his answers will be wretched, and only shew his obstinacy, and give us a fair opportunity to insult over him, and tell him, that he does not innocently suffer for the faults of his ancestors (46), but rather as an accomplice, since he adopts them, and endeavours to justify them as well as he can. Note, that Sedulius, the apologist of Bartholomew de Pisis, observes, that there were some heretics, who charged the Franciscans with being ashamed of this book, and that others upbraid them with not being ashamed of it (47). Were not they like to expose themselves, whether they approved, or disapproved, the book of Conformities?

Such must always be the fate of those who are to defend posts of this nature. Mr le Camus, the famous bishop of Bellai, did not foresee, when he began a controversy with Mr Drelincourt about the worship of the virgin Mary, that he would be drawn into this desile. Mr Drelincourt made a large collection of the most extravagant expressions, that he found in the writings of the Roman Catholics, concerning the power of the holy virgin, and desired Monsieur le Camus to give him his opinion about them. This prelate was hampered; he racked his invention and fancy, and answered, that he was in the country, and could not come to verify the passages alledged by the minister; he drolled, and gave himself merry airs; but, in the main, he formally condemned nothing: he durst neither swallow, nor cast out the bit; he only chewed it, and even recurred to a mean and comical recrimination (48). All which proves how much he was puzzled. This recrimination, how bad soever it be, is more tolerable than that, which the Franciscan Feuardentius made use of in a like case. It came into his head to reproach the ministers, that Theodore Beza had invoked his Candida as a goddess. These are his words: 'But what will you say, if I shew you, by the writings of your chief ministers and preachers, that they invoke and adore their whores as Goddesses?'

acknowledge nothing; for the Jesuits also undertake to defend the book of Bartholomew de Pisis, when they see it attacked by the Protestants [L]. Some laymen have been seen to take pen in hand in a like cause, against the minister du Moulin [M], and have met with the fate they deserved. However, the Franciscans continue to preach up many absurd things concerning their founder; and the world would be better informed of

Is not that to deny the only living and true God?
These are Beza's own verses concerning his whore Candida.

Et tamen hæc aude maculare, & dicere nigram?
Define, habet certe Numen & ista suum.
Quæ nisi sit precibus nostris lenita, veremur
Ne dicas læsæ quàm gravis ira deæ.

Dare you to blacken and prophane the fair?
Dress: for, O! divinity is in her.
If she relent not at our prayer, expect
To feel the vengeance of an angry goddess.

And a little after,

Parce, rogo, quæcunque dea es.

Thy humble supplicant in mercy spare,
Whate'er divinity resides within thee.

And again,

Ecce fugam fateor, veniam ne, Diva, negabo.

After that, he gives and consecrates his soul to her,
as to a goddess:

Te pridem Dominam vocetque ametque, Se rursus tibi datque dedicatque. — My very soul, dedicated to thee, and burnt up with the fires of your love; which, though it has been long your's, and has long called you its mistress, and loved you, again devotes and dedicates itself to you.

And again,

Ergo fas alium te, Candida, dicere Solem, Upotè quæ facias æstum hyememque mihi.

Thou art, my Candida, another sun,
Since from thy kind, or angry, eyes alone
My summer and my winter I derive.

Doth it become your authors, and arch-preachers, to call their flutes, Ladies, Mistresses, Suns, and Goddesses; and is it idolatry for the Catholics to call the most holy Virgin, and mother of God, star of the sea, advocate of sinners, life, sweetness, and queen of mercy (49)? Any body may see how ridiculous this parallel is: for, 1. there is a vast difference between a poetical expression, and a phrase of devotion. Those are only witty conceits, which are not serious; but these are seriously used, as an act of religion. In the 2d place, Beza was not a minister, when he made those verses. 3. He disowned, and abhorred, them as soon as he made public profession of the Protestant religion.

[L] The Jesuits also undertake to defend the book of Bartholomew de Pisis, when they see it attacked by the Protestants. Du Plessis Mornai, in one of his books (50), displayed the comparisons, which the author of the Conformities has made between JESUS CHRIST, and the founder of the Franciscans. Gresser, the Jesuit, answered (51), that there is nothing in that work, but that a pious soul may make a good use of; and that there are a great many things in it, which a wicked soul may wrongfully explain; that, before candor and simplicity had forsaken the earth, many things were said simply and candidly, which now men of deceitful hearts cavil at and revile. After this manner, this is Andrew Rivet's reflexion (52), any one may defend Mahomet's Alcoran; and there is not a blasphemous expression, but may be turned into a divine sentence by those, who can so easily satisfy thus their pious souls, little zealous for the honour of CHRIST. Coëffeteau, who was a Dominican, did not stand up so much in vindication of this book of Bartholomew de Pisis, when he answered this work of du Plessis. As for the book of the Conformities between St Francis and JESUS CHRIST, the Romish church has never approved it. It is the work of a private man, who, transported with an indiscreet zeal for his patriarch, may very well be blamed for want of judgment; because, being willing to stretch too far his encomium, he has written some things, which may be explained in a bad sense. Those of his order, who approved it in their general chapter, did not imagine that his words would be so severely construed; and I am sure, that not one of them believed, for all that, that St Francis equaled, or was above, JESUS CHRIST, though they looked upon him as one of the great saints of heaven (53). Let us conclude with Rivet's reply: 'If the Romish church doth not approve these blasphemies, why has it born with them so long? why have the censors of books, the masters of the palace of Rome, and all the inquisitors, been as it were asleep, with relation to them? have not they approved, by their silence, of two hundred years standing, what the infamous Bartholomew de Pisis hath written? have not they, of late years, given leave that it should be printed at Bologna, without any censure or preservative? can Coëffeteau, then, throw it upon a private man, who, transported with an ardent zeal . . . He comes off very cheap, if this will serve his turn. What, was his general, and the chapter, a private man? they did not believe, says he, that his words would be so severely construed. But could they say, with a good conscience, that, after they had thoroughly examined it, they had not found in it any thing that wanted to be corrected? is it not at least a proof of palpable stupidity and ignorance (54)?' I wanted this to prove what I have already said, concerning the inextricable labyrinths, into which the Protestants have driven their adversaries, when they attacked the author of the Conformities. And thus far the influence of the folly of a private man extends: it exposes a whole society to storms, as formerly Ajax's crime exposed the Grecian fleet (55). If you would rather have another comparison, see the margin (56).

[M] Some laymen have been seen to take pen in hand in a like case against the minister du Moulin. William Cacherat, advocate, the king's attorney in the admiralty of France, in the jurisdiction of Quillebœuf, wrote a book, printed at Paris in the year 1642, intitled, The Capuchin vindicated against the calumnies of Mr Peter du Moulin, minister; or, an apologetic treatise, containing the just reasons, why the parliament of Bourdeaux hath caused to be burned, by the executioner of criminal sentences, the defamatory libel against the Capuchins, written and published at Sedan by this minister, and dispersed in this kingdom, contrary to the edicts of pacification: with a summary refutation of the calumnies and impieties, which are contained in it. I have already spoken (57) of this work of du Moulin; and I add here, that Cacherat shewed as much zeal to vindicate the Capuchins, as if he had been of their order; but his apology is good for nothing. He reckons (58) this passage the ninth calumny of that minister: 'The Capuchins, who profess to observe entirely St Francis' rule, do not observe it; for his rule commands, that the Franciscans should work with their hands, which the Capuchins do not.' Let us see how he strains, to prove that it is a calumny: 'The generals of the order, says he (59), who are to give an account of the actions of all their monks to the cardinal their patron, and he to the Pope, and who have the greatest interest, that the rule be punctually observed, and who watch carefully, that it should be so, do not complain, that it is neglected: and the minister du Moulin, having no authority to enquire into it, nor having ever been in the convents of this order, of this, were all prelates as vigilant and steady as the archbishop of Rheims [N]. Let us speak of another matter of fact. Francis founded an order, which, in a short time, grew very considerable, and has been a main prop of Popery. Some Popes, several Cardinals, a great many Prelates, and famous Authors have been of that order. Some particulars concerning this may be seen in the commentary of Henry Sedulius, a Flemish Franciscan, on the life of St Francis, composed by St Bonaventura (g); and a great many particulars in the annals of the order, written in several volumes by Lucas Wadding, an Irish Franciscan, who writ also a volume concerning the Franciscan authors. This order is divided into several bodies, some more rigid than others, but all true heirs of that old emulation, which soon appeared between the children of St Francis, and those of St Dominic. This emulation hath divided them, not only in religious matters, to see whether it be punctually observed, ought to be looked upon as a slanderer, and ignorant of what St Francis meant by these words, to work with their own hands; which ought not to be understood as this minister will have it, but as the church and the superiors of the order understood them, and explain them now. It is evident, that to prove a calumny after this manner is very little to the purpose; and that it is rather a calumny, than a refutation of a calumny. This pretended proof amounts to this; The church dispenses the Capuchins from the literal observation of their rule: but that very thing proves, that they do not observe it, and that du Moulin's accusation is just. Had he accused them of infringing the orders of their founder, without being warranted by some dispensations, or allegorical glosses, he might have been filled a calumniator; but he only said, that they did not observe St Francis's rule. Their vindication, grounded on the dispensations of Popes, and on the interpretation of their superiors, would not have puzzled this minister; it would have afforded him new arguments against him. And indeed it is a very great abuse, to profess a very austere rule, and afterwards to obtain a dispensation to infringe it. And this the Franciscans did, with relation to their vow of poverty: they got the Pope to give them leave to handle money, which gave birth to a dispute, that made a great noise in England, of which Erasmus gives a very diverting description (60). Read it, and you will see, that the motive, which obliged Standish, the ringleader of the Franciscans in that country, to make such a stir, was, that he might hinder the Augustins from pursuing their traffic, because their gain diminished that of the Franciscans. Some mendicant friars, famous for their writings, might be named, who had leave from their superiors to bargain with bookellers. The latter give them a good price for their copies, and for the trouble of correcting the proofs: they give the author both money and copies, and the author himself sells for ready money the copies that are given him. Do they then observe their vow? not at all. But they have leave to break it; and that very thing proves, that they do not observe it. This dispensation supposes, and proves, that they do infringe it.

(62) He gave them himself their recantation in writing, to undeceive the people, whom they had deceived, to make them for the future more circumspect in the exercise of their functions, and to give the people a preservative against such extravagancies. The three preachers humbly complied with his orders; and the Franciscan declared in the pulpit, that the text, which he had taken for the subject of his sermon, Tres sunt qui testimonium dant in Cælo, Pater, Verbum, & Spiritus Sanctus, & hi tres unum sunt, had no relation to what he had undertaken to discourse upon, and could not be applied to it, without evidently wresting the word of God: that, having a wrong notion of the merits of St Francis, though he was a great saint before God and men, he had rashly affirmed, that St Francis, in the Portiuncula, had done, by his tears, what Jesus Christ did for sinners, in the manger of Bethlehem, by his; that St Francis had done, in the Portiuncula, by the blood of his wounds, what Jesus Christ did by his on Calvary; and that St Francis had done, in his heart, for sinners, what Jesus Christ did in his upon the cross. . . . (63) The Capuchin recanted likewise some propositions, contrary to sound doctrine, which he had asserted in a sermon the same day. The first, that St Francis, protesting himself on the ground, made the son of God come a second time upon earth. The second, that the Portiuncula is so entire and perfect an amnesty, that it may be said, that, in all former ages, God never shewed himself more indulgent to sinners, than at that solemnity: that, when he had said, that St Francis, like St Paul, may boast, to have completed what was wanting in our Saviour's passion, he had made a rash application of this apostle's words, and contrary to their true meaning: that he had also advanced a rash and false proposition, when he made St Francis say, my God, if it be necessary, that your justice should be satisfied, pardon, mercy, mercy to sinners; I offer to be alone the victim, and to satisfy your justice for them. . . . (64) He acknowledges further, that, in a parallel . . . which is false, rash, and erroneous, as well as what he had affirmed, that the indulgence of the Portiuncula is an image of the immensity, infinity, and eternity of God, because it is gained in all St Francis's churches, because it expiates the punishment of sin, and will endure to the end of the world. These are the propositions which the Benedictin was obliged to retract: (95) The first is that, wherein it is said, that he did not know which to admire most, the divine word coming down into the chaste bosom of Mary, or the same Jesus coming down into the chapel of the Angels. The second, that he did not know which to admire most, St Francis's charity for sinners, or Jesus Christ's love for St Francis. The third, which he has repeated often, that St Francis made himself a victim for sinners, and hath taken upon him the sins of the world. The fourth, that Jesus Christ hath given to St Francis the fulness of his graces. The fifth is that, wherein he said, in many places of his sermon, that the holy Virgin hath an absolute power over her son, by reason of the authority of father and mother, which she hath over him. The sixth, that the cry of St Francis was more favourably heard, than that of Moses and St Paul. The seventh, that the Blessed Virgin gave St Francis the life of grace, as she gave our Saviour that of nature. The eighth, that St Francis makes up what is wanting to our Lord's passion in the behalf of sinners, by co-operating with him in his victories over sin and hell. He likewise retracts several other propositions, and dangerous expressions, as the following are: that the Franciscans are uterine brothers to Jesus Christ, the children of Mary, the companions of the blessed spirits; that, like them, they draw their origin from the midst of the splendors of grace and glory: that the plenary indulgence of the Portiuncula is irrevocable and eternal, sanctified by the Holy Ghost, who descended into the chapel of the Portiuncula, in the shape of a dove, as he appeared at the river Jordan, to make this indulgence as it were a baptism of salvation: that the indulgence of the Portiuncula doth not only remit the punishment due to sin, but in some manner the guilt of it, since it is Jesus Christ, who grants it; he, who never, during his mortal life, remitted sin, but he remitted both: that Jesus Christ himself grants the indulgence of the Portiuncula independently from the Popes: that it was a seraphim who drew up the bull of it: that St Francis asks either a fulness of grace for sinners, or a want of mercy for himself.

matters, as that about the immaculate conception of the holy virgin, but also about a great many questions of philosophy. The Scotists and Thomists, those Franciscans, and these Dominicans, differ as much now, as formerly the Platonists and Peripatetics did. I take no notice of a controversy, that lasted a long while among the monks of St Francis, and which created a great deal of trouble to their superiors and to the Popes, tho' it was only about a trifle; for the thing in dispute was only the shape of a hood, &c. Gentillet relates this very pleasantly (b). Mr Nicolle speaks of it in one of his imaginary letters. Observe, that the saint, of whom I speak, was called Francis, because his father had traded in France (i).

on what has been said.

To avoid prolixity, I will not make all the observations, which might be made upon what I have just now related. I will confine my self to three. The first is, that the same propositions, which the archbishop of Rheims obliged these fryars to disown, the same propositions, I say, or some equivalent to them, are every year preached, not only in Spain, Italy, Germany, &c. but also in France. The greatest part of the prelates do not mind it, or are not scandalized at it: And this is the reason, why these doctrines, meeting with no opposition, go on quietly; and it is never known in foreign countries, that they have been vented. Should we ever have known, that they were delivered from the pulpit in the diocese of Rheims, in the year 1694, if the archbishop had not taken exception at them, and obliged the three preachers to make public reparation for their faults? let this suffice to shew that the empire of the monkish fancies concerning the credit of certain saints, and the prerogatives of certain indulgences, is very little lessened; although the time of ignorance, which gave it birth, is vanished, and has been succeeded by a return of learning and knowledge, which have lasted a great while. My second observation is, that the Benedictin's hyperboles, concerning the indulgences of the Portiuncula, and the greatness of St Francis, exceeded those of the Franciscan, or Capuchin. This is a good office, which the monks mutually do one another. The Franciscans imagine, that the praises of their founder will not be so much suspected in the mouth of a monk of another order; and therefore they desire either a Benedictin, or a Carmelite, &c. to preach in their churches at their great festivals. He, whom they employ to preach, is sure to have his mind and body handsomely entertained; for he never returns to his convent, before he has been plentifully treated, and sufficiently praised, and largely thanked, for his eloquence. Besides, they are ready to requite him upon occasion; for his order hath also it's festivals. A Franciscan's sermon is requisite there, and is more effectual than one of the same order. He often is more extravagant in his encomium on the efficacy of the scapulary, than a Carmelite. This is a mutual intercourse of good offices. It is not long ago, that an ingenious man, and who is now a Protestant, told me, that, when he was a Benedictin, he was desired to preach in a convent of Franciscans, at the festival of the Portiuncula. They specified on what they would have him chiefly insist. He partly complied with their desire; but he gave his subject a certain turn, which did not please them. Some of them artfully let him know it: he excused himself, and then asked them, as among friends, whether it was reasonable to affirm in the pulpit so many things which are not true? what then will you have us do? replied they. Will you have us starve? which leads me to the third observation. There are several abuses in the Romish church, which, in all likelihood, will last as long as that church. It will be to no purpose to go from a learned age to one more learned; those things will not alter. It is true, they sprung up in the times of ignorance; but ignorance was not the only cause, nor even the principal cause, of their birth. The wants of a society, as well those of food, as commodious lodging; the interest they had in shewing the people an altar well set off, and rich church ornaments; all this required some wonderful descriptions, to exalt the privileges of a certain saint, or of a certain chapel, or of some particular festival. It was a daily fund of subsistence; and, when the anniversary feast came, then the order had it's harvest and vintage. Now the wants, that I speak of, are not subject to the vicissitude of light and darkness; they are the same at all times, in an ignorant, as well as in a learned age. Therefore, tho' knowledge is greater, and more common, yet they produce still the same effects. Philosophical heads are puzzled, whether they shall admire, in this, the long forbearance, or the long anger, of heaven. And some would willingly apply here the tantane animis caelestibus ira, which an English doctor applies to the errors in which the history of nations have been plunged for so many ages (66).

FRANCIS I, king of France, was one of those great princes, whose extraordinary qualities were mixed with many faults. The French historians (a) very sincerely acknowledge this mixture; and even some complain, that the Spanish writers, instead of acknowledging it, affect to represent this king as an accomplished prince [A]. There may be a great deal of design in both their proceedings; however there seems to be less in the French, than in the Spanish writers. For a man must be blind, not clearly to perceive, in Francis the first's reign, a long series of faults and imprudence. This prince had like to have deprived himself of the right of succeeding Lewis XII. He took the ready

[A] The French historians . . . complain, that the Spanish writers . . . affect to represent this king as an accomplished prince. Some of Mr Varillas's critics would have had him imitate the . . . Italian and Spanish historians who have not been contented to exaggerate Francis the first's noble actions, but have moreover concealed those, that were not praise-worthy (1). Among other things, he answers, that they did it not to oblige Francis I, but that they wrote favourably of him, by a refined policy, which it is necessary to unfold; and he unfolds it thus: 'They were jealous of the growth of France, and they were afraid, lest the French should carry their conquests even into their country, after they were free from those civil wars, they had been involved in for forty years. There was no better way to prevent it, than to persuade the French, that they would not, for the future, have better success against Spain, Germany, and the Low Countries, than they had under Francis I; and, to effect it, they were to be accustomed to read, in the history of this prince, that he had done what mortal man could do against the house of Austria, and that he was not able to shake it: that he had made no false steps: that the faults, which were ascribed to him, belonged rather to the monarchy, than to the monarch; that is to say, that Francis I had, for his part, done what ought to be done, to overcome Charles V, but that France could not make sufficient efforts, nor raise men and money enough for so great a victory: that what was imputed to Francis I, as a misfortune, ought to be ascribed only to the weakness of his kingdom; and that, if the greatest generals and politicians, that ever were, had commanded the same armies, and had been in the same circumstances, they had been overcome at the battle of Pavia, and, like him, had disentangled themselves by the shameful treaties of Madrid, Cambray, and Crepy. The French historians might have easily refused so palpable an error, ready way to it, by the tender caresses, wherewith he charmed the young queen (b) [B], when he was informed of the danger he exposed himself to. Altho' this story is variously told [C], yet it is not agreed on all hands, that he made a good use of this wholefome for, by laying open, as I have done, the naked truth, and by shewing, by authentic pieces, that Francis Ist did not do, by far, what he might have done against Charles V, and that it was several times in his power to beat him: that his most christian majesty's negligence, and preposterous management in some things, cannot be excused: that these irregularities proceeded always from the monarch, and not from the monarchy: that weakness had no share in it, and misfortune the least; that these miscarriages were chiefly occasioned by the misunderstanding, so common, in the history of France, between the sovereigns of former times, and their ministers: and that some better generals, and more vigilant politicians, would one day mend what Francis Ist had spoiled.

[B] The tender caresses, wherewith he charmed the young queen.] Lewis XII, who had married the king of England's sister, in the month of November, 1514, died the first of January following; and many thought that his too great caresses of the young queen were the cause of his death (2). These caresses, excessive for so tender a prince as he was, were not so for his spouse, who was but eighteen years of age. She hearkened to amorous tales both in French and English. A gentleman of her own country loved her, and had followed her into France. She married him afterwards. On the other hand, she appeared charming to the presumptive heir of the crown. He then was called the duke of Valois. Let us see what Mezerau says: 'The young duke of Valois, who was a great admirer of fine ladies, was soon smitten with the young queen; and Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, who loved her before this marriage, and followed the court of France as ambassador of England, had not extinguished his first flame: but Arthur de Gouffier-Boisy, who had been governor to the duke of Valois, representing to him, that he run the risk of getting a master, and that he ought to fear the same thing from the duke of Suffolk; he cured himself of this folly, and had this duke narrowly watched (3).'

(2) Mezerau's History of France, Tom. II, p. 372.

Varillas has very much enlarged upon this: he speaks thus, after having said that the count of Angoulême (4) was ordered to go and marry, at Bologne, the princess of England for the king. 'He could not forbear being smitten with her, whom he married for his father-in-law (5), as she could not forbear wishing, that heaven had given her the count for her husband. Perhaps, the convenience, which they had of seeing one another, might have made them carry things too far, if the protonotary du Prat (6), who was sent with the count to check the violent motions of his youth, had not made him consider, that it was the new queen's interest not to be chaste; because going to a husband, by whom every body told her she should have no children, it was to be feared she would give way to the temptation of having a son, who should support her in her rank in France, when she became a widow, and exempt her from returning into England under her brother's government: but that, as for him, he had the greatest interest in the world to take care, that the queen should be chaste, so far ought he to be from debauching her; since, if she had a son, tho' by him, this son would hinder him from coming to the crown, and force him to be satisfied with the duchy of Bretagne, which he had by his wife: besides, he would be obliged, against the order of nature, to pay homage for it to his own ballard. This reason flattered the count of Angoulême's egotisms, who, ever after, only looked on the queen with a jealous eye. He observed her so narrowly, that he discovered at last her inclination for Suffolk (7).'

(7) Varillas's History of Francis I, lib. i, p. 17.

[C] This story is variously told.] Brantome does not give the glory of this prudent advice, either to Gouffier-Boisy, or Du Prat, but to a gentleman of his province. I am sure, that his words will be more acceptable than mine, and therefore I will transcribe them (8). 'They say, that queen Mary of England, third wife to king Lewis XII, did not do the same thing (9); for, being displeased with, and dissident of, the king her husband's strength, she had a mind to found the ford, taking the count of Angoulême for her guide, who was afterwards king Francis, and then a very beautiful and agreeable prince, whom she made very much of, calling him always Monsieur mon beau-fils; (my son-in-law) and so he was; for he had already married the lady Claudia, king Lewis's daughter. She was truly very much smitten with him, and he with her; so that they would have proceeded too far, had it not been for the late Mr de Grignaux, a gentleman of Perigord, who had been knight of honour to queen Anne, as we have said, and was so still to queen Mary. This gentleman, being informed of the intrigue, that was then carried on, represented to the said count of Angoulême the fault that he was going to commit, and angrily told him; how now! what will you do? do not you see, that this cunning and subtle woman would draw you in to get her with child; and, if she comes to have a son, you will be still count of Angoulême, and never king of France, as you expect? the king her husband is old, and cannot get her with child; and you will meddle with her, and do it so well, you that are young and hot, and she young and hot too, that it will take like wild-fire; she will bring you a child, and then you are very well helped up. You may then indeed say, adieu my share to the kingdom of France; therefore think on it. This queen had a mind to put in practice the Spanish proverb, which says, that nunca muger aguda murio sin herederos; an ingenious woman never dies without heirs: that is to say, that, if her husband does not get her some, she employs a second to perform that office. The count of Angoulême thought seriously upon it, and protested, that he would be wife, and quiet his design; but, being inticed over and over by the caresses and allurements of this beautiful English woman, he was more smitten than ever. How furious is love! that, for the sake of such a little piece of flesh, which a man longs for, he abandons, nay loses kingdoms and empires; and you may see frequent instances of this in history. At last, Mr de Grignaux, seeing this young man run headlong to his ruin, and that he went on with his intrigue, told it to the countess of Angoulême his mother; who curbed his love, and chid him for it, so that he left it off. Compare these three relations, and you will find they vary a little; but Brantome chiefly differs from Mezerau and Varillas in this, that the young queen, being a widow, endeavoured to suppose a child, to supplant Francis I. The two other historians clear her from that crime. After Lewis the twelfth's death, Mary of England was thought to be with child; but the contrary was soon known, by her own acknowledging she was not. They are Mezerau's words (10). These are Varillas's (11). The queen was as narrowly watched as before, whilst there was room left to doubt whether she was with child; but after she had declared that she was not, and that there were sufficient proofs that what she said was true, the count of Angoulême, coming to the crown, &c. Brantome speaks after a very different manner (12). 'They report however, that the said queen did what she could, to live and reign as queen mother, a little before, and after the king her husband's death: but he died too soon, and she had too little time to compleat her design; and yet she reported, every day after the death of the king her husband, that she was with child; so that, being not so inwardly, they say, she swelled herself outwardly, by little and little, with linnen cloths; and, the time being come, she had a supposed child, which another big bellied woman was to have, and to produce at the pretended time of her delivery. But the lady regent, who was a Savoyard, and knew what it was to have children, and who saw, that her's and her son's interest was too much concerned in this affair, had her well examined and searched by physicians wholsome advice; but he was not circumspect with regard to other women (c); and some pretend, that it cost him his life [D]. I have said elsewhere (d), that the chief of his mistresses had like to have made him lose his whole kingdom. He did not suspect that black design; and, seeing how ill his affairs went, he let fall some complaints against divine providence [E]. It was during a war, which was sooner ended, than scians and midwives, and, by the sight and discovery of the linnen and clouts, she was found out, and so miscarried in her design; and, instead of being queen-mother, she was sent back into her own country. This irrefragably confutes those, who say, in behalf of king James (13), that it cannot come into any one's thought, who is in the midst of a numerous court, always surrounded with a vast number of domestics, to suppose a child. Here is Brantome, who understood the world as well as another, and knew the court extremely well; here is he, I say, relating such another project actually carried on at the court of France. It is an argument, that there are some men of sense, who fancy, that it may be done.

[D] Some pretend, that it cost him his life. The French authors speak very freely of this. One of them, mentioning an abscess, which reduced this prince to a very low condition (14), adds; I have sometimes heard say, that he had got this distemper of the handsome Ferroniere, one of his mistresses, whose picture is still to be seen in some closets of the curious; and that her husband, out of a strange and silly sort of revenge, went into a scandalous house, on purpose to get this infectious distemper, that he might infect them both. Tho' the danger was over, yet did he suffer for a long while after (15). Thus Mezerai speaks, under the year 1539. Let us see what he says concerning the king's last sickness. That malignant ulcer, which happened to him in the year 1539, not being cured by his physicians, because they durst not treat him with that severe method, which ought to be used in those distempers, crept as far as the neck of the bladder, and began to corrode it with intolerable heats; so that this pain and infection, which was spread all over his body, caused in him a slow fever, and a fullen perverseness, which made him incapable of any great design (16). This slow fever was soon converted into a continual fever, which carried him off the thirtieth of March 1547. Although this author, in his chronological abridgment, has said most of the things, which we have just now seen, I will set down here what he repeats, because something new will be found in it. Three months after, the king was grievously sick of an ulcer, which affected that part, which the physicians call the Perinaeum. This distemper was reported to be the result of a scandalous intrigue, which he had with the handsome Ferroniere, one of his mistresses. This woman's husband enraged at an affront, which courtiers call only gallantry, bethought himself to go to a bawdy-house, to infect himself, that he might infect his wife, and so extend his revenge to his rival. The unhappy woman died of it; her husband was cured by some speedy remedies, and the king had all the troublesome symptoms of it. And, as his physicians took care of him more according to his quality than his distemper, something of it stuck by him ever after, whose malignity altered very much the sweetness of his temper, and made him peevish, suspicious, and hard to please (17). Tho' Mr Varillas, contrary to his custom on such sort of subjects, is short, yet he expresses himself fully enough, not to put his reader upon a necessity of supplying any thing by his imagination (18). I have read, in Brantome, that the king gave queen Claudia the distemper he had got. See father l'Enfant's Calendar (19), and you will find in it this pox of Francis I, which he had got with the handsome Ferroniere. This author quotes du Verdier in this king's life.

I have heard say, that this mistress was called LA FERONNIERE, only because her husband was an ironmonger. I should less suspect this, had not I read in Lewis Guion, that she, who was infected by her husband, and infected the king, was the wife of an advocate. These are this writer's words (20). Francis I, courted the wife of an advocate at Paris, who was a very handsome and genteel woman; I will not name him, because he has left some children, who are very rich, and in good repute. This Lady would not comply with him; which grieved the king extremely. This coming to be known by some courtiers, and royal pimps, they told him, by virtue of his royal authority and power, he might take her away. Pursuant to this advice, one of them went and told it to the lady, and the lady to her husband. The advocate saw very well, that his wife and he must quit the kingdom, which yet he was not sure they could do, if they did not obey. At last, the husband gives his wife leave to comply with the king's desires; and, to be no hindrance, he pretended to go into the country for eight or ten days about business. In the mean time, he kept himself private in Paris, and frequented bawdy-houses, that he might get the pox, to give it his wife, that the king might get it from her: he soon found what he sought, and infected his wife, and she afterwards the king, who gave it to several other women, which he kept; and himself could never be well cured of it; for he was sickly the remainder of his life, and became peevish, troublesome, and inaccessible. I wonder that Brantome does not particularize any woman in the passage, which I am going to quote, where he speaks of this pox. King Francis, says he (21), loved much, and too much; for, being young and free, he indifferently embraced, sometimes one, sometimes another, as, at that time, he was not a gallant man, who did not whore indifferently every where, and by it got a swinging pox, which hastened his end: for, when he died, he was then but fifty three years of age, which shews that he was not a very old man. Having been racked by this distemper, he considered, that, if he continued his loose intrigues, he might be again caught, and, being grown wife by woful experience, he resolved to make love gallantly; and for that purpose made his fine court to be frequented by beautiful and modest princesses, great ladies, and gentlewomen. And this he did that he might preserve himself from that nasty distemper, and be no more defiled by it, and to suit himself not to a loose, but to a genteel, clean, and pure love. He then immediately speaks of this prince's love to madam de Hell; and this is in effect to pretend, that his pox preceded his imprisonment. It cannot be doubted, but this writer pretends it, since he says in another place (22), that the king gave queen Claudia the pox, which hastened her death. Now this queen died in the month of July, 1524.

[E] He let fall some complaints against divine providence. Brantome (23) affords me a comment upon this text. I have heard a lady of that time say, that of all the blows, that the king had received of Charles V, none affected him so much, as when he heard of the taking of St Didier (24), and that the emperor was coming directly to Paris, to besiege it with so numerous an army, that he saw it already shaken; he was then something indisposed, and kept his chamber: the late queen of Navarre his sister, and a great many other ladies, were then with him. Crying somewhat loud, he said, ah! my God, thou sellest me very dear a kingdom, which I thought thou hadst freely given me; thy will however be done. Then he told the said queen, my darling, (for so he called her) go to church, and there pray to God for me, that since such is his will to love and favour the emperor more than me, that he will do it so, that I may at least never see him encamped before the principal city of my kingdom, and that it may not be said, one day, that my rebel vassal is come as far to see me, as his grandfather the duke of Burgundy did to king Lewis XI, who gave him battle so near; however, I am resolved to go and meet him, to prevent and fight him; and I pray God, that I may sooner die in battle, than undergo a second imprisonment. He might then have said, O crown! if thy weight was known, &c (25).

than those, who knew not the bottom of things, had believed [F]. He saw too late, that he had for his favourites two or three persons, who were very unworthy of it, and had done him a great deal of prejudice, by their evil counsels. Had he removed from him the constable of Montmorency (e) twelve years sooner, he had never found himself in so great straits. Besides, there was something so preposterous in his destiny, that, even when he acted according to the rules of prudence, yet he wanted success. All these things, duly considered, make his reign very wonderful; for who would not be surprized, to see this Prince, frowned upon by fortune, ill served by his own mother [G], in the hands of imprudent favourites, betrayed by those, whom he honoured with his strictest confidence, so gloriously resist the emperor Charles V; that is to say, an enemy, whose dominions were much larger than France, who had more money and forces than he, who was a very great warrior, and a very able politician, who was faithfully and well served by his generals and ministers, and who had generally the assistance either of England, or of other potent princes, against him alone? After all, it is a greater glory for Francis I to have preserved his kingdom under those circumstances, than for Charles V not to have been able to conquer it. I believe it may be said of these two princes, that, had not the one been opposed by the other, either of them might have grasped the universal monarchy; and that, since there were often leagues made in favour of Charles V, than of Francis I, this king of France was more dreaded than that king of Spain. I believe farther, that, if the liberty of Europe was not oppressed by Charles V, it is almost wholly owing to the valour of Francis I (f). I cannot tell whether the ill fortune of this monarch has any where appeared more than in the alliance, which he made with Soliman. He never could gain any real advantage by it, and gave his enemies occasion to declaim against him, and make him odious, which did him more harm than ever the Ottoman Porte did him good. The lies, that were spread on this occasion over all Europe, cannot be excused, but by the maxims of a very pernicious morality [H]. They dispersed the [F] This war was at an end sooner than those, who knew not the bottom of things, had believed. Most people thought, that Charles V, having made so great a progress in Champagne, would not hearken to any terms of peace, but what would be too ignominious for his enemy to accept. They had then no good opinion of the success of the negotiation on foot; but those, who knew very well, that he would be very glad to end this war, were full of good hopes. Among these, was an Italian poet who had sheltered himself at Paris. Read this passage: When king Francis I, and the emperor Charles V, came in sight of each other, in France, in the year 1544, with each a potent army, both weary of making war against one another, some great men interposed to make that peace, which was then concluded between these two great monarchs. Some asked Lewis Alamani, a Florentine, whether he believed that those persons could make this peace. He answered in this Italian distich:

Com' esser può ch'a noi pace si togli,
S'un n'ha necessita, l'altro n'ha voglia (26)?

How can we have otherwise than peace, seeing the one desires it, and the other stands in need of it?

Nothing could be more just than this reasoning; for there is no better prognostic (27) of a peace near at hand, than the necessity, wherein both parties find themselves to end the war. Want of money tires as much as a surfeit. People then do, as the emperor Claudius's wife did (28); they retire, not glutted, but fatigued. Before this, the mediators were not heard; but then they are intreated to act, or rather they are laid aside; because both parties treat directly with each other, agree upon the main points, and then conclude without them; or if they are made use of, it is only pro forma. We read this in an historian of the peace of the Pyrenees (29). This peace was concluded, without the intervention of those, who had a long while mediated it, and gave occasion to remember what Pope Innocent said, one day, that he was at a window of his palace on the Piazza Navona: he saw two men, of an inferior rank, boxing one another furiously, and he forbade that they should be parted, adding, you will see that, when they are weary, they will leave off of themselves; which happening a little while after: thus, (continued he) the French and Spaniards will do, when they are tired of waging war against one another; for then they will make peace without any body's mediation,

[G] He was ill served by his own mother. She was of the house of Savoy. I will only speak of two things, which she did to the prejudice of France. She got the money, which had been promised to Lautrec, governor of the Milanese, which occasioned the loss of that country: and, when she saw Francis I, in a rage for this loss, ask his treasurer (30), what was become of that money, she point-blank denied, that it was ever represented to her for what use it was designed. The lie, that she gave this poor treasurer, was the cause that he was hanged (31). What mischief did she not do to France, because she had a mind to marry Charles de Bourbon? Mad, that her advances were slighted, she persecuted that prince by a thousand vexatious law-suits; which exasperated him so much, that he went over to the emperor, and commanded his armies in Italy against France; and even against Francis the first himself, at the battle of Pavia (32).

[H] The lies, that were spread over all Europe, on this alliance with the Turk, cannot be excused. I have mentioned, in another place (33), the speech, which Charles V made at Rome, in the year 1536. Let us add here, that the copies of it, which he sent to the princes of the empire, and the imperial towns, were different, and even contrary to one another (34). He left out in the copies, which he sent to the Protestants, what might displease them, and added something else, which was likely to be acceptable to them. He sent emissaries into all the circles of the empire, to give out, 'That the king of France had barbarously treated all the subjects of the empire that were found in his kingdom, either to trade or to travel, and all the French who had lived in Germany: That he had made an offensive and defensive league with the Turks: That it was in concert with them, that he had usurped Savoy and Piedmont, to draw into these two provinces all the forces of Christendom, and to give Soliman an opportunity to fall upon Germany, whilst the emperor should be employed towards the Alps. These calumnies, which were at first only whispered, became afterwards the subject of sermons, and were authorized by libels, licenced by the ecclesiastical and civil magistrates. Though this slander was very gross, yet it produced a prodigious effect; for all Germany was prepossessed against him in less than a fortnight. The most famous of all these libels was that, which was vended at Nuremberg, with the emperor's licence. It had, for its device, a sword surrounded with flames, and contained a challenge from the emperor to the king, and threatened the French with fire and sword, if, within fifteen days, they did not renounce the form of the oath, which they supposed that prince had taken to the Grand Signior. Nothing can be more horrid, impious and abominable, than this oath [I]; and this, with some other circumstances, shews plainly, that it is an improbable Imposture. However, this formulary was inserted as an authentic piece in a pamphlet that appeared, in the last war, against France (g). renounce their alliance with the Turks. This libel was followed by another of the same nature, which particularized the day, that this pretended challenge was made, the name of the herald, with some circumstances, said to have been taken from his verbal process: And, as no body went about to discover the imposture, it produced it's desired effect; since it excited a hatred in people's minds against France, which lasted even after they saw the cheat. Langey, at his arrival at Francfort, found there these libels, and writ two answers to them, one in High Dutch, and the other in Latin. He made an excellent use of the time, that the merchants of all the circles of the empire returned from the fair of Lyons; for he had them before the magistrates of Strasburg, and took their depositions, which were printed, and sent every where. They imported, that the deponents had been very civilly treated in France; that the emperor's challenge was a fable; and that the French, far from insulting the Germans without cause, did not so much as question them about their religion. Thus the imposture gave way to truth (35). Here

Every body yet remembers the harangue, which the marquis de Rebenac made to the Pope in 1692, to represent what mischiefs might ensue to the Catholic religion from the alliance, which the emperor and the king of Spain has made with Protestant princes. The anonymous author, who made an answer to this harangue, did not forget to object, that Francis I combined with the Turks against Charles V. 'It will not, perhaps, be unacceptable to the public, adds he (41), to insert here the formulary of an oath, which this prince took to sultan Soliman, to confirm that infamous alliance, which as yet subsists, and which seems to be knit so fast by Lewis XIV, that it is not to be broke. I know that you will not blush at it: for, if there were none then, but chancellor du Prat, who were honest enough to disapprove it; it may be now presumed, that your court, which hath got over all divine and humane laws, cannot abhor any sacrilege or impiety. Give me only leave to desire the reader here to pardon me, if I lay before his eyes an object, which he cannot see without horror, and which should never have come to the knowledge of the Christians. This is it: Per Deum Magnum & Altum, Misericordem & Benignum, formatorem Caeli & Terræ, & omnium quæ in eis sunt: & per Sancta hæc Evangelia: per Sanctum Baptisma; per Sanctum Joannem Baptistam, & per Fidem Christianorum, Promitto & Juro, quod omnia quæ novero, aperta erunt Altissimo Domino Sultano Solimano, ejus Regnum Deus fortificet. Quid si hoc neglexerim ero Apostata, & mandatorum Sancti Evangelii Christianæque Fidei Prævaricator. Dicam Evangelium falsum esse: Negabo Christum vivere, & Matrem ejus Virginem fuisse: super Fontem Baptismatis porcum interficiam, & Altaris Presbyteros maledicam; super Altare fornicabor cum Luxuria; & Sanctorum Patrum maledictiones in me recipiam. Ita me Deus respiciat ex alto. 'I believe I need not enlarge on the enormity of this oath.' I find fault with two things in the proceedings of this Writer: One, that he quotes no body; and the other, that he hath not translated into the vulgar tongue the form of the oath, which he relates. When there was only occasion to say, in general, that Francis I had made an alliance with the Ottoman Porte, our anonymous author (42) did not omit quoting Ribier's memoirs: How comes it then to pass, that when he speaks of a more heinous circumstance he quotes no author? He ought to have quoted either a French author, or one wholly indifferent to France, or to the house of Austria; at least, he ought to have told us, that such a Spanish, Flemish, or German author, hath inserted this oath in his book, and shewed which way this mystery was discovered. But our anonymous author, having vier, his ambassador, was heard with so much prepossession, that whatever he said was understood in a contrary sense; and that minister was obliged to retire, after he had seen, to his sorrow, the diet grant the emperor near fourscore thousand men, to be employed as he should think fit (39).

I refer all those, who will learn to make a true judgment of this affair, to Mr de Wicquefort (40); but I do not know to whom I shall refer those, who will be disposed to grieve, when they consider, that such plain and diabolical calumnies have turned so much to the advantage of their authors. It must be confessed, that it is a thing that gives great offence; but such is the way of the world; and we must adore those great and profound mysteries of providence without murmuring. I shall conclude with this reflexion; our age does not afford us instances of such impostures, as Mr Varillas relates: for, among so many libels, wherein anonymous authors invent what they please, we see no forgeries invested with the public authority, as were those, which Charles the fifth's court knew how to invent.

concerning a pretended design of recovering the hostages, that Francis I. had given [K]. I have read another, and a very gross one, which relates to the trouble, wherein this prince ving done nothing of all this, shews, that he durst not declare whence he hath taken this formulary; and that he knew, that, if he declared it, he would discredit his authority. He seems to have artificially omitted the French translation of this formulary, fearing, perhaps, to expose the forgery to too many: Be it how it will, here is the translation of the Latin that he hath printed. 'By the great and high God, merciful and gracious, author of heaven and earth, and of all things therein; and by these holy Gospels, by the holy baptism, by St John the Baptist, and by the faith of Christians, I promise and swear, that whatever comes [to my knowledge] shall be made known to the most high lord sultan Soliman, whose reign may God strengthen. I will be the only friend of his friends, and an enemy to his enemies. I will redeem the Turkish prisoners out of the bonds of his enemies. There shall be no fraud on my side. If I neglect these things, I will be an apostate, and a prevaricator of the precepts of the holy gospel, and the christian faith. I will say, that the gospel is false; I will deny that CHRIST is alive, and that his mother was a virgin; I will kill a hog on the font, and I will curse the priests of the altar; I will luxuriously commit whoredom on the altar, and may the curses of the holy fathers fall on my head. Thus may God look upon me from on high.' I question whether any sensible and reasonable man can ever imagine, that the form of this oath was ever contrived between the ministers of France and those of the Porte (43). Every thing in it shocks probability, and there is nothing in it worthy either of the gravity of Soliman, or that of Francis I. The sultan had been well enough satisfied with the common form of oaths, and he was too wise a man not to perceive what advantages he might expect from so potent an ally.

Perhaps it may be objected, that it is the custom of the Turks to prescribe this form of an oath; and I confess, that the Venetians were charged with having taken such an one in the person of the bastard of Cyprus: but this would serve at the most to elude the accessory observation, which I have just now incidentally proposed. Besides, it is a question, whether the Venetians acquiesced in that form, and whether a good proof can be brought for it. However, because the book, in which that reproach was cast on them, during the war with Lewis XII, is grown scarce, I shall here recite the tenor of the oath. 'The said bastard took an horrible, execrable, and most damnable oath to the said sultan; which was afterwards translated from Arabic into Latin, and brought to Pope Pius by some knights of Rhodes; for which reason he would never receive the ambassadors of the said James as the ambassadors of a christian king; but reprimanded them very severely. Since, then, the Venetians are his heirs, is it not necessary that they should take such an oath as the said James did, in the following manner?

First, He invoked the name of Almighty God forty times, and then said: By the great and high God, merciful and gracious, maker of heaven and earth, and of all things that are therein; by these holy gospels, by the holy baptism, by St John the Baptist, and all the saints, and by the christian faith; I promise and swear, that whatever I shall know, shall be discovered to my sovereign lord Alleferaph Afnal, sultan of Egypt, and emperor of all Arabia, whom God strengthen in his kingdom; and I will always be a friend of his friends, and an enemy of his enemies, and conceal nothing from him: I will suffer no pirates in my kingdom, nor furnish them, or assist them, with any provisions: All the Egyptians, who are slaves in my kingdom, I will redeem and set at liberty: I will offer every year, on the first day of October or November, by way of tribute to the sovereign temples of Jerusalem and Mecca, the sum of five thousand ducats of gold: I will take care, that the Rhodians furnish the pirates with no arms: Whatever shall come to my knowledge, that deserves to be known, I will communicate to the sultan truly, and without fraud. If I fail in any of the abovesaid matters, I will be an apostate from the christian faith, and the commands of the gospel: I will deny that JESUS CHRIST lives, and that his mother is a virgin: I will kill on the font a camel, and curse the priests of the church: I will deny the divinity, and adore the humanity: I will commit fornication on the high altar with a Jewess, and receive on myself all the curses of the holy fathers. Was not Mark Corrario, a Venetian (whose daughter the said bastard king afterwards married to his detriment), present at the administering of the said oath and homage? Therefore it is most likely, that they are in possession of Cyprus upon the same terms, since they have usurped that title (44).

[K] A lie was spread . . . concerning a pretended design of recovering the hostages that Francis I. had given.] Francis I. coming out of prison, delivered his sons to the Spaniards: He could not have them again but on disadvantageous conditions; for the Spaniards would keep them till the treaty of Madrid was executed. Some people were so foolish, or so malicious, as to spread a report, that he had sent for a German magician, who should transport from Spain into France these two hostages, so as that no body should perceive it, and do a great many other miracles. You will find this absurdity in one of Agrippa's letters; for he is the author of that letter, although it is intitled, in the edition in 8vo, Amicus ad Agrippam. But this is a transposition of words; it must be read, Agrippa ad Amicum. It was printed under this title, with the three books of his occult philosophy, in the year 1533, as Gabriel Naudé observes at the 410th page of his apology for great men. These are Agrippa's words: 'Acersitus est à Germania non modicis sumptibus vir quidam dæmoniorum, hoc est magus, in quo potestas dæmonum inhabitat, ut, sicut James & Mambres resistunt Moysi, sic iste resistat Cæsari. Persuasum enim est illis à patre mendaciorum, illum futurorum omnium præcium, arcanorum quorumcumque consiliorum conscium, ac deliberatarum cogitationum interpreter: tanta præterea prædium potestate, ut possit regios pueros reducere per aëra, quemadmodum legitur Abakuk cum suo pulmento traductus ad lacum leonum, possitque, sicut Helisæus obsecus in Dothaim, ostendere montes plenos equorum & curruum igneorum, exercitumque plurimum: insuper & revelare ac transferre thesauros terræ, quasque volet, coget nuptias amoreque, aut dirimet, deploratos quoque curabit morbos stygio pharmaco (45). — There was sent for out of Germany, at a great expence, a certain magician, endued with a diabolical power, that, as James and Mambres resisted Moses, so might he resist the emperor: for they were persuaded by the father of lies, that this man knew before-hand all future events, was privy to the most secret counsels, and an interpreter of the intentions of the mind; moreover, that he was endued with such power, that he could bring back the king's children through the air, as we read that Habakkuk was transported with his baggage to the lake of Lions, and that he could, like Elisea besieged in Dothaim, shew the mountains full of fiery horses and chariots, and a numerous army; and farther, that he could discover and convey away hidden treasures, and make, or break, what matches and love-affairs he pleased, and cure desperate diseases by an infernal medicine.' This letter was written from Paris the twenty third of February, 1528. He even observes, that the cardinals and bishops consented, that this magician should be sent for, and contributed to defray his expences: 'Huic tam nefario idololatricæ & sacrilegorum artificii audaciam præstat, quæ illis tam impense favet orthodoxa illa mater, & Christianissimi filii accommodatur autoritas, & à sacris pecuniis largiuntur munera, conviventibus etiam atque tam nefariam operam conducentibus columnis ecclesiæ, episcopis & cardinalibus, & impietatis ministro impij applaudunt proceres, quemadmodum operibus lupi congratulantur corvi (46). — The most orthodox mother herself, and her most christian sons by their authority, greatly encourage so wicked an artificer of idolatry and sacrilege; and the church's money is employed for this purpose, by the connivance, and even contribution of those pillars of the church, the bishops and cardinals; and the impious nobles applaud this minister of impiety, as the crows congratulate the actions of the wolf.'

Prince found himself in the year 1544 [L]. I speak, in another place (b), of a fable, which is told of the emperor's journey through France, when he went to chastize the city of Ghent. It is not the only one that hath been spread, in reference to that time [M]. Francis I was the author of some innovations, among which we must chiefly reckon the custom of womens going to court [N]; which did not alter that article of the Salic law, which excludes women from the crown of France: However, it may be said, that, since that time, till the end of the XVIth century, more or less, France hath been governed by women (i). Francis Ist hath been wrongfully accused of having too much indulged the Lutherans of his kingdom [O]. It is one of those lies, which

John Wierus, Agrippa's disciple, tells part of these fine stories; I mean, what relates to the carrying away of the hostages. Quemadmodum dicitur, quo tempore Francisci primi regis Galliae filii detinebantur obsides in Hispania, magum in Galliam evocatum à Germania fuisse, qui tanta credebatur prae-ditus potestate, ut posset regios pueros per aëra reducere, thesaurisque investigare & transferre (47).

As it is reported, that, when the sons of Francis I, king of France, were detained as hostages in Spain, a magician was sent for from Germany into France, who was thought to be endued with such power, that he could bring back the king's sons thro' the air, and discover and convey away treasures. The count de la Rocca (48) knew this passage of John Wierus; not that he had read the books of this author; he had only seen this passage quoted by Bodin: but he was in the wrong to say only, that Bodin speaks of it; he should have added, that Bodin rejects it as a fable. 'It is enough for me, these are that French civilian's words (49), to refute Wierus by his own words and books. For he himself writes, that he hath seen men carried through the air by devils, and that there is no absurdity in it; and, in the same place, he writes this lie, viz.

that a magician was sent for from Germany, who promised to get out of the castle of Madrid king Francis's sons, and to have them transported through the air from Spain into France; but that this was not done, because it was feared they should break their necks. I have not found this last particular in John Wierus's book. I make use of the Amsterdam edition, 1660.

Lib. ii, cap. xli, de Praestigiis, pag. 6.

[L] I have read another very gross lie, which relates to . . . the year 1544. John Saxon, rector of the university of Wittenberg, caused a Programma to be affixed the twelfth of October, 1544, and therein declared, among other things, that it was not by chance, but by the just judgment of God, that France was overwhelmed with calamities. The emperor, says he, came near Paris, and the queen of France and the dauphin went to meet him as humble supplicants.

(50) See the book, intitled, Scripturae publicae professorum à Professoribus in Academia Wittenbergensi ab anno 1544, ad annum 1553, Tom. I, fol. 95, verso.

Non casu jam Gallia miserabiliter vastatur, & rex potens venit in tantum discrimen ut cum Carolus imperator accesserit ad Lutetiam usque, supplices occurrerint regina & delphinus, ut ante paucos annos ad Carolum Burgundum venit supplex rex Franciae Ludovicus cui confesso victoriae inscripserat, VIVAT BURGUNDIÆ (50). — In like manner as, a few years before, Lewis, king of France, met, as a supplicant, the duke of Burgundy, whom duke Charles invested with the Burgundian breast plate, inscribed with this confession of victory, LONG LIVE THE DUKE OF BURGUNDY. These two facts, compared together, are false. The first is so absolutely, and without any mixture of truth; and the other, in its principal circumstances: for, when Lewis XI was forced to follow the duke of Burgundy to Leige, he did not go to meet him as a supplicant, but to have a conference with him, hoping to bubble him. It is a shame, that the rector of a famous university should publish, in a Programma, a lie unworthy the Gazette.

[M] It is not the only fable, that hath been spread in reference to that time. 'How many romances have been made of Francis I? Hath it not even been reported, that he fought a duel with the emperor; and that this prince going through France, the king, with an unparalleled generosity, offered him his kingdom? That Charles had one day fate on Francis's throne; that he had ordered a criminal to be condemned, and had afterwards granted him his pardon, to shew his authority (51).

doubt, be read with pleasure. 'One day, it is Brantome speaks (52), as I was discoursing with a great prince about the great virtues of Francis I. . . He spoke very much in his praise; but he blamed him very much for two things, which had done the court and France a great deal of mischief, not only during his own reign, but also during those of his successors: to wit, for having introduced into the court the great assemblies, resort, and ordinary residence of ladies; and for having invited thither, and entertained so many ecclesiastics: as for the ladies, it must be confessed, that, before his time, they seldom came there, and but few of them too. It is true, that queen Anne began to bring to her court more ladies than the other preceding queens; and, had it not been for her, the king her husband had not much regarded them. But, when the said king Francis came to the throne, he considered, that the ladies were the sole decoration of the court, and therefore peopled it with them, more than was formerly usual. Brantome tells us the reasons, which this critical prince made use of. 'If the court ladies only, said he (53), had grown loose, it had been no great matter; but they set such a bad example to all the other ladies of France, that, following their way of dressing, genteel carriage, fashions, dances, and way of living, they would also imitate them in their intrigues and whoring; for, said they, at court, they are thus dressed, they dance after this manner, and whore, and we may do so too. Concerning the prelates, he said (54), 'That, then beginning to be debauched and loose, they set an ill example to others in France to do the same thing; and that it had been better, if they had kept in their dioceses, to preach to their flocks (55). Brantome refutes all these reasons: he maintains, that, before the reign of Francis I, there was as much corruption among women, and clergymen (56); and that nothing but troubles and heresies had been seen in France, since preaching had been so frequent (57). See Mr Jurieu's reflexions on all this (58).

(58) Jurieu's Apology for the Reformer, cap. vii, pag. 121, & seq.

[O] He is wrongfully accused of having too much indulged the Lutherans. You may see this accusation strongly refuted by these words of Mezerai. 'The infection of errors increasing, the king caused the fire to be re-kindled, to purge France of them. There were still some remains of them in the city of Meaux, after bishop Brignonnet had received there le Fevre, and the Rouffels. Above sixty were taken there, and brought to Paris, whereof fourteen were burned, others hanged, and the rest whipped and banished. Which proceedings, and others like these, palpably convict that Italian author of fallacy, who hath written the history of our civil wars of religion, and of the League (59), who, through gross forgetfulness, or egregious malice, said, in his first book, That Calvin's belief began to spread in this king's reign, whether he allowed it, or took no notice of it; and that it was rather received with indignation and scorn, than feared, or carefully suppressed. What! To make six or seven severe edicts to stifle it, to convoke the clergy several times, to assemble a provincial council, to be continually sending embassadors to all the princes of Christendom, in order to have a general one called, to burn heretics by dozens, to send them to the gallies by hundreds, and to banish them by thousands; Can this be said to allow, or to take no notice of it? Are these bare resolutions, or real performances? This ought to engage you, judicious reader, to read this foreign author with a great deal of caution, and will perhaps give you occasion to observe a great many faults, which the curious ought not to forgive him, since he hath spoken thus of the father of learning (60). It were to be wished, for the honour of this king, that which our dictionary ought to censure. Had it been said, that this prince was very useful to the Protestants [P] of Germany, it would not have been a mistake. I have observed, in another place (k), what trifling excuses he made use of, to justify himself to them for putting some Lutherans to death. Mr Varillas is here guilty of an anachronism [Q]. The last part of Francis the first's life was calamitous to him. The effects of his incontinency (l), and the remembrance of the unhappy circumstances, wherein the mismanagement of his ministers had engaged him, so overwhelmed him with grief, that he was incapable of consulting his true interest; for he was sensibly affected with an accident, which he should have looked upon as very lucky to him; I mean, the death of Henry VIII, king of England (§ a); a prince, who had so often acted against France, and who would have always been inclined to ruin it, provided he might have shared it with Charles V. The disquietude, which Francis the first's children gave him, encreased the anxieties of his mind [R]. I do not relate the series of his actions, because

[§ a] This death of a prince, a few years older than himself, put him in mind of his own approaching end, and this reflexion, among others, quite sunk him. See the Memoirs du Bellai, towards the end of book x, and Thuanus, Tom. I, pag. 85. B. C. of the edition 1626. REM. CRIT.]

Mezerai's cause were not so good. An unprejudiced historian, who hath a true notion of uprightness, and of the universal laws of order, would wish, that Davila's reproaches were well grounded: Juvat, would he say, hæc opprobria nobis, et dici potuisse, et non potuisse refelli (61): But I have unluckily too many reasons to call Davila a calumniator: Why am I able to prove him one by so many arguments (62)? Who-soever hath a true notion of true glory, and a value for Francis the first's memory, whether he be a Protestant or Roman Catholic, will speak after this manner; for nothing can be more abominable, than to put to death those, who separate from a communion, only because they are afraid of offending God, and who behave themselves in all other respects as very good subjects: nothing is more consonant to reason, than to leave the empire of conscience to God alone.

Let us oppose to Davila this passage of Brantome: 'The Lutherans, and those of the new religion, have been mightily incensed against Francis I; which hath perhaps made both those of his time, and of this too, speak so ill of him, as they have done; for he burnt a great many of them, and spared none of those that he could discover. He is said to have been the first, who brought those burnings into vogue, since they were scarce spoken of in his predecessor's time: God be thanked, that Luther was not as yet come, who was the first and new heretic (although there were some few before him) who drew so great a part of Christendom after him. I leave this to those, that know it better than I. This great king, notwithstanding these fires and burnings, took Geneva under his protection, when Charles, duke of Savoy, would besiege it; which occasioned the loss of part of his territories, which those of Bern took from him: His said majesty was blamed for it, as also for having sent into that city the bands of the lord Rance de Lore to it's assistance. Reconcile, I beseech ye, if you can, these fires with that protection (63).

[P] Francis I. was very useful to the Protestants.] We have just now seen, that he saved the republic of Geneva, the metropolis of the reformed, their mother-church, which sent her apostles and books into France, and her advice every where to maintain their cause. This behaviour of Francis I. enlarged the canton of Bern, of which the reformation still feels the benefit. He did directly many good services to the league of Smalcald, but many more indirectly; for he was the cause that Charles V had, on many occasions, a great regard for the Protestants of Germany, to draw them off from the interest of France. As it is more agreeable to the principles of religion and piety, to acknowledge the hand of God, I mean a particular influence of providence, in the establishment of the reformation, I approve those that judge of it in that manner: but I cannot forbear saying, that some understanding persons believe, that the rivalry between Charles V, and the king of France, was more than sufficient to afford the Protestants the means of disputing the ground; and that, if Luther made a greater progress than so many other reformers that lived before him, it is because he appeared in a favourable time, when Francis I and Charles V were competitors, who, to thwart one another, favoured this new sect by turns; and, when it was once settled in Germany, it sent the Calvinists of France sufficient supplies to keep their posts, &c. Brantome's question, upon the little relation there is between burning a hundred heretics, and protecting their nest, centre, and metropolis, will puzzle those, who do not observe, that this is one of the most common scenes of the great comedy of the world. Sovereign princes have in all ages thus played with religion; and they play this game still; for they persecute at home a religion which they support abroad. You must not infer from hence, that they have no religion: for the inference would be false; they are often religious, even to bigotry. What then can be the reason of this? They have a greater regard for the temporal interest of their dominions, than for the kingdom of Jesus CHRIST (64). I do not except the Pope himself. I believe that he was no better pleased with the emperor's progress against the league of the Protestants, than Francis I. was. Let us quote Mezerai. 'The noise of the emperor's arms frightened all Christendom; the Pope himself quaked for fear, left, after having conquered Germany, he should come into Italy. When Francis had duly weighed the consequences of the ruin of the Protestants, he altered his opinion, made a league with them, and obliged himself to receive the duke of Saxony's eldest son in France, and to allow him the private exercise of his religion, and promised to send one hundred thousand crowns to his father, and as many to the landgrave of Hesse, till he sent them some forces (65). Had not he a great deal of zeal for his religion? He condemned to the flames some poor private persons, because they did not go to mass; and sent a powerful assistance to princes who had abolished the mass in their territories. This was to attack the party by the weather-cocks; to take some tiles and stones, or plunder some huts, while they build for them strong forts and places of arms (66). Add to this the remark [AA] of the article HENRY II, and the remark of the article SERGIER.

[Q] Mr Varillas is here guilty of an anachronism.] For he supposes (67), that, when Francis I. put six Lutherans to death on the nineteenth of January, 1535, the French monarchy was more dangerously shaken by Calvin's Institution, than it had ever been by either the English, or the house of Austria. We have already shewed (68), that Calvin resolved to publish this book, in order to refute the calumnies, that were spread against those, whom Francis I. put to death; that were spread, I say, to appease thereby the Protestants of Germany, who were very much exasperated at the last execution of those six Lutherans.

[R] The disquietude his children gave him, encreased the anxieties of his mind.] The eldest was called Francis. He was born at the castle of Amboise, the twenty eighth of February, 1518. (69). He was poisoned with a cup of fresh water by Sebastian Montecuculi, and died at the castle of Tournon the tenth of August, 1536 (70). 'The king, his father, was so afflicted at his death, that he was a long time before he could recover himself; for he conceived mighty hopes, and a great opinion of this son. Mr de Bellai relates this very well in his memoirs (71). Francis the first's second son reigned after him, and was called Henry II. Without doubt he gave his father a great deal of trouble, by keeping a correspondence with Montmorency, who was out of favour, and by making a cabal against the dukes of Etampes, his father's favourite. He combined against her, with his own mistress, Diana of Poitiers; cause it would oblige me to repeat what is sufficiently expressed in other dictionaries. The surname of GREAT, which was given him after his death, was of no long continuance [S]. He deserved it in certain respects, but especially for his courage, and that free, open, and generous temper, which is so rare in persons of his rank. His undauntedness failed him sometimes; for it flagg'd in his prison, where he was like to die of grief; and he betrayed too great a fear when he returned into France [T]. What I have read in a small book, lately published (m), I take to be a fabulous story; which is, that he killed, at Madrid, a great lord, who had been wanting in his respect to him, and that the emperor did not take it ill.

Here follow the additions I make to this article in this second edition. It hath been falsely reported, that Francis Ist was born after his mother had been a long time barren [U]. He hath been reckoned among those princes, who, when they came to the throne, did not revenge the affronts, which they received, when they were private men. It is reported, that, under the reign of Lewis XII., he sent Charles de Bourbon a challenge, who had endeavoured, by some reports, to set the king against him; and that, when he came to the crown, he took so little notice of the hatred he had conceived against Charles de Bourbon, that he promoted him to the office of constable (n). Every body knows others; and it cannot be imagined what mischief these two women jealousies caused (72). If the jarring of the father's and son's mistresses gave the king a great deal of trouble, the disagreement of the dauphin, and his brother the duke of Orleans, gave him no less, and was no less prejudicial to him. The duchess of Etampes's faction was for the duke of Orleans; and that of Diana of Poitiers thwarted this prince, and poisoned him at last. Let us see what Mezerai says of it: 'The duke of Orleans, a prince of great hopes, died at Forest-Moutier, the eighth of September, either of the plague, or of poison, which it was suspected his brother's creatures gave him; because they could not endure that the king should be so fond of him as he was, and that he should be angry, that the dauphin, contrary to his orders, held a correspondence with the constable of Montmorency, whose return they wished, because their master earnestly desired it (73).'

What grief was it for Francis I to see, that his son, by meddling more than he ought to do with state-affairs, obliged him to take those measures, which were neither agreeable nor advantageous to him! The dauphin's faction was the cause, that the king signed the treaty of Crefpy. The dauphin had written 'to his father, with the consent of the general officers of his army, to beg that his majesty would be pleased to send again the constable to the army, to perform his office, and that nothing but this general was wanting to make his forces invincible. . . . The king never expressed so much resentment as he did at the reading of this letter. He complained, that his son encroached upon his authority, and that his officers presumed to prescribe him laws. He declared his indignation to all that approached his person, and severely checked all those, who had exasperated him. He resolutely told the dauphin, that it was his duty to set his subjects a pattern of perfect obedience, and not to find fault with his conduct, by proposing to him to restore a favourite, whom he had disgraced upon good grounds. He threatened the rest with his displeasure, if they persisted in their indiscretion; and the duchess of Etampes's cabal, laying hold of his passion, so powerfully represented, that the only way to be free from all the importunate petitions, that might be made in behalf of the constable, was to conclude a sudden peace, that his majesty ordered admiral Annebaut to do it, &c. (74).'

This peace being more advantageous to the duke of Orleans, than to France, the dauphin, who could endure neither the aggrandizing of his brother, nor the prejudice done to the kingdom, protested against it in the castle of Fontainebleau, in the presence of the duke of Vendôme, the count d'Enghien, his brother, and Francis d'Aumale, the second day of December (75). It may be easily imagined, that the king of France underwent the same fate, that many other princes undergo; which was, to be unhappy in his family, and to have occasion to be jealous of him, who was to be his successor. Those, who poisoned the duke of Orleans, saved, perhaps, the lives of two hundred thousand men, and, perhaps, prevented the order of succession in France from being shamefully disturbed (76).

(8) The surname of GREAT, which was given him after his death, was of no long continuance.] Theod.

dore Beza informs me (77), that this surname was given him after his death; but I conclude, that it did not continue long, because every body says, and writes, Francis the First, and not Francis the Great. They say, and write, Henry the Fourth, or Henry the Great, which is the same thing; and it would be the same thing too, with reference to Francis the First, and Francis the Great, had not that title been laid aside almost as soon as it was given. There is no need to put you in mind, that the great king Francis the First, and Francis the Great, do not signify the same thing.

[T] He betrayed too great a fear, when he returned into France.] I will make use of Mezerai's words: 'As soon as the king was on this side of the river, he immediately got upon a Turkish horse, as if he had been afraid of some ambush, and put on to St John de Luz, which is four leagues from thence; and, having refreshed himself for half an hour, he spurred on as fast to Bayonne (78). Sure he had been very basely treated in his confinement, since he charged his children to revenge him, on pain of his curse. I have read this in a letter of admiral Chabot's secretary (79), which Mr le Laboureur hath published. It was written from London, the fifth of February, 1535, and contains, among other things which Henry VIII told this secretary, 'that he remembered very well, when they were last together, that the said king (80), speaking one day to the dauphin, the duke of Orleans, and the duke of Angoulême, his children, said to them these words: that, if he knew that they should ever forget the injuries and barbarous usage, which he and they had received from the said emperor, or did not revenge him, in case he could not do it himself, from that time he gave them his curse (81).'

[U] It has been falsely reported, that Francis I. was born after his mother had been a long time barren.] Many of those, who have published Francis de Paula's life, say, that the prince's Louisa of Savoy, wife to Charles de Valois, lamented, to this holy man, her unhappy barrenness; and she had been, add they, a long while sensible (82) of this imperfection. Francis de Paula, by his prayers, cured her of it; and therefore, being delivered of a boy, she had him called Francis. This they relate. Theophilus Raynaud, upon the credit of these authors, reported the same thing in his Trinitas Patriarcharum; a book, wherein he makes the panegyric of St Bruno, the patriarch of the Carthusians, of St Ignatius, the patriarch of the Jesuits, and of St Francis de Paula, the patriarch of the Minimes; but he was informed afterwards, that it was a great falsity, since Louisa of Savoy became a widow at nineteen years of age, and was then mother to the prince's Margaret, and prince Francis; which irresistably shews, that she could not deplore her long barrenness to Francis de Paula. 'Hoc correctione indiget, says he (83), neque enim longam sterilitatem suam deplo- rare potuit Ludovica, quæ anno ætatis undevicesimo vidua relicta, duplicem jam prolem enixa erat, Margaritam filiam natam Engolismæ XI. Aprilis anno 1492, & Franciscum, Cognaci editum anno 1494, 11. Septembris.' He adds, that Hilarion de Coila, who wrote afterwards, had observed this in the life of the founder of the Minimes, and that the brothers Sammarthanus knows his love to learning; but few are informed of a particular, which may be seen, in relation to that, in a letter of Andreas Alciatus, which was not published till the year 1697 [X]. There is another thing remarkable, and of greater moment, which hath been lately known, viz. that the Duke of Orleans, Francis the first's second son, offered to the Protestant princes of Germany, to allow them the exercise of their religion [Y]; and it is conjectured, that he did it with his father's consent (o). I have spoken, in the remark [N], of the disorders, which were caused in France by the new custom, that Francis Ist introduced into his court, when he brought the ladies there. These disorders cannot be better represented, than they are by Mezerai, and therefore I will make use of his words [Z]. The author (p) of some dialogues, printed at the Hague in the year 1700, hath judiciously observed this king's faults. It is in the dialogue between this Sammarthanus had confirmed it (84), since they say, that Louisa of Savoy was born in the year 1477, and that she was married to Charles of Orleans, count of Angoulême, in the year 1488; and that she was delivered of Francis the twelfth of September, 1494, and lost her husband the first of January, 1496. Here is then a falsehood demonstratively confuted: besides, here is an instance of the precipitation, wherewith miracles upon miracles are crowded in the legend of a saint, without ever consulting genealogical and chronological tables. Had they been consulted by those writers, they would not have said, that a woman, who at the age of fifteen is delivered of a girl, and of a boy at seventeen, had grieved at her long barrenness, and had not been cured of it, but by the prayers of a holy man. Go on grant there may be nothing else but simplicity and credulity in this story, and that the wants and interest of a society, whereof I have said something in another place (85), may not have engaged the Minimes to adorn the life of their patriarch with this false glory.

[X] Few are informed of a particular, which may be seen in a letter of Andreas Alciatus, which was not published till the year 1697. This letter was written from Bourges, the third of September, 1530. Alciatus says in it, that one Julius Camillus, a learned man, had offered to Francis I. to teach him, in a month's time, to speak Greek and Latin, in prose and verse, with as much elegance, as Demosthenes and Cicero, Homer and Virgil. He required the king to be with him but one hour a day: but Camillus would be alone with him, because he thought, that so extraordinary a secret was not to be imparted, but to crowned heads (86). He also demanded an income of two thousand crowns a year in good benefices. He spoke with so much assurance, that Francis I. believed there was something in these extraordinary promises. But, after he had been twice with Camillus, he dismissed him with a present of six hundred crowns (87).

[Y] The duke of Orleans, Francis the first's second son, offered to the Protestant princes of Germany, to allow the exercise of their religion. We are obliged to Mr le Vassor for the discovery of this singularity. He hath published it in the second edition of Vargas's letters, which he hath translated from the Spanish, and adorned with several very solid remarks. He found (88), among cardinal de Granville's papers, the instruction, which the duke of Orleans gave to his secretary and valet de chambre, when he sent him to the dukes of Saxony, the landgrave of Hesse, and other Protestant princes, who were to meet at Francfort (89). It is dated from Rheims the eighth day of September, 1543, and begins thus: 'He shall declare to them the great desire, which, by the grace of God, we have, that the holy gospel be preached all over the kingdom of France, where we would see already a beginning of it. And because the filial reverence, and fraternal honour, which we have for our most honoured lord and father, the most christian king, and for the dauphin, our eldest brother, hinder us from having it freely preached in our duchy of Orleans, which is under the jurisdiction and in the possession of our said lord and father; besides that the Pope, Emperor, and other princes, might oppose us; and other reasonable causes, which we reserve to be urged by us in a fit time; we have faithfully applied ourselves to the most illustrious and excellent princes, the duke of Saxony, the landgrave of Hesse, and other Protestant princes, to give them notice, that we are resolved, and promise to them expressly, and without any regard, to have it preached in the duchy of Luxemburg, whereof we hope

our said lord the king will leave us in quiet possession, and of other territories, which belong to us by the laws of arms. But we would have the said Protestant princes to receive us into an offensive and defensive alliance and confederacy: and we earnestly require them not to refuse so just and reasonable a demand; not to assist us with their protection, forces, or aid, against any particular prince, but only in what concerns the affairs of the Christian religion, whose encrease we chiefly desire, which by these means may the more easily be known in our other territories, and in the said kingdom, when my said lord, the king, comes to see me allied with the said princes, who will be the cause, that he will declare his good zeal in this business, and we shall be able to excuse ourselves to him, and defend ourselves against our adversaries. Therefore, may it please the said princes, that, as soon as we begin to have the said gospel preached in the said duchy of Luxemburg, at that very time our alliance and confederacy with them may begin (90). This is Mr le Vassor's reflection: 'It is very likely, that the duke of Orleans did not make this step without his father's knowledge. He speaks too confidently of Francis the first's good zeal; he too freely offers all this king's power; he gives too great hopes of what will be done, as soon as the Protestants have admitted him into their league. All this supposes, that the father and son acted in concert (91). Those who say, that the dachess d'Etampes was a Lutheran in her heart, and that she caballed, in favour of the duke of Orleans, against the dauphin (92), will not fail to say, that, without the king's knowledge, she engaged this young duke to link himself with the princes of the league of Smalcalde; and that afterwards she induced him to court the emperor (93), when she saw, that fortune was likely to be more favourable that way. Perhaps some will think, that the king came clandestinely into this plot of his son, without any real design of favouring the new religion in France, but only to make a better advantage of the assistance of Germany, by giving these Lutheran princes hopes, that he would declare, at a proper time, for the reformation, if he found it his interest. I believe, that this discovery of Mr le Vassor will induce the curious to sift out the bottom and drift of this negotiation, and they will find some papers, that will clear this affair.

[Z] I will make use of Mezerai's words. 'King Francis I, who had a noble passion for what was great, took great delight in magnificence, believing that nothing could better display his grandeur: and, as he thought, that the beauty of the ladies would heighten the glory of his pomp, and, as he was of an amorous disposition, he was the first who accustomed the fair sex to frequent the court. It had at first a very good effect; this lovely sex having introduced there politeness and civility, and inspiring noble souls with principles of generosity. But, when impurity crept in, and the example of great men authorized corruption; what was before a fine spring of honour and virtue, became the sink of all vices: infamy became in credit; prostitution was the way to favour; and none was a favourite, and continued so, but by these base means: in a word, offices and employments were at the sole disposal of women. And because, when they are disorderly, they are more easily induced to injustice, fraud, vengeance, malice, and impudence, than men; they were the cause, that several very ill maxims were introduced into the government, and that the ancient candour of the Gauls was banished yet farther than chastity. This this prince and Lewis XII. It is pity that this dialogue is so short; this is perhaps its only fault. Francis I made a regulation, which deserves a remark; I mean, that he abolished the custom of drawing up all public acts in Latin [AA]. Naudé (q) mentions this, and several other particulars, which concern the learning of this prince, his writings, and love to learned men. The last thing I shall say of him is pretty remarkable: It is pretended (r), that Francis de Paula, the day before he died, spoke after this manner to Louisa of Savoy; Your son shall be king of France, and will exceed in glory, riches, and happiness, all the princes of his age, provided he applies himself to the reformation of the church; but, if he doth not mind it, he will be very unhappy. Observe, that Francis de Paula died the second of April 1507; and that Lewis XII, who then swayed the sceptre, lived almost eight years after, and that his wife was not barren (s).

Here are some things which I have collected since the second edition. It has been falsely said, that, after he was taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia, he was conveyed to the castle of Ambres, near Inspruc [BB]. Among the praises bestowed on him for his encouraging learning, we must not forget, that the learned acknowledge themselves indebted to him for some excellent editions [CC]. The Passage he caused to be through a mountain is very surprizing [DD]. I have something more to say concerning the oath, which

* This corruption began under the reign of Francis I, and was almost universal under Henry II, and at last came to its height under Charles IX, and Henry III (94).

[AA] He abolished the custom of drawing up all public acts in Latin. Let us make use of Varillas's words:

* Justice had, till that time, been administered in Latin, throughout the French monarchy, or at least in the greatest part of it; and that tongue had been so corrupted, that it was scarce known, but by the termination of words; whether it was through ignorance, or that the judges endeavoured by that to be better understood. This abuse was not to be born with at the time that they so successfully strove to restore the ancient politeness; and since the French monarchy had never any dependence on the empire of Rome, it was not fit, that its most authentic acts should be in that tongue. It had been ridiculous to have put them in good Latin, because most people would not have understood them; and the king was of opinion, that they would be better in good French, than in bad Latin. Thus this order was made in the year 1539; and, of all those of Francis I, none hath been more universally and constantly observed than this (95). This historian had but just before observed, that chancellor Poyet had procured this reformation, a little before his fall. Germany had reformed this abuse almost three hundred years before. What follows is found in the historical meditations of Camerarius. The emperor Rodolphus I.... moved by the complaints of the German nation, and seeing himself, as it were, under the yoke of foreign secretaries, who understood Latin, and whom he was obliged to make use of, to the great prejudice of his affairs, because such persons often betrayed him, held a diet at Nuremberg in the year 1252; wherein it was ordered, with the common consent of all the states of the empire, that, from thence forward, the German tongue should be used in the chanceries, and public contracts. This occasioned the Germans to improve their language; and it is arrived to such a perfection, that now any history or science may be elegantly, and clearly expressed in it, either in print, or manuscript (96). Observe, that it has been said, that the king of France was induced to banish the Latin tongue from all public acts of justice, because he was told, that the first president of the parliament of Paris, had used a very barbarous term, when he pronounced sentence. Scripserat morem Gallie fuisse, leges regni semper Latino sermone scribi, donec Franciscus Rex ejus nominis primus id vultu anno 1539. Sed debuerat Matharellus causam addere: quoniam videlicet Præses Curie Parliamenti in arrepto pronuntiando dixerat, debotamus & debotavimus: quod Gallice jam pronuntiatur. Avons debouté & deboutons (we have dismissed, and do dismiss). De quo Rex Franciscus (ut quidam dicunt) multum relesat: ut alii, multum iratus fuerat (97).

[CC] The learned are indebted to him for some excellent editions. We need only read these words of Peter Victorius (102): 'Veritas quoque non patitur, ut reticentem egregiam voluntatem atque operam, inferioribus temporibus in hac re positam à Francisco primo Gallorum rege, qui ut erat omnibus in rebus magno animo, ac vere regio præditus, proclivique in humanum genus juvandum, rectaque studia summa ope augenda, curavit, ut quidquid antiquorum ingenii monumentorum restaret in afflicta Græcia, ad se mitteretur: cui beneficio magno addidit alterum, & ipsum valde utile ad hanc ipsam honestam artem ornandam: studium enim, magnis præmiis propositis, ut lepidæ admodum formæ litterarum, & Græcarum, & Latinarum, fingerentur: in quo etiam felix fuit: ita enim pulchræ atque politæ fabricatæ fuere, ut non videantur ab humano ingenio veniuntiores, & exquisitiores ullo pacto conformari posse: librique ipsis excusi, non inventi tantum, sed etiam aliquo modo rapiant ad se legendos. — Truth will not allow me to dissimulate the obligations we are under of late years in this respect, to Francis I, king of France, who, as he discovered a greatness of mind in every thing, and a truly royal disposition, in promoting the good of mankind, and encouraging useful learning, to the utmost of his power, so he took care to have the ancient monuments of wit, remaining in desolated Greece, transmitted to him; to which great piece of service he added another, of great use towards the carrying on this design; for, by proposing large rewards, he encouraged the founding of beautiful Greek and Latin Types; in which he met with success; for such beautiful and elegant ones were founded, as were not to be surpassed by the skill of man, and the books, which were printed with them, not only invited, but even forced men to read them.' To this we may add, what I relate in the article VERGERIUS (ANAGERIUS) (103), and this passage of the Antiquities of Paris: 'It appears, that, in the year 1541, Angelus Vergerius, Greek secretary to the king, had a pension of 450 French livres, charged on the Exchequer (104).

* we are informed, that, by order of the emperor, the maréchal de Villeroi (98) has been carried from Inspruc to the castle of Ambres, at a leagues distance, and that he is in the same chamber, in which Charles V confined king Francis I, after he had taken him prisoner before Pavia. Some of the Dutch Gazettes had already said the same thing. I could wish, the author of the Mercury had refuted, instead of followed, them. It is certain, that Francis I. was not carried into Germany, but into Spain. Bouchet observes, that the viceroy of Naples (99) gave the charge of the person of the king of France to the lord Marcon, governor of Apulia and Calabria, whom he carried to the castle of Piqueton (100). Paradis, Mezerai, and several other historians give the name of Piqueton to the castle, in which this prince was detained, before he was carried into Spain. This castle is on the river Adda in the Milanese, and is called in Italian Picighitone. See Leander Alberti in his description of Italy (101).

that Mount Visol which is esteemed the highest in all Europe, and where the Po rises, is a mountain, of which history informs us . . . that Francis I. caused it to be dug quite through to open a passage into Italy. But (adds this author) 'since the French have found the secret of opening the passage of Mount Genevre, which is much shorter and more convenient, they make no farther use of this hole; which yet suffices, being cut thro' a rock, and requiring two hours to pass it, which may be done with loaded mules; and the only inconvenience attending it is, that it is so dark, travellers are obliged to carry torches.' This author not having given us the date of this surprising piece of work, nor told us where he met with the relation. I have made inquiries which induce me to believe, that the expedition of Francis I. into Italy, in the year 1515, is the epocha of this. I thought, that Martin du Bellai had very fully described the difficulties to be surmounted in passing the Alps; but I found, that he speaks of it very succinctly (106), and without giving any idea of the prodigious labour in accomplishing it. I consulted Guicciardin (107), who gave me more satisfaction. Mr Varillas gave me no less: these are his words (108): 'Lautrecc and Navarre, with the choice men of the French army, left Geneva (109) on the left hand, forded the river Durance, and entered the Argentaires (110), by a place called Gillestre: from thence they penetrated as far as the rock St Paul, which they were forced to open with iron tools and fire. The two following days, the pioneers were for the most part useless; for, as each mountain was separated from the rest by abysses, the mine and sap were of no use, and they had recourse to bridges of communication, to transport the artillery. The soldiers and pioneers dragged it along in places inaccessible to beasts of burthen; they filled with fascines places, which would admit of it, and if they were too large, the void space was supplied with props and great trees. After this manner, they reached mount Pied-de-Porc; which they despaired of penetrating, because it consisted of but one solid rock, steep on all sides: but Navarre, who examined it thoroughly, discovered one vein more soft than the rest, and followed it so exactly, that he made himself a way through the middle. Thus, by the industry of engineers, by the labour of the soldiers, and by the perseverance of their leaders, the French army arrived, about the evening of the eighth day, in the marquisate of Saluces *.' But, good as this description is, it will be found cold and insipid, when compared with that of Paul Jovius (111). There is an observable difference between him and Varillas. This latter takes no notice of Trivulcio, to whom Paul Jovius gives the honour of discovering this new passage, and being the principal director of the execution.

[EE] I have something more to say concerning the pretended oath . . . he took to the Turk.] We have seen (112) what John le Maire de Belges reproached the Venetians with. I add, that the Saracens, who had the king St Lewis in their power, proposed to him the form of an oath, much shorter than that which the bastard of Cyprus is supposed to have made no scruple of taking, and which is the same Francis I. is supposed to have taken. It is plain, that the one was copied from the other; but St Lewis would not submit to this hard condition.

(b) Taken from the bull of her canonization, inserted by Bzovius in the 16th Vol. of the Ecclesiastical Annals, pag. 730, & seq. ad ann. 1440.

FRANCISCA, a devout lady canonized in the year 1608, was born at Rome, about the year 1384. She shewed from her infancy, that her heart was turned towards heaven, for she loved prayers and solitary places, and had an aversion for the pleasures and diversions of that age. At eleven years of age, she resolved to become a Nun; but her father would not agree to it; on the contrary, he married her to a rich Gentleman (a). Her solitary and devout temper did not alter with her condition; for she was alone, and prayed as often as the business of her family gave her time. She frequented neither public shews, nor banquets, nor weddings; nay, she did not visit her relations; but all her delight was to go to the churches and hospitals. She persuaded a great many maids to forsake the world, and founded for them a convent in Rome, according to the rule of St Benedict. They were called Oblates, and were of the congregation of the Olivetans. Having lost her husband, she very humbly petitioned to be admitted into that society, where she professed herself a Nun, and was wonderfully punctual in the performance of all her duties. She died the ninth of May 1440. She wrought a great many miracles during her life, and soon after her death; so that, some months after her decease, the preliminaries of her canonization were begun (b). This business was re-assumed several times, at the earnest request of the citizens of Rome, but it was not ended before the pontificate of Pope Paul V in the Year 1608 [A]. I have found, in a book of Nicolas Vignier, a very strange story [B], and of which I have in vain sought the original.

[A] This business was re-assumed at several times. . . . but it was not ended before . . . the year 1608. The proceedings were begun under Pope Eugenius IV, in the 1440. A bishop and a prior of the Carthusians were appointed commissioners, to examine the witnesses of the life and miracles of Francisca. After two years and some months, this business was put into the hands of cardinal Alberti; thirty witnesses were heard upon eighty articles. Nicolas V, successor to Eugenius IV, ordered these informations to be renewed by two bishops, who judicially received the depositions of 132 witnesses. There the business stood, till the pontificate of Clement VIII; in the mean while the devotion for the deceased did not cool, and the day of her death was kept at Rome. Clement VIII, at the solicitation of the inhabitants of Rome, ordered, that this affair should be expedited out of hand. He named commissioners, who examined the former proceedings from the beginning, and made some new informations to the year 1604. The Pope, dying in the mean time, could not satisfy the desires of the Roman people. Paul V, his successor, being urged to make an end of it, ordered, that it should be dispatched; and, at last, after the formalities required in the like case, he canonized our Francisca, the twenty ninth of May 1608, and appointed the ninth of March for her festival (1). The people of Rome took upon them the expence of this great ceremony, and laid out upon it above a hundred thousand crowns (2).

[B] We find in a book of Nicolas Vignier, a very strange story. These are his words; for I make no alteration in them, nor indeed ought I to do it

(3). A Roman matron, called Francisca, was ranked among the saints by the Pope, because she was wont to curb her carnal affections, by distilling burning Bacon upon her Pudenda. Volaterranus. You see he quotes Volaterran after a very indeterminate manner, without mentioning either the title, or number of the book, or chapter, or section. This is usual enough with him; but I think he should not have done it here, considering the oddness of the thing, and that he should have made the verification of that passage as 1505.

I have at length found in Volaterran the words, which gave Vignier room to mention this strange fact. The public has been informed of it, and may be sensible, that this scarce excuses that writer [C].

(Q) That is, in the work, intitled, Commentariorum Urbani VIII. libri octo & triginta. I have at last found the passage. See the remark [C].

easy as possible. I have searched in Volaterran (4). Wherever the table of matters, which is not good, and the distribution of the subjects might serve me as guide; but I have not been able to meet with it. A learned man had already informed me, that he had met with no such thing in the volume of Volaterran. This is not the only thing I have to say against Vignier. I cannot comprehend, why he mentions this Roman matron under the year 1505. It is not the time when she lived, nor that of her death, nor that of her canonization. Bzovius, under the year 1505, speaks of two persons of the fair sex, who died in the odour of sanctity, the one at Bourges, the other at Ravenna; but they were not the same with our Francisca: the one was Joan of France, foundress of the religious of the Annuciade; the other was called Margaret. Lastly, I observe that I can never be persuaded, unless I see the express words of Volaterran, that the quotation of Vignier is faithful. It is contrary to all probability, that Volaterran should say, that Francisca was canonized in the year 1505; for it was not till 1608; and it is yet less probable, that he should affirm, that her canonization was founded only on the reason assigned by Vignier. He was too well acquainted with the style of the court of Rome, to advance a thing so distant as this is from the practice of canonizations. They are never grounded merely on the virtues of the persons, tho' never so eminent: miracles true or false must come in; I mean, witnesses must be examined, which depose, that the intercession, relics, &c. of the person to be canonized, have done miraculous cures, &c. I would not alledge against Vignier the silence of the bull of Paul V; for I very well conceive, that, although it had been proved, that Francisca, made use of that severe mortification, yet it would not have been expressly inserted in the canonizing bull. I own, that some particular acts of austerity, less surprizing than this, have been inserted in it; but they had no relation to obscene images which are not to be inserted in a bull. 'Nec minori virtute in Christo JESU, (these are Paul the first's own words,) cum hoste domellico pugnavit, sed exemplo electorum Dei, admirabilem in modum castigavit corpus suum, & in feruitutem redegit. Cibum illi semel in die herbæ, & legumina, aqua potum præbuerunt, five vigilaret, five dormiret, asperum lincum indusium non exuebat, durisque cilicio, ac ferreo cingulo super nudum membra mortificabat; accedebant flagella ferreis aculeis aspersa, quibus corpusculum, quamquam aliunde attritum severissime atterebat (5).' These Latin words say, that she eat nothing but greens and pulse, and drank nothing but water; that, day and night, she wore a woollen shift, a hair cloth, and an iron girdle next to her skin; and that she unmercifully whipped herself. Whoever doth this, hath no need of the lard mentioned by Vignier, especially when, after the example of Francisca, a woman avoids the company of worldly persons, their visits, weddings, banquets their profane diversions, &c. Let us add that she became a widow but a few years before her death (6), and she died in the fifty sixth year of her life. These are sufficient reasons why this saint stood in no need of this violent cure of immodesty.

After all, had our Francis made use of such a violent remedy, she would deserve, not only the praises but also the admiration of all good people. She would have shewed a love for chastity incomparably stronger and livelier, than if she had followed the example of St Aldhelme (7), and such other rash votaries, who excited concupiscence, in order to have greater merit in curbing it. A bad victory, not only dangerous, but also not to be gained, but at the peril of the virtue, for which they contended. The thought alone, the imagination, a burning got the better of, are a state of impurity, and an object which must be displeasing in the sight of the lawgiver and his holy angels. St Paul's words (8), which, according to most translations, signify, that the widow, that lives in pleasure, is dead while she liveth, ought to be otherwise explained, if we believe Melancthon. The apostle doth not mean, according to him, that a widow, who loveth junketing, gaming, going abroad, such worldly pleasures, hath lost the HOLY GHOST, and the life of grace; but he means, that this spiritual death belongs to those widows, who are exposed to the burnings of the flesh; and he doth not understand a temptation, which satisfies their criminal desires, but a temptation, which hinders the soul from thinking on heavenly things, and makes it dwell on lascivious thoughts. These are Melancthon's words: 'Accusat Paulus illas mulieres non levibus verbis: Pruriens viva mortua est. Nam vocabulum σταλάσσειν propriè significat prurientem; quod plus est quam appetere delicias ciborum, sed est habere incendia libidinum, σπάτος cutem significat, σπατίζειν, σπάτος τίλλειν, vellicare cutem, seu titillare, σπατάλλειν pruritus seu titillatio cutis. Deinde κατασπινδιάν, significat turgere seu distendi saginatum & tumefactum esse contra Christum. His insignibus verbis multi turpes motus pugnant: cum Castitate significantur. Hac salacitate dicit veram fidem expulso Spiritu sancto extingui. Hæc est nativa significatio verborum Pauli (9). What is it to resist these temptations? it is to wish to have no lewd desires or motions: but still you have them. The safest way, then, is to put one's self in a state of never having these desires. And this our Francisca did, if Vignier's story be true (10).

[C] I have found in Volaterran, the words which gave Vignier room to mention this strange fact. . . . The public has been, in a letter, which I wrote the sixth of May 1702, this whole affair cleared up. Observe, I beseech you, Sir, these are the words of my letter (11), that I have not accused Vignier of citing Volaterran falsely; I have only said, that, having searched in Volaterran, wherever the table of matters, which is not good, and the distribution of the subjects, might serve me as a guide, I could not meet with this passage. You yourself acknowledge, that you have in vain turned over this author's bulky volume; but you add, that you cannot forbear thinking, that Vignier had read in it what he mentions. You are in the right, generally speaking, and I am well pleased, both for your satisfaction, and that of my readers, to inform the public here, that, in searching, two days ago, for something else, in Volaterran, I light upon this. It is to be found in the twenty second book, at page 810 of the edition of Frankfurt, 1603, at the place, where he mentions Pope Urban V. There we meet with these words: Quam (Catharinam Virginem filiam Brigide) Julius jamjam in Catalogum referre una cum Francisca Romana Matrona statuit, quæ & ipsa sub Eugenio claudit prodigiis & sanctitate: voluptatem inviti coitus ardente supra vulvam larido reprimebat. I have set down, in my dictionary (12), Vignier's translation of this passage. Examine carefully my criticism, and you will find it just: for it is true, that Volaterran observes, that Julius II designed to canonize this lady; but not that he did canonize her, &c.

FRANCUS (SEBASTIAN), an Anabaptist of the XVIth century, who published several books full of errors, which the Lutherans confuted. He was a true fanatic. He taught, that all sins are equal, and undermined the authority of scripture; for he maintained, that men were to seek for the suggestions of the Holy-Ghost, without minding the words revealed. He also believed, that the true church was an aggregate of several sects, wherein the Papists were no less comprehended than the Protestants. The divines of the confession of Ausburg, assembled at Smalcalde in the year 1540, desired Melancthon to refute this man's conceits, and those of some other fanatics.

natics (a). The same Francus published a very satirical book against women, which was refuted by John Freder, and by Luther [A].

Let us add, that he drew very strange consequences from an axiom of Servetus concerning the presence of God; for he pretended, that not only beasts, but the inanimate creation likewise partook of a general soul, that was divine. The sieur de Saint Aldegonde, who informs me of this, wished that some one would examine to the bottom the principle, whence these consequences were drawn [B]. Observe, that he says, Francus was a German; but others make him of Woerden, a town of Holland (b); they first name him Werdenensis in the abridgment of Gesner's Bibliotheca (c), and give the titles of several of his works, among which we must not forget a German chronicle, in which he intermixes many wonderful things (d). Some, writing even in Latin, call him Franc. Mr Moreri has mentioned him under this name: He says scarce any thing of him, though Spondanus, whom he cites, might have furnished him with some particulars, and among others this, that Francus was expelled from Strasburg, that his chronicle was there condemned, and that he is the first, who asserted, that Anabaptism was divided into more than forty four sects (e).

queen.

[A] He published a very satirical book against women, which was refuted by John Freder and Luther.] John Freder wrote a dialogue concerning marriage, in answer to this satire of Francus, and dedicated it to Dorothy queen of Denmark (1), upon whom he bestowed a very noble encomium. Luther prefixed a preface before this work, and exclaimed bitterly against Francus: he said, among other things, that he was a slanderer, who raked together all the filth of mankind, and impudently published it. He compared him to flies, &c. But it is better to set down the author's own words, whence I have all this: 'Opus postus ille (Dialogus de conjugio) est maledicentiae Sebastiani Franci . . . qua foeminiuum sexum edidit libello proterve insectatus est. . . Lutherus in praefatione fatetur, se Francum hominem pessimum responso indignum judicasse, certum, quod scripta ejus lucem haud diu sint laturos, cum non nisi satirae & convitiis indulgeat, & aliorum detegat & exagitet vitia, illitque turpitudinum illarum inverecunda relatione chartas mundo obtrudat; Comparat eum cum muscis & vespis, quas scissidissima quaeque pervolantes & perrepentes, postea inquinatae & foetentes, naso, oculis, genis & labiis hominum impudentiam insidere velint. Taxari quidem merito vitia etiam a piis doctoribus, sed non cum petulantia aut insultatione, aut quod delectentur in eorum enarratione, sed ut odium flagitiorum excitent, & viam ad emendationem ostendant (2). — The dialogue concerning marriage is opposed to the calumny of Sebastian Francus . . . who libelled the female sex in a book that he published. . . Luther, in the preface, confesses, that he had thought Francus, the worst of men, unworthy of a reply, being well assured, that his writings were short-lived, since he indulges himself in nothing but satire and calumny, and detects and censures the vices of others, and obtrudes his books on the world, stuffed with immodest accounts of filthy actions. He compares him to flies and wasps, which flying and creeping thro' the noisiest things, afterwards, defiled and stinking as they are, impudently endeavour to sit on the nose, cheeks, and lips of men. Vice is deservedly censured by the most pious teachers, but not with petulance and insult, or to shew that they are delighted with the narrative, but to raise an hatred to vice, and to print out the path of amendment.'

[B] St Aldegonde . . . wished that some one would examine to the bottom the principle, whence these consequences are drawn.] Read a letter, which he wrote to Theodore Beza in the year 1566, where you will find these words: 'Sebastianus Francus homo Germanus qui mirifica hujusmodi portenta congestit in suas farragines, ac in primis in eum, quem Paradoxa inscriptit, librum, Axioma illud Serveti de Dei reali vel essentiali in omnibus & rebus & locis praesentia ita urget, ut ex eo colligat non modo brutas pecudes, sed ipsa etiam corpora inanima, tamen anima quadam communi atque divina vel caelesti vegetari, quae nisi fallor à Virgilio mundi spiritus, ab hoc verbum internum, sermo, spiritus, lux, potentia, vis, ac denique Filius ipse Dei nominatur. Eam cum hominum omnium animus communi quadam vi fovere, tum praesertim in piis viris facultatem quandam praecipuam ac singularem exercere.

Eoque restit illos vel Deos vel certe deificatos appellari. Quo sensu vult Christum ipsum dici Filium Dei, cui Socratem ac Mercurium Trismegistum, alioque hujus farinae nonnullos, tanquam aequales ac socios adjungit. Ejus infinitas blasphemias statuerunt quidam refutare, sed hoc unum eos remouit, quod haud satis illis constare possit quid de primo illo axioma Servetico ex quo caetera omnia manant, sit judicandum. Mihi certe haud dubium sit, quin ex eo multa non modo falsa, sed prorsus etiam impia consequantur. Tamen neque Joannes Calvinus neque ex veteribus (quod quidem sciam) quispiam argumenta ad illius ipsius refutationem suppeditat. Quinimò verò veteres illi Theologi videntur mihi praesentiam illam realem Divinae essentiae in immensum plerumque extendisse (3). — Sebastian Francus, a German, who heaped together in his miscellaneous collections wonderful portents of this kind particularly in that book, which he entitled Paradoxa; wherein he urges that axiom of Servetus, concerning the real or essential presence of GOD in all things and places, in such a manner, as to gather from it, that not only brute beasts, but even inanimate bodies, are vegetated by a certain common and divine or celestial soul; which, if I mistake not is called, by Virgil, the spirit of the world, by him the internal word, the speech, breath, light, power, force, and, lastly, the son of GOD himself. He asserts, that this soul not only cherishes the minds of all men by a certain common energy, but exerts a particular force in good men: and that therefore they are rightly styled Gods, or deified men: In which sense he pretends, that Christ himself is called the son of GOD, with whom he joins, as equals and companions, Socrates, Mercurius Trismegistus, and others of that stamp. Some persons have resolved to refute his many blasphemies; but this one thing has hitherto stopped them, that they know not what to think of that first axiom of Servetus, from whence all the rest flow. For my own part, I am convinced, that it is attended with many, not only false, but even impious consequences. However, neither Calvin, nor any of the old writers (as far as I know) furnish us with arguments for the confutation of it. Nay, those old divines seem to me for the most part, to have immensely extended that real presence of the divine essence. I omit what he says afterwards, and which shews, that the received opinion of the immensity of God puzzled him, and seemed to him productive of many vain and empty notions. I pass by likewise Beza's answers to him (4); but I will observe, by the by, that the opinions of the divines, which import, that the essence and substance of God is extended thro' all bodies, is liable to a thousand difficulties. The Cartesians shew this very plainly. See what Mr Wittichius (5) observes against Suarez, who has endeavoured to explain how God may be present in imaginary space. Mr Arnould censured also a minister, who had made use of the received opinion, to prove, by an argument, ad hominem, that one might worship marble (6). The minister in his reply, said several things, and among others this (7); that the divinity of Vaqueus, according to which all inanimate and irrational things may be worshipped, because GOD is in all creatures by his essence, and sustains FRANGIPANI, a very antient Roman family, related to the best families of Europe [A], owes its name to some extraordinary acts of charity to the poor in a famine [B]. [A] A Roman family... related to the best families of Europe. Mr le Laboureur (1) says, that the marquis Frangipani, whom he had seen at Rome, reckoned, among the younger brothers of his family, the arch-dukes of Austria, and the kings of Spain, grounded on the opinion of Raphael Volterrano, which opinion he would have been sorry to have been undeceived in; and that he was perpetually troublesome to the new princes of Rome, by pretending to be of so ancient a family, that none could presume to compare with him. This author, having described the equipage of the same marquis in a great ceremony (2), adds (3), that it gave him notions quite contrary to the esteem, which is due to the first and most ancient name of Rome, and to the most illustrious family of Dalmatia and Frioul, since about the year 1120, when one of that house married the daughter of Engilbert marquis of Frioul, sister to Mahaut, wife to Tibbaut IV, earl of Champagne and Brie, aunt to Alice of Champagne, wife to Lewis the younger, and mother to Philip Augustus king of France. Lazzera, who hath written an history of several families of Italy, and who knew nothing of this alliance, adds another, which he proves, namely, with a niece of the emperor of Constantinople, who, in the year 1170, was sent in great pomp, attended by several bishops and great lords of Greece, to marry Eudo Frangipani. It appears by the history of this illustrious family, written by him, that it was the most powerful in Rome, and that they have seen there the rise of the grandeur of all the others, whom the abuses of the times engaged to take upon them the quality of princes. We shall see below (4), that the Frangipani pretend to be related to St Gregory.

[B] . . . Owing its name to some extraordinary acts of charity to the poor in a famine. Frangipani in Italy, bears azure, two hands argent, holding a loaf, or, cut into halves; because one of his predecessors, in a time of dearth, relieved a vast number of indigent persons. Thus father Gilbert de Varenne speaks in his Theatre of Arms, and achievements (5). They were at first called Fricapani, as it appears by these words of Geoffroy of Vendosme: 'Primo anno, quo, deo volente vel permittente, nomen abbatis suscepit, audiui pie recordationis Dominum Papam Urbanum in domo Joannis Fricapanem latitare' (6). — The first year, in which, by the will or permission of GOD, I took upon me the name of abbot, I heard, that Pope Urban of pious memory lay concealed in the house of John Fricapani. See father Simond's note on this place (7). The name of Frangipani was already in vogue in the XIIth century; for these words are found in the chronicle of the monastery of Anchin (8): 'Schismatici quietem non serentes ecclesie, iterum quemdam Clericum de progenie illorum quos Frangipanes Romani vocant contra Papam Alexandrum, Antipapam statuunt, quem mutato nomine, Innocentem III vocitarunt. — The sibismatics, not enduring the repose of the church, again set up, against Pope Alexander, an Anti-Pope, a certain ecclesiastic, of the race of those, whom the people of Rome call Frangipani.' Conrad, abbot of Ursperg, makes use of the word Frangentes panem. He speaks thus: 'Imperator convocavit ad se de civibus Romanis potentissimos & nobilissimos de familia eorum qui dicuntur Frangentes panem, & aliis ad quos precipue habebat respectum populus Romanus (9). — The emperor sent for the most powerful and noble of the Roman citizens, of the family of the Frangentes panem, and of those, to whom the people of Rome paid a particular regard'.

[C] It is long ago, since a branch of this family settled gloriously in Hungary. Scioppius produces an act, or deed, dated in the year 1260, whereby Bela, king of Hungary, acknowledges, that, when his country was laid waste by the Tartars, he was assisted and comforted by Frederic and Bartholomew Frangipani, who, with their relations, went into his service, and assisted him with a large sum of money. And, for an acknowledgment, he transferred to them the possession of a maritime town, with all the rights and lands that belonged to him. See page 215 of the book intitled, Oporini Grabinii Amphitides Scioppiana. Scioppius affirms (10), that this act was communicated to him by George Antigonus Frangipani, gentleman of the bed-chamber, and great master of the horse to the archduke Maximilian Ernestus. Let us quote something of it (11): 'Deus totius consolationis, qui consolatur suos in omni tribulatione, etiam nobis fontem aperire dignatus est, & ad consolandum nos Feldericum & Bartholomæum illustres & strenuos viros de Frangipani, nobiles de Weglia quasi de coelo projecit, qui nobis cum omni parentela adherentes inter alius promiscuos, fideles exhibuerunt famulatus & non modicam pecuniam eorum, quæ ultra XX. marcarum millia transcendunt, in vasis aureis & argenteis atque aliis rebus pretiosis nobis de bonis eorum præsentaverunt, & præsentando donaverunt. Demum nos, cum à nobis Deus suam indignationem amoverit, recompensantes eorum servitia & dona, de consilio dominæ Mariæ, christianissimæ consortis nostræ, & Baronum nostrorum fidelium, quandam civitatem nostram, circa litus maris extantem, SEGNIAM vocatam, cum omnibus suis utilitatibus & pertinentiis universis, simul cum tributo seu Telonio, & aliis circumferentiis, & in eadem libertate, sicut nobis servire consueverant, dedimus & donavimus, & contulimus ipsi Felderico & Bartholomæo in filios filiorum perpetuo & irrevocabiter possidendum.

The GOD of all consolation, who comforts his people in every distress, has vouchsafed to open a fountain even to us, and has sent, as it were from heaven, to comfort us, Felderic and Bartholomew, illustrious and brave men, of the family of the Frangipani; nobles of Weglia, who, adhering to us with all kind of fatherly affection, have served us faithfully, and given us no small share of their wealth, amounting to above 20,000 marks, in gold and silver vessels, and other valuable things. In recompence for which services and presents, we, being restored to the favour of heaven, do, by the advice of our dearest consort Mary, and our faithful barons, give and bestow, and have given and bestowed, on Felderic and Bartholomew, and their heirs for ever, the possession of one of our maritime towns, named SEGNI A, with all its profits and appurtenances, together with the tribute or toll, as hitherto paid to us. This prince, by another deed, granted them several privileges and immunities, and gave some reasons for it, that are very honourable; which obliges me to quote his words. They are so many historical facts, fit to be inserted in this place: 'Deus ad refulciendum & corroborandum nos, Feldericum & Bartholomæum de Frangipani, illustres & strenuos viros, nobiles de Weglia alta ex profapia urbis Romanæ senatorum ortos, tanquam angelos protectionis de arce polorum misit, qui nobis cum eorum parentela & familiarium caterva armigeræ in opem & nostræ personæ saluberrimam tutelam adhaerendo, per eorum strenua certamina, quosdam duces ipsorum Tartarorum, sequacesque eorum diræ necis exterminio necari, & quosdam captos nobis offerre, ubi etiam crebra stigmata & gravia sustulerat & multos ex eorum charis proximos & familiares amittere, supraque omnibus prænaratis copiosam pecuniarum ipsorum in auro etiam & argento ac rebus pretiosis quantitatem ad XX. millia marcarum se extendentem nobis pro assumendis stipendiariis & expeditionibus variis offerre maluerunt, &c (12). — GOD, in order to restore and strengthen us, sent from heaven, as guardian angels, Felderic and Bartholomew Frangipani, illustrious and brave men, nobles of Weglia

See, in the supplement to Moreri's dictionary, the tragical end of a great lord of Hungary, called Frangipani, who had plotted against the emperor, in the year 1671.

[D] Mutio Frangipani served in France . . . in the reign of Charles IX. The Pope concerning himself mightily in the wars about religion in France, several great Italian lords passed the Alps: some were officers of the forces, which he sent; others, to shew their respect to that crown, served as volunteers. The lord Mutio Frangipani thought, that he was the more obliged to engage himself in that expedition, because he was a partizan of France, and had there a great many relations by his wife Julia Strozzi, sister to the countess of Fiesque, who had besides the honour of being related to the queen. He gave some proofs of his bravery in the battle of Jarnac, where he was wounded; and afterwards he returned home, to enjoy quietly the glory, which he had acquired in that war (13).

[E] One of his jests was made use of, and he, who used it, was severely censured for it. Colstar, writing to Mr Colbert (14), made use of the following expressions: 'How would you have me go to court? I have been almost these five years in the country, because I am not strong enough to bear the fatigue of Paris, and to repair to those places, where one must shew a great deal of respect, and where one must continually be in that troublesome posture, which seemed intolerable to the marquis de Frangipani, when he was at the French court; which made him say pleasantly, Star sempre dritto a scapellato: — You know the rest, Sir; or, if you do not know it, you must not expect to be informed of it by an archdeacon (15). Let us see how he was censured for this. These words need no explanation, since every body understands them. It is an old jest, which all those, who glory in their lewdness, do often repeat; and, if my antagonist hath been ashamed to explain it, who will undertake it (16)?

If you find them good, they will be in more repute than the gloves of Frangipani. But, because your people of Limousin might here mistake, pray give them notice, that this Perfumer is worth above thirty thousand livres a year, and hath the first dignity of this province; and that his Glover is a Roman lord, who is marechal de camp of the king's armies, and related to St Gregory the great; and, what I value more than all this, he is one of the honestest men in the world. Menage quotes afterwards these Latin verses of Cerisantes, which are very pretty.

Amice, nil me, sicut antea, juvat
Pulvere vel Cyprio Comam nitentem pectere,

Mille modis varias jactare ventis tœnias:

And breathing Frangipane his scented air.

[G] The equipage, wherein he appeared at Rome . . . was remarkable. Mr le Laboureur, an eye-witness, speaks of it after this manner: 'I cannot forbear adding concerning this last marquis of Frangipani, that I saw him once at the cavalcade, which is performed on St Peter's day, to conduct the Pope from the Vatican to Montecavallo, very well mounted, and gracefully sitting on horseback, but not in a garb suitable to this solemnity, which is altogether warlike, and which was celebrated by firing all the guns of the castle of St Angelo. He was clothed in black taffety, with a cloak upon his shoulders, tucked up under his arm, his cloaths of the same stuff, with hanging sleeves to his doublet, sitting on a deep saddle, with silk stockings, and garters rose-wise, and a switch in his hand. I made it my business to be sure, that it was he, though I knew him; because I thought it strange, that he should publicly appear so like a citizen on so solemn an occasion (19).

FRATRICELLI, heretics, who appeared in Italy towards the end of the XIIIth century. They performed their devotions in private places, where they met in the night-time; and, after they had sung some hymns, they put out the candles, and every one laid hold of a woman, as he was directed by chance (a). The children, that were begot by this commerce, were brought into the assembly, and handed round about till they expired. He, in whose hands they expired, was chosen high-priest. They burned one of those children, and put the ashes in a vessel, in which they poured wine, which they gave to drink to those they initiated into their brotherhood. They exclaimed against the property of goods; and maintained, that the faithful ought not to meddle with magistracy, and that the souls of the blessed shall not see God till after the resurrection (b). Madam des Jardins traces this Sect to a very probable origin [A]; for 'tis hard to believe, but that most of those religious hypocrites, who their spies, so that this commerce was absolutely interrupted. Some young people were extremely concerned at this reformation. . . . Seeing therefore, that the noise their public gallantry made was the cause set up conventicles under pretence of reformation, have a design upon women. They persuade themselves, that the fair sex will easily fall into the snare, and that their inclination to the outward exercises of religion, as well as to those of nature, which maintains an admirable correspondence with the other, will furnish them with means to bend women to whatsoever they shall please.

In order to observe the rule, that we ought to hear both parties, Audi & alteram partem, I ought to note in this place, that an illustrious Protestant gives us to understand, that the Fratricelli were not guilty of the enormities, that were laid to their charge [B]; but that the true reason, both of the calumnies, that were spread abroad against them, and of the rigour, with which they were persecuted, was, because they taught tenets, which clashed with Popery. The answer, which has been made to that Protestant, will inform us, that, according to some authors, the Fratricelli did not lie with women, to enjoy them, but only to render their continence more meritorious [C]. We must not forget, that several of them called themselves Friars of the order of that disorder, they resolved to make love by health, and, to save the appearances, which alarmed husbands, they affected to live in retirement; they studied a mortified outside, and, forming a new religious order, under the name of Fratricelli, or Little brethren, they quickly gained so much reverence by the piety they seemed to practise, that they were looked upon as new anchorites. Some of the most suspicious husbands, and whose spouses were none of the chafest, had the curiosity to see those devout men. People, distracted with domestic cares, make great use of conferences; and so, finding the conversation of the Fratricelli very edifying, there was none of them but hoped, from their charitable remonstrances, the entire conversion of the most coquetish wives. They were impatient to return home, to cry up the new order; and the women, looking upon all the pretences of visits as so many steps towards liberty, shewed as great a desire to see the Fratricelli, as the husbands had they should go to them. Thus our Fratricelli received agreeable visits, with which the husbands were very well pleased; for, in order to establish their new dominion, they preached up nothing but the keeping conjugal faith, the bounden obedience of wives towards their husbands, and many other wholesome precepts, all very necessary towards domestic peace, and very edifying to married men: but, because what was proper to be said to the one, was not agreeable to the other, they exhorted the ladies to come and see them in private: In order, said they, that we may put the axe to the root of the tree, and work effectually their entire conversion. They found no difficulty in obtaining from the wives that mark of their deference; they had much rather come to their sermons, than be confined at home; and, finding the secret instructions of the Fratricelli not so hard to be practised, as those of common ghostly fathers, they received them with docility, and submitted to them without reluctance.

AN INQUIRY into the causes, which draw so many women to fraternities of austere devotion.

It is a truth, confirmed by the experience of all ages, that one of the surest means to draw the sex, and make them run after men, is to set up fraternities of an austere reformation, and to make a great shew of strict devotion in certain conventicles. Those, who trace events to their causes, have not forgot to meditate on the reasons of this. They divide into two principal classes those female scholars. Some go to that school out of a good principle; being led by devotion, which is innate to the sex: others have heard a thousand times, that there is a great deal of hypocrisy in these religious founders, that they are men like the rest, and that they play the hypocrites, only to make love without scandal, and under the cloak of secrecy. Without doubt, the following song has a long time been sung all over the world, though in other terms.

... Bourgeois de Sodome,
Voyant Dom Côme
Dit en courroux,
Ces bigots sont tous en priere,
Ils font tous au ciel les yeux doux,
L'onaison ne leur sert de guiere,
En amour ils sont tous
Moins bêtes & plus fripons que nous.

A burgher of Sodom, seeing Dom Côme, said in a passion; these bigots are all at their prayers; they stealthily look upon heaven; but their praying is to little purpose; for in love they are more politic, and less scrupulous than we.

This is the reason a woman hopes to find a lucky hour among those pretenders to devotion, and is eager to put herself under their direction, with whom she may lose nothing with regard to pleasure, and get a great deal as to her reputation. Women even hope, that, in case such men should not be hypocrites, they may have the address powerfully and victoriously to tempt them; for, of all vices, none is more untameable and ungovernable than concupiscence (2). As for the scholars of the other class, they conceive so great a veneration, and even so great an affection for the pretended man of God, that they blind themselves in his favour. If he finds it necessary to persuade them that there is no sin in doing some things, he insensibly turns them that way, and at worst their tenderness does not suffer them to resist his desires. However it be, there never was a head of a sect, nor a founder of a conventicle, let the things practised there be never so abominable, but found very tractable disciples among the other sex (3): and when we see how solicitous these men are to draw in women, one must have a great deal of charity not to believe, that the scope of their devotion rather centres in the body, which they have received from nature, than in the salvation of their soul.

[B] An illustrious Protestant gives us to understand, that the Fratricelli were not guilty of the enormities laid to their charge. Mr du Plessis looks upon them as a branch of the Vaudois: But besides, says he (4), that the Vaudois continued in France, we trace them into Italy and Germany, by their own blood, which was spilt by the inquisitors. In Italy, where Boniface exterminated, by all manner of severities, those they called Fratricelli, brethren, whose teachers were Gerard Sagarelli of Parma, and Dulcino of Novarra, disciples of Herman, who was esteemed a saint in Italy, and was afterwards dug up by Boniface at Ferrara. These poor people, to whom, according to custom, they impute a thousand infamous enormities, but who, in truth, taught, that the Pope was Antichrist, and the church of Rome the Babylon of the Revelations; those pretended inspired men reproved several Romish abuses and traditions; and their being persecuted by Boniface, one of the most leud and prophanes Popes that ever was, ought to make us presume that it was not on account of leudness. We find them also at the same time in Germany.

[C] The Fratricelli did not lie with women, to enjoy them, but only to render their continence more meritorious. Coëffeteau, answering that passage of the Mystery of Iniquity, affirms (5), that the very fathers of these Fratricelli, relate some things of them, which render the depositions of others probable. Let us hear how Vigniere speaks of them. 'Pope Clement (says he) being informed, that the assemblies and congregations of those they called Fratricelli, who dwelled in the mountains of Piedmont and Lombardy, and even in the neighbourhood of Verceil and Novarra, increased more and more, inasmuch that they could not be dispersed, caused the Jacobins and Franciscans to preach a crusade against them: so that a great number of crosses went in quest of them in their mountains, where they destroyed, that year, either by the sword, hunger, or cold, above 400, and burnt 140 of them; among whom was found their principal minister Dul-

order of St Francis. Bzovius, who affected to make that remark, was censured for it by the Franciscans. We shall see part of what has been said in his justification [D]. Neither must we pass over in silence, that Prateolus, who warmly affirms all the ill reports, that have been spread against the Fratricelli, confesses, that they opposed the court of Rome, and the papal authority [E].

'cin, and his wife Margaret, who were also put to death. Some call them Dulcins, because of the said Dulcins; others, Fratricelli, because they called one another brethren; and the women, who accompanied them, sisters in JESUS CHRIST; with whom, Platina and other historians say, they cohabited, and cohabed promiscuously, in their conventicles, after the manner of those called Adamites and Nicolaites, putting out the candles: but the Mer des Histoires says only, that they did not scruple to lie together, without knowing one another carnally, esteeming such a continence as meritorious, as the raising one from the dead, &c. Does not this lying together, and bestial indifference, make their lewdness more than probable, unless we suppose them to have been marble? but Vignier flatters them as well as du Pleiss. The common opinion is, that they defiled themselves with a thousand infamous impurities, for which they deserved to be exterminated as monsters, that dishonoured the christian religion. Masseus, so often quoted by du Pleiss, speaks of them in these words: † In 1308, in Lent, were taken above 400 Dulcins, in the mountains of Navarra, and the neighbourhood of Perceil. Now these were the remains of those, whom St Bernard mentions, on the Song of Solomon. They mingled promiscuously, men and women lying in the same bed: the men saying, that they kept women company in order to make their own continence more meritorious, by passing by those occasions of sinning, and leaving them virgins, &c. I omit some faults, which have been taken notice of. Rivet, replying to Coëffeteau, declares himself the apologist of the Fratricelli: he does not confess, that they endeavoured to signalize their continence by lying near a woman, without going further; he owns, that, if they had done so, they had been to blame; but however, he does in some measure extenuate the fault. These are his words (6): 'The witnesses against the Fratricelli agree like the witnesses of Susanna: what Vignier writes, and what Coëffeteau takes from him, is a proof of it: for what Platina imputes to them is more than what the Mer des Histoires says of them. And, though I will not approve, that men and women should lie together without scruple, to make their continence more painful, and consequently more commendable; yet Coëffeteau might have found such a proceeding warranted in antiquity by several ecclesiastics, against whom Cyprian and Jerome exclaimed: for they had their Agapetes, and companions of celibacy, with whom they lay, as we have said elsewhere: however, we do not own what is said of them in that Mer des Histoires, which is often a sink of lies.' Observe by the bye, that the misconduct imputed to Robert d'Arbrissel is very ancient, and that it would be common to him with many, who have lived both before and after him.

[D] We shall see part of what has been said in Bzovius's justification.] The complaints of the Franciscans, together with their answers and apologies, are found (7) in the book intitled, Nitela Franciscanorum contra Bzovium; and in Wadding, in the third tome of the Annals of the Friars Minors (8). The reply for Bzovius is found in the writings of a dominican, called Nicolas Janfenius; to which I refer my readers; contenting myself to say, that father Vincent Baron has shewn, by the testimony of Oderic Raynaldus, the continuator of Baronius, that the Fratricelli had obtained confirmations and privileges of Pope Celestine V, in the quality of monks of the order of St Francis. 'Illi (Bzovio) assentitur . . . Odericus Raynaldus . . . tomo quinto decimo suorum annalium ad ann. 1317, n. 56. & sequent. ita habet: variae fuerunt fraticellorum sectae; & certum est ex extravag. decreto standum esset. Hæc Odericus (9). — With Bzovius agrees . . . Odericus Raynaldus, in the fifteenth tome of his Annals, under the year 1317, n. 56. &c. he has these words: There were many sects of the Fratricelli; and it is certain from the Extravagant of John XXII, that, of the Fratricelli, some pretended to have received their habit and manner of life from the bishops or prelates of the church; others boast, that they have taken upon them the habit of the third order of St Francis, called the Penitents; others pretended to profess the order of Friars Minors, and to observe punctually the rule of St Francis; and, by this pretence, they obtained of Pope Celestine V their privileges; although this reason is of no avail, since Boniface VIII annulled the grant of Celestine, and they were obliged to abide by the latter decree. He quotes also this passage of Alvares Pelagius, a Franciscan monk. Multi sæculares & Fratres Minores pro isto carnali spirita libertatis, per inquisitores hæreticæ pravitatis incarcerati fuerunt (10). Note, that this passage of Raynaldus confirms what Hospinian observes, that the Popes have varied in their judgments about the Fratricelli: 'De Fratricellis à Johanne XXII. condemnatis, à Gregorio XI. & Eugenio approbatis, refert Hospinianus de Monachis, lib. 6. cap. 32. Vides judiciorum Papalium auctoritatem (11). — Hospinian, de Monachis, lib. 6. c. 32. gives an account of the Fratricelli, condemned by John XXII, and approved by Gregory XI, and Eugenius. [E] Prateolus, who warmly affirms all the ill reports . . . against the Fratricelli, confesses that they opposed the court of Rome, and the Papal authority.] What he relates is intermixed with several things, that are not mentioned in our preceding remarks; wherefore I think I ought to copy it, the better to shew what has been said of these heretics. 'Some, who would be thought of the third order of St Francis's institution, and who were called by the Italians, in the kingdom of Sicily, and province of Narbonne, Fraticuli, or Fratricelli, or Fratres de paupere vita, or Bifolbi, or Beguini, and other names, were at that time accused and condemned of heresy, by Pope Boniface VIII; though some say they were so first by Pope John XXII. They contemned the sacraments of the church; and said, that it was not lawful for christians to hold any thing in property, nor to meddle with the administration and government of commonwealths; and that the souls of the blessed did not enjoy the sight of God till the last day. In their assemblies, (like the Adamites now-a-days, who say that all women are common) after the celebration of their mysteries, they indulged carnal lust, contrary to conjugal chastity, with the next woman that came to hand; which they did by night, after having put out the candles. The chroniclers relate, how those, who were of that sect, were discovered, to wit, by a merchant of Milan, named Conrad; who, seeing, that his wife often rose in the night, had a mind to know whither she went, and why she got up. He therefore followed her once secretly, and went into their synagogue; where, after their mysteries were performed, and the candles put out, holding her close, he enjoyed her, and took a ring off her finger for a token, and afterwards declared it to the rest, and informed the inquisitor of the faith of it. All the women, who were of that sect, had a crown like the clerks and monks, and thereby were all discovered. See the supplement to the Chroniclers. They said also, that the power of the church, by reason of the ill morals of the ecclesiastics, had been a long time made void and extinguished; that they were the only church of God; that they imitated the apostles; that the church of Rome was a whore; and that the Popes, from Sylvester, the first of that name, had all been wicked, as not having lived in poverty; and that therefore people ought not to pay tithes to them. They were so impudent, that they said, that one Margaret, concubine to one of their principal preachers and ministers, named Dulcinus, had conceived by the Holy Ghost (12).'

FRAUWENLOB,

FRAUWENLOB (HENRY); a German author; who died at Mentz, in 1317. His funeral was very singular. The women carried his corps from his house to the great church, filled the streets with their lamentable cries and complaints, and poured so great a quantity of wine on his grave, that it overflowed the church: All which they did in acknowledgment of the praises he had bestowed on their sex in his books. See the remark [A].

[A] See the remark.] This article is taken from Albertus Argentinensis, one of the writers of the history of Germany (1), whose words I am sure the reader will not be displeased to see here: 'Anno Domini 1317. sepultus est Henricus dictus Frauenlob in Moguntia in ambitu majoris ecclesie . . . qui deportatus fuit

' à mulieribus ex hospitio usque ad locum sepulture, & lamentationes & querelæ maximæ audite fuerunt ab eis propter laudes infinitas quas imposuit omni generi femineo in distaminibus suis. Tanta etiam ibi copia fuit vini fusa in sepulcrum suum quod circumfluebatur per totum ambitum ecclesie.'

FREIGIUS (JOHN THOMAS) grand-son of a peasant, and son of a civilian [A], lived in the XVIth century. He was born at Friburg in the Brisgaw, and acquired great reputation by his learned works. He studied the law in his own country under the famous Zasius, and he had likewise for masters Henry Glarean, and Peter Ramus. He addicted himself extremely to the principles and method of the latter. He taught first at Friburg, and afterwards at Basil; but meeting with ill success, he was near breaking with the Muses, and retiring into the country. He was revolving this design in his thoughts, when the senate of Nuremberg, at the instigation of Jerom Wolfius, offered him the rectorship of the new college of Altorf. This post became vacant by the death of Valentine Erythreus the first who had enjoyed it. He took possession of this employment the thirtieth of November 1575. He discharged his duty in it zealously, in explaining the historians, the poets, and the institutes of Justinian, &c. He returned to Basil, and died there of the plague in the year 1583 (a) [B]. This contagious distemper had a little before deprived him of a son of great hopes, and two daughters, one of whom had already made some progress in learning [C]. He published

(a) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vita Juriscons. pag. 252, & seq.

[A] He was grand-son of a peasant, and son of a civilian. This civilian's name was NICOLAS FREIGIUS: his father was an honest countryman, or husbandman, who lived near Basil.

Me pater agresti genuit sub rure colonus,
Hic ubi Rauriacos Rhenus adurget agros (1).

A cottage gave me birth, my sire a clown,
Where the Rhine rolls its rapid waters down.

His inclination to study lead him on as far as the degree of doctor in law. He married at Friburg in the Brisgaw; he made himself known to the public, by procuring editions of some of the works of Zasius. He exercised the profession of an advocate at Entheim in Alsace, and from thence went with his family to Ulm, and was there one of the counsellors of the town. He died there of a dropy in the year 1580: his wife buried him in a convent of nuns at Seßlingen near Ulm. Melchior Adam recites the Latin verses of John Thomas Freigius (2), which contain the aforesaid particulars; yet he had just before said, that Nicolas Freigius survived his wife, who died in the year 1564 (3); & matrem quidem primo amisit (Jo. Thomas Freigius) peste sublatam cum duobus sororibus (4) anno Christi millesimo, quingentesimo, sexagesimo, quarto. Hæc subsequutus est pater. If he had considered the following verses, he would have known, that they were written in the year 1564, fourteen years after the death of Nicolas Freigius.

Hic jam namque, pater, bis septimus ingruit annus,
Ex quo te tristis fata tulere nece (5).

Now twice seven years their mournful course have run,
Since death, my father, tore thee from thy son.

Morel has committed several faults: for he says, I. that Nicolas Freigius died of the plague: II. that it was in the year 1564: III. that it was with his wife, IV. and with two of his daughters (6); V. that he had made great discoveries in both civil and canon-law; VI. that his son studied law under the greatest men of his time. This is falsely to suppose, that Glareanus and Ramus taught him law. VII. He gives him the christian name Thomas; whereas he ought to call him John Thomas.

VOL. III.

[B] He died of the plague, in 1583.] On the sixteenth of January, if we believe Melchior Adam, who adds, that, according to others, it was in 1582. The epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca (7) affirms, that he died in the college of Altorf, in the year 1582. I believe Melchior Adam is not mistaken, and that there is a fault in the date of the epistle dedicatory of Joan. Thomæ Freigii Quaestiones Geometricæ & Stereometricæ. The author himself dedicates this work to six mathematicians his good friends. It is a book, which was printed at Basil, by Sebastian Henricpetri, in the month of March 1583. The epistle dedicatory is dated from Basil the first of March of the same year. This cannot agree with an advertisement at the end of the book. This advertisement relates to the elegies, which Freigius published in the year 1564, and of which he made a new edition, which was added to the Quaestiones Geometricæ, &c. He dedicates this new edition to his two sons, and dates his epistle dedicatory at Basil the last of December 1582. The advertisement informs us, that, during the re-printing these elegies, the author was seized with the plague, and that it carried him off at the end of forty hours, on the sixteenth of January. It adds, that the two sons, to whom the work was dedicated, died of the same distemper eight days after. The date of the impression at the bottom of the page is this month of March 1583.

[C] The plague had deprived him of a son, of great hopes, and two daughters, one of whom had already made some progress in learning.] He tells us this in the epistle dedicatory of the second edition of his elegies. 'Cum hoc anno, says he, to his two sons, sorores duas vestras Ursulam & Barbaram, ac fratrem Matthiam peste acerba nobis ex oculis eripisset (scilicet meum) &c. . . . amisi ego in Barbara nostrâ Oeconomiam meam fidelem administram & dispensatricem: amissisti vos in eadem studiorum vestrorum sociam: quæ si diutius hujus lucis usura frui potuisset, aliam Cæliam (8), aliam Fulviam Moratam habuisset. Jam enim puella XII fere annorum Latinæ & Græcæ Grammaticæ, aliarumque artium rudimenta ita peragraverat, ut Latine quædam ex vernaculo sermone convertere, Græcæ declinare & conjugare, precationem Dominicam Hebraicè recitare, poetarum versus scandere, Arithmeticos numeros addere & subducere, Musicas melodias artificiosè canere, testudinem tractare posset. Hanc Matthias frater, puer septem annorum non longe secutus est, qui qua fuit naturalis indole præditus, sororem paucis annis superasse videtur.'

I lost in my daughter Barbara a faithful manager of my family concerns; and you both lost, in her, a companion of your studies, whom if heaven had thought fit to spare, we should have had in her another Cælia, and an other Fulvia Morata. For, though but a girl of twelve years of age, she had made such a progress in Latin and Greek, and other sciences, that she could translate some things out of the vulgar tongue into Latin, decline and conjugate Greek, repeat the Lord's prayer in Hebrew, scan poetry, add and subtract in arithmetic, sing according to the rules of music, and handle the lyre. Her brother Matthias, a boy of seven years of age, came not far behind her, who had so great a genius, that, in a few years, he would have surpassed his sister. The moment he waked in a morning, he went of his own accord to his books, and skillfully drew either maps, or towns, or men, or animals: he so studiously exercised himself in the tables of Pythagoras, that you were wont, in commendation of his youthful and forward genius, to preserve his handy-work; whilst I promised myself every thing from his growing wit. It would be injustice, and a kind of inhumanity, to reproach this good father with weakness, in seeking consolation by informing the public of these little particulars of his family.

[D] He published many books. The first of all was his Liber Tristium, or the elegies, which I have mentioned above (9). Among the rest, I shall only point out his supplement to the history of Paulus Emilius and Ferron down to the year 1569; his Logica Jurisconsultorum; a Latin translation of the travels of Forbisher, and of the African war, in which Don Sebastian, king of Portugal, was killed; his orations of Cicero perpetuis Notis Logicis, Arithmetici, Ethicis, Politicis, Historicis, Antiquitatis illustratæ, in three volumes 8vo, at Basil, 1583. See the rest in the abridgment of Gefner, and in Melchior Adam.

(9) In remark [B].

FROISSARD (JOHN), born at Valenciennes, canon and treasurer of Chimai in Hainault, flourished in the XIVth century [A]. His chief work is a history, which reaches from the year 1326 to the year 1399 (a). He took care to be well informed of things, and for that purpose went to the courts of several princes (b), either to collect memoirs, or to hear those discourse, who had had the management of affairs. He deserved no less fame in quality of a poet, than in that of a historian; yet few people know his poems. Mr Menage was unacquainted with them; he, whose memory was filled with that sort of works, and with an infinite number of other things. If he had known, that Froissard had made a great number of love verses, he would have put him in the list he has published of the ecclesiastics, who have employed their wit in that kind of poetry [B]. Mr Moreri should not have affirmed, that John Sleidan has translated Froissard into Latin [C]. He has committed some faults, which shall be mentioned in the first remark.

(a) Vossius de Histor. Lat. pag. 543. Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. p. 503, is mistaken in making that history begin in the year 1355. La Popelinière Histoire des Histoires, p. 434, makes it begin in 1335.

(b) See some curious particulars about it in Bollart, Académie des Arts & des Sciences, Tom. I, pag. 125.

[A] He flourished in the XIVth century. I cannot imagine how Vossius could mistake here: he owns, that Froissard stayed a long while in the court of the princess Philippa, daughter of the earl of Hainault, and wife of Edward III, king of England (1). Should he not then have looked upon him as an old man in the beginning of the XVth century (2)? why then does he say, that Froissard began to be famous under the reign of the emperor Rupert, that is, after the year 1400? we must take notice, that Froissard went to present the first books of his history to the princess Philippa, wife of Edward III. Mr Moreri, deceived by Vossius, places this historian in the XVth century. La Croix du Maine is in the other extrem, in making him flourish in the year 1326, seven years before he was born (3). Mr Moreri is the more inexcusable, in that he says, that this author dedicated his chronicle to Edward III, king of England: for every body knows, that that monarch died an old man, in the year 1377. Besides, as Mr Moreri himself acknowledges, that this chronicle reaches to the year 1400, it is plain, that he does not express himself right, as to that dedication.

[B] Mr Menage would have put him in the list he has published of ecclesiastics, who have written love verses. For the very title of Froissard's poems would have informed him, that they were very proper to be inserted in that list. Here is what we find in Pasquier (4). He who, I find, did greatly advance that new poetry (5), was John Froissard, who did also present us with that long history, we have of him, from Philip de Valois to the year 1400. And I wonder he hath not been commended for this quality of poet: for I have formerly seen, in the library of the great king Francis, at Fontainebleau, a great volume of his poems, whose title was this. ‘You are to know, that in this book are contained several sayings or treatises of love and morality, which the Sieur John Froissard, priest and canon of Canay, and native of the town of Valentines, in the county of Hainault, has dictated and composed, with the help of God and love, for the contemplation of several nobles and worthies, and began to make them in the year of grace 1362, and closed them in the year of grace 1394. The Paradise of Love, The Temple of Honour, A Treatise in Praise of the Month of May, The Dazie, Several amorous Lays, Pastourels, The Amorous Prison, Royal Songs to the Honour of our Lady, The Dictate of the Amorous Spinnet, Ballad, Virelaix, and Rondeaux, The Plea of the Rose, and of the Violet. I thought fit to quote, word for word, this title; because since that time, our poetry consisted mostly in that kind of delicacies. The list of Mr Menage is in the second tome of the Anti-Bailet (6).

[C] Mr Moreri should not have affirmed that Sleidan translated Froissard into Latin. Sleidan contented himself with abridging Froissard; and, because that historian is very prolix, and full of unnecessary circumstances, it happened, that Sleidan, having picked out only useful things, reduced a large volume into a pocket-book. I have not at present in my hands that Latin abridgment; wherefore I shall make use of the French translation, to quote a passage out of the preface which will acquaint my reader with Froissard's method. ‘It is true, the French volume is very large; but I dare affirm, that, in this abridgment, I have left out no passage, contained in the said volume, that deserves to be related, or known. The reason is, because the author recounts at large every thing; and, to speak the truth, he dwells sometimes too long, and is very redundant when he describes the preparations of war, skirmishes, single combats, the storming of places, the discourses and conversations of princes. Now because the recital of such things is of no great moment, I thought there was no need to insert them, dwelling only on what is most material, and in which lies the advantage, which we ought to expect from that reading.’

(6) Pag. 334, seq.

La Popelinere accuses Froissard of bestowing too many praises on the English (§ a), and too few on the French; because the latter did not pay for his labours, whereas he received a good salary from the former (c).

[§ a] I have not observed, that the Gothic editions of this historian, Paris, for John Petit, without date, and for Antony Verard, Paris likewise, and also without date, are at bottom different from those of Denys Saulvage, Lyons 1559, and Paris 1574; but these latter are neither faithful, nor exact, the plain language of the author not even appearing in it *. As the French accuse Froissard of partiality for the English nation, they have here and there maimed his history; notwithstanding which, an entire manuscript of it, adorned with beautiful miniatures, is preserved in the library of St Elizabeth in the town of Breslaw. 'Non nego magnam pi-clurum elegantiam esse: (says a learned man, speaking of this manuscript) Sed majora hic sunt, quæ animum meum afficiunt. Putat Orbis eruditus se textum Froissardi egregie possidere, quem Dionysius Salvagius Regis Henrici II. jussu quinquagesimo nono superioris seculi anno Lugduni publicavit; sed fœde decipitur, dum codex hic imposturam detegit, & Salvagii manu omnia quæ Aulæ Gallicæ displicebant, deleta, vixque decimam historiæ partem integram relictam esse manifestum reddit. — I do not deny, that the miniatures are elegant; but there is something of more importance, which I am concerned at. The learned world think they are in possession of the text of Froissard, which Denys Saulvage, by order of Henry II, published at Lyons in 1559; but they are shamefully imposed upon, since this manuscript detects the fraud, and makes it plainly appear, that the passages, which displeased the French court, were struck out by Saulvage himself, and scarce an entire

FRONTO (MARCUS CORNELIUS) (a), a great orator, was chosen, by reason of his eloquence, to teach the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus rhetoric (b). This procured him the honour of the consulship, and the erection of a statue [A]. Gravity was the character of his eloquence [B]. He had a vast erudition, and a great mastery of the Latin Tongue (c). There was a sect of those, who took him for the pattern of perfect eloquence, and who were called Frontoniani (d).
It may be proved, by an inscription (e), that his descendants were honoured with the consulship: Neither is it improbable, that the civilians, of the name of Fronto (f), mentioned in the Pandects, descended from him: But there is no proof, that the orators of the same name belonged to Aquitain, and in particular to Auvergne [C]. Some

[A] The honour of the consulship, and the erection of a statue. Here is a passage of Ausonius in relation to the consulship (1): 'Unica mihi amplectenda est Frontonis imitatio, quem tamen Augusti magistrum sic Consulatus ornavit ut præfectura non eingeret.
Sed Consulatus ille cujusmodi? Ordinario suffectus, bimestri spatii interpositus, in sexta anni parte con-sistens: querendum ut reliquerit tantus orator quibus consulibus gesserit consulatum (2). These words inform us, that Fronto was consul only for two months;
that is, that he was only substituted to the consulship, in the place of one of the ordinary consuls, who either died, or was put out, two months before the year expired. Which made a great difference between the favour of Marcus Aurelius, and that of Gratian; for Ausonius was made ordinary consul by Gratian his disciple. That poet was afraid, lest, by his taking notice of this, in his acknowledgement to Gratian, he should give way to the accusation of comparing himself to Fronto; wherefore he ingeniously obviated that objection. I quote his own words, because they are a proof both of Marcus Aurelius's gratitude towards Fronto, his tutor, and of the great esteem Fronto was in. 'Ecce aliud quod aliquis opponat. In tan-ti te ergo oratoris fatigium gloriosus attollis? Cui talia requirenti respondebo breviter. Non ego me contendo Frontoni, sed Antonino præfero Gratianum (3). — Some one may farther object. What! do you pretend to rival so great an orator? to such a question I briefly reply: I do not cope with Fronto, but prefer Gratian to Antoninus.' Let us give another proof of that gratitude. 'Multum ex his Fron-toni detulit, cui & statum in Senatu petiit, (there is the erection of the statue) Proculum vero usque ad Proconsulatum provexit (4). — He ascribed much of this to Fronto, for whom he demanded of the senate a statue: as for Proculus, he raised him to the proconsulate.' Since Capitolinus takes notice, that Proculus, one of the Grammarians, who had instructed Marcus Aurelius, was raised to the proconsulship, and does not mention Fronto's being advanced to the consular dignity, he must have been ignorant of this last passage: and therefore we may charge him with a fault of omission. Sossipater Charisius quotes a letter which testifies Marcus Aurelius's gratitude: 'Mibi satis abundante honorum est quos mihi cotidiane tribuitis. —
I am thoroughly satisfied with the honours you daily confer upon me. Fronto writes this to the emperor.

— That, after the wit of Quintilian, the flowing periods of Cicero, the gravity of Fronto, and the softness of Pliny, I might learn the alphabet. Macrobius says almost as much, though in not so obliging a manner, with respect to Fronto; for he allots him a dry eloquence: 'Quatuor sunt genera dicendi, says he, copiosum, in quo Cicero dominatur: breve in quo Sallustius regnat: siccum quod Frontoni ad-scribitur: pingue & floridum in quo Plinius secutus quondam, & nunc nullo veterum minor nos-ter Symmachus luxuriatur (6). — There are four kinds of Oratory, the copious, in which Cicero excels; the concise, in which Sallust is chief; the dry, which is ascribed to Fronto; the luxuriant and florid, in which formerly Pliny the younger, and now our Symmachus, inferior to none of the ancients, abounds.
Sidonius Apollinaris gives a very great idea of Fron-to's grave style: 'Nec Frontonianæ gravitatis aut ponderis Apuleiani fulmen æquiparem (7). — Nor do I pretend to equal the thunder of Fronto's gravity, and Apuleius's weight.

[C] There is no proof, that the Orators of the same name belonged to Aquitain, and Auvergne.
Sidonius Apollinaris, in a letter (8) to Leo, counsellor to a king of the Goths (9), speaks thus: 'Suspende perorandi illud quoque celeberrimum flumen quod non solum gentilitium sed domesticum tibi, quod que in tuum pectus per succiduas ætates ab atavo Frontone transfunditur. — Suspend that well-known flow of oratory, so peculiar, not only to your country, but family, and which is transfused into your breast, through successive ages, from your ancestor Fronto.' This proves nothing touching the Fron-to's of Auvergne, tho' Savaro pretends the contrary; for upon these words of the twenty first letter of the fourth book, Hinc avus Fronto blandus tibi, sibi severus, he gives us this remark: 'Fronto ex veteri illa Frontonum familia qui in arte Rhetorica principem locum tenuere, quos sibi suos Aquitania jure vendicat, quantum ex lib. 2. C. de Municipiis & Originariis licet colligere, & ex Epist. 3. lib. 8.
Sidonii Apollinaris. — Fronto, of that ancient family of the Fronto's, who excelled in the art of rhetoric, and whom Aquitain justly claims as her own; as far as we can collect from lib. 2. C. de Municipiis & Originariis, and from epist. 3. lib. 8. of Sidonius Apollinaris.' Tho' it might be proved, that he, to whom that third letter of the eighth book was written, was a native of Auvergne, there would be no reason to conclude, that the orator Fronto, his fourth grand-father, was of the same country.

pretend, that our Fronto is the same, whom Pliny junior mentions, or who is spoken of in the fifty sixth epigram of the first book of Martial. This is attended with some difficulty [D]. One would be greatly to blame not to distinguish him from

FRONTO,

One of our most curious antiquaries, for whom I have an infinite esteem, stops me here for some moments. He assures us (10), that Sidonius Apollinaris makes M. Cornelius Fronto, the greatest orator of his age, descend from the illustrious family of the Fronto's of Aquitaine. . . . Sidonius, (continues he), writing to Aper, (in the twenty first epistle of the fourth book) acquaints him, that Fronto, his grand-father by the mother-side, was of Auvergne, and that he might have served for a pattern to those that are proposed to our imitation. . . . He writes in another letter, which is the third of the eighth book, to another person, and gives him for great grand-father that same Fronto; and tells him, he not only bears his name, but has also inherited his eloquence, which is natural to him, and comes to him, by lineal succession, from that excellent orator. The author adds, I. That there was in Aquitaine, in the time of the emperor Gordian, a family of the name of Fronto, as we learn from the second law of the code de municip. & origin. lib. 10. where a certain A. FRONTO, having, by a settlement of trust, been made free by a woman, who was originally of Aquitaine, and asking whether he should follow the origin of her, who made him a freeman, or of the testator; the emperor answered in favour of her, who made him free, II. That if Emilius Fronto, who has dedicated the monument, of which he gives us the explanation, be not the same Fronto that was made free, we may well suppose, that he is the second great-grandson of M. Cornelius Fronto, who lived under Antoninus the philosopher, and who was his master of rhetoric.

The reader may have seen, in the preface to my project, that there are no writers, on whom I do more freely adventure to make observations, than those, for whom I have a particular esteem: for if I should be shy of proposing my little difficulties to them, it would be a sign that I thought them full of prejudice, which I account a very great fault. I repeat here this caution, which I desire may serve for all other occasions, when the same case shall happen.

In the first place, I shall be very glad, if any body would prove, that the illustrious Cornelius Fronto was of Aquitaine; for that would be a great honour to ancient Gaul, and an ornament to the catalogue of the learned men that are come from thence. But I do not see how this can be proved by the two letters of Sidonius Apollinaris, which have been quoted. One of those letters was written to Aper; and the other to Leo, counsellor to a king. The first shews only, that there had been, in Auvergne, a very honest man, called Fronto, whose daughter was mother of him, to whom Sidonius wrote. The other letter, as far as I can apprehend, doth not say, that that same Fronto of Auvergne, had been the great-grand-father of him, to whom Sidonius speaks. Sidonius makes use of the word atavis, which signifies the father of a grand-father's grand-father; and from thence we may perceive, that the Fronto of the first letter is not the Fronto of the second; for it can hardly happen, that a man should correspond by letter with two friends, the grand-father of one of which is atavis to the other. Besides, it is manifest to me, that the Fronto of the first letter had been dead but a few years: he had had a share in the education of his grand-son (11), and perhaps Sidonius Apollinaris had been acquainted with him. The same cannot be supposed with relation to the Fronto of the other letter; with relation, I mean, to Marcus Cornelius Fronto, tutor to Marcus Aurelius, for it is of him Sidonius speaks. Now Sidonius lived in the Vth century, and Marcus Aurelius in the second. This is my first observation. Here is another: I do not see how Emilius Fronto, who dedicated the monument, could be at the same time A Fronto, made free by a woman of Aquitaine, and have for his great-grand-father, M. Cornelius Fronto; for that orator, on whom his disciple heaped so many benefits, and who was honoured with the consulship, left his family in very good circumstances. His son, grandson, and great grandson, enjoyed the first dignities in Rome (12); and it does not appear how any of his descendants could have been a slave to a woman of Aquitaine, which was a province of the Roman empire.

[D] This is not without some difficulty. He, whom Pliny speaks of, was called FRONTO Catus: He pleaded for Marius Priscus, accused by the Africans. The cause was great and noble, but difficult to maintain; both because Marius was guilty, and because Pliny and Tacitus pleaded against him. Marius's advocate made use of his usual talent, which was, to move compassion in the judges. 'Respondit Fronto Catus deprecatusque est, ne quid ultra re- petundarum legem quaereretur, omniague actionis suae vela vir movendarum lacrymarum peritissimus, quodam velut vento miserationis implevit. . . . (13).

— Fronto Catus replied, and humbly besought the judges to enquire no farther than the law against bribery, and as he had the art of raising compassion, he moved the court to pity the client's cause. Dixit pro Mario rursus Fronto Catus insigniter, utque jam locus ille poscebat, plus in precibus temporis, quam in defensione consumpsit (14).

— Fronto Catus again spoke admirably for Marius, and, as the nature of the cause required, spent more time in drawing the court to pity his client, than in defending him. This cause was tried under Trajan: now our Cornelius Fronto must have reached an extreme old age, if he be the same Fronto Catus, whom we just now mentioned: for there is a space of above forty years between the death of Trajan, and the beginning of Marcus Aurelius's reign, and it cannot be supposed, that Marius's advocate was a young man. Undoubtedly he was one of the most famous orators of that time, when he maintained that cause. Add to this, that his pathetic character does not well agree with the dry and grave eloquence, which distinguished Cornelius Fronto. I believe therefore, that Catanæus is mistaken (15), in affirming, that the Fronto Catus of Pliny is the same Cornelius Fronto, who was Marcus Aurelius's tutor, and whom Juvenal has mentioned in his first satire. Catanæus, I suppose, had in view this verse of Juvenal:

Frontonis platani convulsæque marmora clamant;

Which shews, that that Fronto had a fine house, and that he lent it to those poets, who had a mind to recite their poems. Now, since Juvenal flourished under the reign of Domitian, let the reader judge, if it be likely, that he could speak so of a man, who was raised to the consulship by Marcus Aurelius. According to the most common opinion, this verse of Martial (16),

Clarum militæ Fronto togæque decus,

Fronto the ornament of war and peace, is addressed to the same Fronto, to whose house the poets repaired to read their verses. Now, in this case, methinks it cannot be said, that Martial mentioned our Cornelius Fronto; for I do not find any where, that that orator signalized himself in the army. Some believe, that he, of whom Martial has given so great a character in two words, is the same Fronto, who was consul with Trajan in the hundredth year of Jesus Christ (17). He is not therefore the tutor of Marcus Aurelius, since that prince's tutor enjoyed the consulship only through his pupil's favour. Take notice, that Trajan's colleague in the consulship, the hundredth year of Jesus Christ, was consul for the third time; and that, according to Eusebius's chronicle, Marcus Aurelius's tutor flourished in the year of grace 164. Therefore these are two different persons according to all appearance, let the Jesuit, who has commented upon A. Gellius, in usum Delphini (18), say what he pleases to the contrary. How came he not to perceive, that Ausonius would not have looked upon the consulship of two months, bestowed by Marcus Aurelius on his tutor, as a signal favour, if that tutor had been ordinary consul a long time before, and that FRONTO, a Roman consul, under the emperor Nerva. He uttered a very solid apophthegm [E]. Some pretend, that our christians [F]. He was not contented to teach Marcus Aurelius rhetoric, but gave him that too with a great emperor? I observe, that our Fronto out-lived his consulship; which appears by Aulus Gellius (19), who mentions him as a consular man, speaking of the visit he made him with Favorinus. The Delphin scholiast supposes, that Aulus Gellius, in the eighth chapter of the nineteenth book, speaks of that Fronto, who signalized himself, both in war, and at the bar, under Domitian; that is, of the same Fronto, mentioned by Martial. I do not think so; I believe Aulus Gellius speaks still of him, who taught M. Aurelius rhetoric, and consequently that he does not speak of a Fronto, who from Domitian's time was a great soldier, and a great scholar. William Grotius believes, that he, whom Favorinus and Aulus Gellius went to see, is the tutor of Marcus Aurelius; but he makes him consul in the sixth year of Severus (20), that is, the year of grace 199. Which error is very gross, since that consulship was a favour from M. Aurelius; and besides, it is most false, that our Fronto was alive in the year 199. Was he not the first and most famous orator at Rome in the reign of Hadrian? Ἀλέξανδρος καὶ Κορνήλιος Φρόντων, ὁ τὰ πρῶτα τῶν τότε Ῥωμαίων ἐν δίκαις φερύμενος, ἰσχυρὰς κατὰ βασιλεὺς ἀπὸ δεινῶν οἰκασθεῖς ἱστῶν καὶ μαζῶν παρὰ τινος ὃ συνηγορήσειεν ὑπὸς χροῦ, δικάζειν αὐτὸν, ἐν τῇ τῇ σολῇ τῇ διπνίτιδι ὡς πέρ εἶχε ἐς τὸ δικάσθαι αὐτὸν κολληθεῖς. Fuit & Cornelius Fronto magnæ autoritatis, qui in agendis causis Romæ primum locum obtinebat. Hic cum vespere à cœna ferò domum rediisset, intellexissetque ex eo cui patrociniū pollicitus erat, principem jus reddere, veste cenatoria indutus, ut erat, in jus venit (21). — Cornelius Fronto was likewise of great authority, who was the most famous orator at Rome. This man, returning home late from an entertainment, and, being informed by one of his clients, that the emperor was sitting upon causes, went into court, just as he was then dressed. He was, then, at least forty years old, when that prince died, in 138.

[E] He uttered a very solid apophthegm. It is a great misfortune, said he, to live under an emperor, who will suffer no body to do any thing, but it is still a greater misfortune to be under a prince, who allows every body to do what they please. The abridger of Dion has preserved us this sentence (22); but he has so interrupted the thread of the narration, that one must divine to know to what purpose the consul Fronto spoke so. It was, in all appearance, when he saw, that, to remedy the disorders, which informers had caused under Domitian, other excesses were committed, which occasioned a greater confusion. It is probable the thing happened thus: informers were strictly called to an account, and severely punished as they deserved. But, under pretence of exterminating that detestable race of men, and those public banes, every one, to get rid of his enemies, accused them of having been informers. The easy temper of Nerva, together with the hatred the people had conceived against the creatures of Domitian, made way for a thousand unjust proceedings; inasmuch that Fronto, comparing Nerva's reign with that of Domitian, found it worse than the other. His apophthegm did some good; for the emperor put a stop to several informations and proceedings (23).

[F] He made a speech against the christians. This is the ground they go upon. The heathen Cæcilius, in the dialogue of Minucius Felix, charges the christians with several abominations, and quotes the testimony of an orator, who was born at Cirtba, a town of Africa; Et de convivio notum est: passim omnes loquuntur: id etiam Cirtensis nostri testatur oratio. — It is well known what is practised in their feasts: every one talks of it: our orator of Cirtba likewise testifies it. They accused the christians of assembling upon certain days to eat together: every one came there without distinction of age or sex; and, when they were elevated with drinking, they flung a morsel of bread to a dog, that was tied to a candlestick. The dog, rushing to the bread, overturned the candlestick, and then, the candle being put out, the two sexes mingled according to the caprice of chance, every man indulging his lust with the first woman he met with in the dark, whether his sister, daughter, or mother. Ad epulas solemniter coeunt, cum omnibus liberis, fororibus, matribus, sexus omnis homines, & omnis ætatis. Illic post multas epulas, ubi convivium cauit, & incestæ libidinis fervor ebrietate exarsit, canis qui candelabro nexus est, factu offusæ ultra spatium lineæ, qua vincitur est, ad impetum & saltum provocatur: sic everso & extincto conficio lumine impudentibus tenebris nexus infandæ cupiditatis involvunt per incertum fortis: &, si non omnes opera, conscientia tamen pariter incesti; quoniam voto univerforum appetitur, quidquid accidere potest in actu singulorum (24). When, in the same dialogue of Minucius Felix, the christian Octavius confutes this impudent calumny; he observes, that the witness, whose testimony had been alledged, was called Fronto; and that he ought not to be quoted as a witness who deposes, but as an orator who inveighs. Sic de isto & tuus Fronto non ut affirmator testimonium facit, sed confisum ut orator aspergit (25). There is therefore no room to doubt, that an orator, named Fronto, made a bitter invective against the christians; but the question is, whether that Fronto, and he who taught Marcus Aurelius rhetoric, are the same. The civilian Francis Baudouin (26) inclines to that opinion, and chuses rather to ascribe that speech to the orator Cornelius Fronto, and tutor of Marcus Aurelius, than to the civilian Papyrius Fronto, mentioned in the Pandects. Rigaltius (27) approves Baudouin's sentiment. Some other commentators, as Wower and Elmenhorst, positively affirm, that the orator Cornelius Fronto, Marcus Aurelius's preceptor, is he who is spoken of in Minucius's dialogue. Mr Daille affirms the same thing without the least hesitation; whereby he settles the true age of Minucius, and clears himself from the anachronism, that was laid to his charge; because, in his narration, he had placed Minucius Felix before Irenæus and Clemens Alexandrinus. I am not ignorant, says he (28), that your

Bellarmin places him after Tertullian; and that the late Rigaltius, not to mention others, is of the same opinion: But I had my reasons to be of another opinion. For that author speaks * of the orator Fronto, a native of Cirtba in Africa, as a man of his time, and a friend to that heathen Cæcilius, whom Octavius, in the same dialogue, converts to christianity. Now it is certain, that Fronto was already living under the first Antoninus, who died in the 161st year of our Saviour; and that he was tutor to Antoninus Verus †, and to Marcus Aurelius ‡, who succeeded the first Antoninus; and lived, one till the 170th year, and the other till the 180th year of our Saviour. I shall observe three things upon all this: I. That it is not certain, that Minucius has spoken * of the orator Fronto, as of a man of his time, and a friend to the heathen Cæcilius; for the words, Cirtensis nostri, may only signify, that Cæcilius, and he to whom he spoke, were of the same country with that orator. A Norman, born sixty years after the death of Malherbe, will make no scruple to quote him, thus; our countryman Malherbe. It is usual for an Englishman or a German, and so of other nations, to quote an author of their respective countries, thus; our such a one; although that such a one has been dead for several ages. When Mr Daille, in the passage I have quoted, says to Father Adam your Bellarmin, he does not mean, that these two jesuits lived at the same time. II. That the expression of Mr Daille, it is certain, that Fronto was already living, under the first Antoninus, does not become a man, who should have remembered, that Fronto held the first rank among the Roman advocates, under the reign of Hadrian (29). III. After all, I embrace Mr Daille's opinion: And I believe, that our Cornelius Fronto is the same, whom Minucius Felix has quoted, and so we know, that he was of Cirtba in Numidia. Let no body object to me, that there is no likelihood, that so able a man, so famous an orator, should have adopted, in a book, the silly stories, and impudent calumnies, which some passionate and ignorant men of that time spread against the christians. Let us judge of those ages by the XVIth and XVIIth centuries. Where are those, who raise with more fury the most false and FUGGER (HULDRIK), born at Augsburg, of a family considerable both for its antiquity and riches [A], deserves a place here, by reason of the inclination he shewed to learning, and his affection for learned men. He had been chamberlain to Pope Paul III, and afterwards embraced the Protestant religion. He spent a great deal of money in collecting the good manuscripts of the ancients, and caused them to be printed; and for that purpose he allowed, for some time, a salary to the learned Henry Stephens. His relations were so incensed against him for spending his estate that way, that they brought an action against him for it, and caused him to be declared incapable of managing his affairs. There are some, who, without taking notice of the repealing of that sentence, observe, that the judgment pronounced against him cast him into such a melancholy, as accompanied him almost to his grave (a). But his epitaph testifies, that he was unshaken at that heavy blow; that he was restored to the enjoyment of his estate; and that he inherited that of his brother [B]. He had fixed his abode at Heidelberg, where he died, being fifty eight years old, in the month of June 1584, bequeathing his library, which was very considerable (b), to the elector Palatine; and a fund for the subsistence of six scholars. He made also some foundations for the poor, as may be seen in his epitaph. He had bought the library of a physician, called Achilles Gasparus, which proved a good bargain; for that physician was a true belluo librorum, if we may believe Melchior Adam (c). Huldric Fugger was not the first of his family, who had a fine library: For we read, in Melchior Adam (d), that Jerom Wolfius, being gone to Augsburg, was there very civilly entertained by ANTONY FUGGER, and that the famous library of JOHN JAMES FUGGER was committed to his care [C]. This JOHN JAMES FUGGER had been a great lover of learning, and caused some writings of James Ziegler to be printed (e). He was particularly esteemed by the cardinal de Granvelle, and wrote often to him. A letter, which he wrote to him in Italian, dated the twenty first of July 1564, was published in 1692 (f).

Beatus Rhenanus gives us a great idea of the magnificence, and good taste of ANTONY and RAYMOND FUGGER. He describes the beauty of their houses, and gardens; where excellent pictures were seen, the most considerable plants that were

(1) Thuan. lib. v, pag. m. 99.

Thuanus relates (1), that, when that emperor changed the government of Augsburg, in the year 1548, he marked the family of the Fuggers among those, which, for the future, should enjoy the dignity of a senator. Here is what the abbot Boirot wrote to Mr Pellisson, when he sent him the copy of a letter taken out of the memoirs of the cardinal de Granvelle: 'He, who wrote it, was one of those Fuggers, illustrious and famous merchants of Augsburg, who little differed in credit and splendor from those, whom an universal commerce, which was altogether noble, and the great riches that attended it, have sometimes raised to the highest employments in republics: He kept a great correspondence with the cardinal, and frequently gave him some very good advice (2).' Rabelais, writing from Rome, in the year 1536, to the bishop of Maillezais, tells him, That, next to the Fourques of Ausburg, Philip Stroff is accounted the richest merchant of Christendom (3). Now the following historical note has been made upon those words of Rabelais. 'The family of the Fouckres, or Fuggers, Fuggerana, is now pretty considerable in Germany, in the diocese of Constance, where they possess the baronies of Kirchberg and Weissenhorn. Their first residence was in the city of Augsburg; and it is about one hundred and fifty years ago that they were the richest merchants in Germany. By the emperor's gratification they were honoured with the dignity of barons, in the year MDX, in the persons of Raymond Povere, baron of Kirchberg and Weissenhorn, and of Antony Fugger, whose grandson was James, bishop and prince of Constance, in the year 1604. That which gives the greatest lustre to that house, is, that it is allied with the best families in Germany, viz. with the counts of Zollern, Schwartzemberg, Eberleyn, Koningseck, Montfort, Ottingen, and Trucses, with the barons of Madruce, the counts of 'Lodron, and others, the most illustrious in Bavaria.'

Hippolitus à Lapidè (4) observes, that the Fuggers were honoured with the quality of counts, but that they never were inserted in the rolls of the empire till the year 1582. I have seen a book in High-Dutch, printed in the year 1560, containing the prints of those of that family, both men and women, with a little discourse upon every one of them. The first mentioned there is JAMES FUGGER, called the Old, who died the fourteenth of March 1469. All the genealogies of Germany mention this illustrious family; tho' they do not scruple to own, that it is descended from a weaver, who, in the year 1370 (5), obtained the freedom of Augsburg, and was of the village of Gengen, within half a league of that city (6).

[B] His epitaph testifies, that he was unshaken and that he succeeded to his brother's estate. The reader may believe as much of it as he pleases; for the friends of a deceased person generally make no great scruple of an officious lie. Here is what they affirm in it. Apud Fridericum III. electorem Palatinum fortuna constantia & equanimitate superavit. Suis interea repositus, fraternis quinetiam bonis auctior, eundem in re lauta quem afflicta vultum animumque retinuit. See Mr Teiffier (7).

[C] Wolfius was intrusted with the care of the famous library of J. J. FUGGER. Wolfius made some Greek verses, wherein he testifies, that that library, furnished with as many books as there are stars in the firmament, was a place, where he spent whole days, gathering flowers and fruits, diverting and instructing himself; and that he preferred it to every other:

FULGINAS, or DE FULGINEO (SIGISMUND), is reckoned among the learned men of the XVth century. He has written the history of what passed in his time. Felinus (a) refers his readers to it, concerning the differences of Sixtus IV. with Ferdinand king of Naples. Vossius might have known better, than by that quotation, in what time Fulginas lived, if he had minded the first chapter of the sixth book of the Geniales Dies of Alexander ab Alexandro; where we learn, that the latter had, from his youth, contracted a great friendship with Fulginas, a learned man, very much employed by the Popes, and who stole as much time as he could from his business, either to read good books, or to write the annals of his time. The idea which is given us of his riches, and of his table, is very mean [A], and very much inferior to that of his wit and learning. He made some Latin verses upon the death of Bartholomew Platina, wherein he takes the title of Apostolic Secretary: They were published at the end of the works of Platina, who died in the year 1481. I only take notice of this, that my reader may the better know in what time Fulginas lived. He is little known by Bibliographers.

I have sometimes supped with him there, at a sober and moderate repast, and agreeable to the times; and, as he was himself of a courteous and easy disposition, so he gave us an easy entertainment, not consisting of delicacies; for the bill of fare was, asparagus dressed with vinegar and pepper, and warm sauce, and a mess of gourd, with the juice of unripe grapes, and swimming in sauce; on which he fed very freely: he added likewise pears and peaches, of wonderful fragrance. FULVIA, a Roman lady, who discovered Catiline's conspiracy. See the remark [D], of the following article.

FULVIA, wife of Marc Anthony, had nothing of her sex but the body (a); for her spirit and courage led her to war, and public affairs. After the battle of Philippi, wherein Brutus and Cassius were defeated by Octavius and Marc Anthony, the latter passed into Asia to settle the affairs of the East. Octavius returned to Rome, and soon fell out with Fulvia: Nor could the quarrel be decided but by the sword. That woman took up arms, and caused Lucius Antonius, her husband's brother, to take them up too [A]. This preposterous step was only favourable to Octavius, who gained a full

[A] That woman took up arms, and caused Lucius Antonius, her husband's brother, to take them up too. This ought to be understood in the most literal sense, since it is certain that she was seen with a sword by her side. She was not contented to retire to Præneste, and to make it her place of arms; she not only called thither the senators, and knights of her party, held councils with them, and published several proclamations, according to the exigency of affairs, but she likewise armed herself personally; she gave the word to the soldiers, and harangued them on several occasions: καὶ τὴ ταῦτα θανύσσειν ἐν τῇ ἐπὶ τοῦ καὶ εἰς τὸ παραδόντι, καὶ συνδήματα τοῖς στρα-τίταις ἐδίδου, ἐδιδυμήγει τε ἐν αὐτοῖς πολλὰκι. Id quidem mirandum adeo non est quum gladio etiam se accinxerit ipsa, tessera militibus dederit, særian, who tells us these things, says, that, in the year 713, Publius Servilius and Lucius Antonius had the name of consuls, and that the latter and Fulvia were so in effect. He gives us afterwards to understand, that Lucius Antonius had no authority, but through Fulvia's means; and that it was she, who procured him the honour of the triumph: for he could not obtain the same, till he had engaged her, by his submission and cringing, to stir in his favour. And indeed she took more pride in that triumph, than the triumpher himself (2). It is not amiss to see what Plutarch says of Fulvia (3): Φουλκίαν ἀγόμενος τὴν Κλωδίαν τῷ θυμαγωγῷ συνοικήσαν, ἡ ταλασίαν, ἐδὲ οἰκίαν προὖν γύναιον, ἐδὲ ἀνδρὸς ἰδίωτι κρατεῖν ἀξίον, ἀλλὰ ἀρχοντος ἀρχεῖν, καὶ στρατηγόντος στρατηγεῖν βυλομένων. ὥς τε Κλεοπάτραν διδασκάλια Φουλκίαν τῆς Ἀντωνίου γυναικοκρασίας a full victory over his enemies; whereupon Fulvia retired into Greece, and there died of a sickness, occasioned by her grief [B]. She left two sons (b). Womanish passions had a share in the war she raised against Octavius [C]. She had two husbands before the married Marc Antony: The first was Clodius, that great and mortal enemy of Cicero; the second was Curio, who was killed in Africa, in Cæsar's cause, before the battle of Pharfalia. It is not true, that she had been married to Catiline [D]. She γυναικροκράσιας ορεῖσθαι, πάλιν χειροῦν καὶ πεπαιδαγωγημένον ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ἀκροῦσθαι γυναικῶν, παραδόντων αὐτὸν. Fulviam Clodii, plebis concitatoris, viduam (4) uxorem duxit, mulierem non ad lanificium aut ad rei familiaris administrationem factam, neque in virum contentam dominari privatim, sed quæ imperanti imperare et ducem volebat ducere: ut mercedem Fulviæ, quod ancillari Antonium docuisset fœminis, debuerit Cleopatra, quæ plane cicurem atque à tyrocinio institutum ad obtemperandum mulieribus recepit. Here is a woman, who, bating chastity, was not unlike the Camilla of Virgil.

The distaff, and domestic cares, were none of her business; neither was she contented to domineer over her husband at home; she was also ambitious to lord it over him abroad, that is, with respect to his great public employments. Cleopatra found no great difficulty in reducing him under obedience to a woman; for he had learned that submission in a good school.

[B] She died in Greece of a sickness, occasioned by her grief. Marc Antony, being informed of the disorders in Italy, set forward thither, to remedy them; and, being arrived at Athens, he found there his wife, who had been forced to fly out of Italy. He blamed extremely the authors of that war, that is, Lucius Antonius, Fulvia, and Manius (6). When he continued his journey, he left Fulvia sick at Sicyon (7), where she died some time after. The news of it was brought to her husband, during the siege of Brundisium, in the year 714, and it is likely he received it with joy, for he had been extremely incensed against her; and though he knew, at his departure from Sicyon, that she was fallen sick, because he had child her, he would never go to see her, which hastened the death of that proud woman (8).

[C] Womanish passions had a share in the war she raised against Octavius. The daughter, that she had by Clodius, was married to Octavius, who soon after put her away, swearing he had not consummated the marriage; which oath was enough to incense Fulvia. A mother's fondness suffers very much by the thought that her daughter bears the name of wife, without the reality; wherefore Fulvia could not think on the divorce of her dear child without grief: she saw her deprived of the substantial pleasures of marriage, which was a sign of extreme contempt for Octavius was of a very amorous constitution. She was not ignorant, that few people would give credit to Octavius's oath; and therefore, that her daughter, thus despised by her husband, so far as to preserve her virginity for some time, would nevertheless pass for a person, that could afford nothing but the leavings of a first husband. Fulvia might also consider, that Octavius was come into her alliance with a spirit of distrust, which had made him forbear enjoying his wife, that, according to what course affairs should take, he might be at liberty to send her away, and to affirm, upon oath, that he had not touched her. Dion (9) observes, that, when Octavius made this oath, he was little concerned, whether the people would believe, that he had kept so long this young lady at his house, without meddling with her, or whether they would think, that he had obtained from her, to make way for his divorce. These captious and political precautions are not pleasing to a mother, and consequently a womanish passion may well have had a share in the design, which Fulvia formed, of making war upon Octavius. Here is another passion of the same kind. Fulvia knew her husband to be enslaved to the fair Cleopatra; jealousy prompted her to draw Marc Antony from that new engagement; and she easily believed those who told her, that her unfaithful husband would never return to her whilst Italy was quiet (10), but that a war in Italy would soon oblige him to return. Whereupon Fulvia carried things to extremity against Octavius (11). But if Augustus's epigram, which is among those of Martial, were an historical account (12), we might then boldly affirm, that womanish passions engaged Fulvia in that war.

[D] It is not true, that she had been married to Catiline. The reason Glandorpius uses to confute this (13), seems to me very good. He borrows it from the second Philippic of Cicero. Cujus (P. Clodii) quidem te fatum sicuti C. Curionem manet, quoniam id domi tue est, quod fuit illorum atrique fatale. Cicero means, that Marc Antony, having at home the same wife, which had been fatal to Clodius and to Curio, would not fail to have a fatal end, as they had had. He repeats the same thought at the end of the oration: 'Eripiet & extorquebit tibi ista populus Romanus: utinam salvis nobis: sed quæ modo nobiscum egeris, dum istis consiliis uteris' non potes (mihi crede) esse diuturnus. Etenim ista tua minime avara conjux, quam ego sine contumelia describo, nimium debet diu populo Romano tertiam pensionem (14). — The Roman people will snatch and extort this from you: I wish, with our safety: but deal how you will with us, whilst you pursue these councils, believe me, you cannot long hold it. For that wife of yours, a woman not at all greedy after wealth, whom I describe without contumely, is too long indebted a third payment to the Roman people. It is plain to every body, that, if Fulvia had been married to Catiline, the tragical death of that husband would have been joined, in Cicero's oration, with that of the other two: both general and particular reasons would have engaged the orator not to forget Catiline upon that occasion. The error, Glandorpius confutes, may proceed from not attending to the circumstances of a narrative, which is in Sallust. That historian informs us, that a great lady, (15), named FULVIA, discovered Catiline's conspiracy. One of the accomplices, who had for a long time had a criminal commerce with her, had, by his freaks and rhodomontades, given her occasion to find out the plot. He had, it seems, spent all he had, and thereupon the lady grew extreme cold towards him. To warm her again, he boasted, on the sudden, of what he would do for her; promised her mountains of gold; adding swaggering to his boasting, and threatening to kill her, if she did not comply with his desires. She penetrated into the causes of these new bravadoes, and informed several persons of what she had learned touching Catiline's designs. 'Erat ei (2. Curio) cum Fulvia, muliere nobili, stupri vetus consuetudo, cui cum minus gratus esset, quod inopia minus largiri poterat, repente glorians, maria, montesque polliceri cepit, minari interdum ferro, nisi sibi obnoxia foret: postremo, ferocius agitare, quam solitus erat. At Fulvia, insolentia Curii caussa cognita, tale periculum reipublicæ haud occultum habuit; sed, sublato auctore, de Catilinæ conjuratione, quæ quo modo audierat, compluribus narravit (16).'

It is probable several readers have mistaken here one for the other, and believed, that it was Catiline, who kept Fulvia (17). After this mistake, nothing was more natural than to say, that Catiline was betrayed by Fulvia his mistress, or his concubine; and afterwards it was not difficult to proceed so far, as to give out, that his wife Fulvia discovered the conspiracy. Those, who were acquainted with the wickedness of Marc Antony's wife, may easily have imagined, that she was capable of all that is ascribed to the other Fulvia, and so they may have reduced those two Fulvias into one. I must add in this place, the better to make the mistress of Curio known, that she had so much discretion and faithfulness towards her gallant, as not to reveal, that he was one of the accomplices, or that she had learned from him what was contriving against the republic; neither did she

(17) He who made the Index of Sallust Variorum has committed the Fault. Fulvia, says he, nobilis mulier cum qua Catiline vetus stupri consuetudo fuerat, conjurationem ejus clam noctu profecta Cicero detexit.

She had the pleasure of gratifying her revenge on Cicero's tongue [E], which had so much abused her husband in the Philippics. They, who say she was Marc Antony's first wife, are mistaken [F]. If they had had the patience to examine things exactly, they break with him; but, on the contrary, it seems she was more intimate with him than before. They made use of her, to win her gallant by a thousand fair promises (18); and Curius employed her to discover to Cicero the designs of the conspirators: Curius ubi intelligit quantum periculum Consuli impendat, prope per Fulviam Cicero dolum qui parabatur enunciat (19). So true it is, that every thing is of use in a government; and that, in particular, courtizans and ladies of intrigue sometimes do the public great service by their address of searching out the most important secrets. It is true, that by this means they sometimes ruin the affairs of their country, by revealing the secrets of the cabinet to a liberal enemy. But such is the condition of human things, that what may be hurtful, may also be useful. I cannot tell whether the Fulvia, mentioned by Valerius Maximus, is the same that Sallust speaks of. Glandorpius is not far from that opinion; but others rather ascribe this adventure to our Fulvia, so much are they inclined to believe her capable of all manner of disorders. However it be, here is the whole story. An officer of the tribunes of the people gave a feast to his masters, and to the consul Metellus Scipio, and entertained them with an infamous diversion: he brought into their company two Roman ladies, who had each of them fathers and husbands; one of them was called Mucia, and the other Fulvia. Æque flagitiosum illud convivium quod Gemellus tribunicius viator ingenui sanguinis sed officii intra servilem habitum deformis, Metello Scipioni consuli ac tribuni plebis magno cum rubore civitatis comparavit. Lupanari enim domi suæ instituto Muciam & Fulviam, tum à patre tum à viro utramque abductam, & nobilem puerum Saturninum in eo prostituit (20). Metellus Scipio's consulship falls in the year 701 of Rome, eleven years after Catiline's conspiracy: now how is it likely, that Sallust's Fulvia should have, at that time, both father and husband? our Fulvia was then prosecuting the revenge of Clodius; and Milo, who had murdered Clodius, was tried for it in the year 701. How is it then likely, that his widow should be married again under that consul? we know besides, that, in 696, her father was dead, and her mother married again to Murena (21).

[E] She had the pleasure of gratifying her revenge on Cicero's tongue.] She strangely seconded her cruel husband, during the massacres of the triumvirate; and, of her own head, either through avarice, or a spirit of revenge, she caused to be put to death several persons, some of whom were not so much as known to her husband. Marc Antony caused the heads of those, he had proscribed, to be brought to him, while he was at table, and entertained his eyes a long while with that sad spectacle. Cicero's head being one of those, that were brought to him, he ordered it to be placed on the very pulpit, where Cicero had made so many speeches against him. But, before this order was put in execution, Fulvia took that head, spit upon it, and, putting it in her lap, drew it's tongue, which she pricked several times with her bodkin, and at the same time uttered a thousand bitter invectives against Cicero. Ἡ δὲ δὴ Φουλμία ἐξ τῆς τὰς χεῖρας αὐτὴν πρὶν ἀποκομίσθηναι, ἐδίζητο καὶ ἐμπικραμένην οἱ καὶ ἐμπύσσα ἀπὶ τὰ γόνατα ἐπέθηκε, καὶ τὸ εἶμα αὐτῆς διόισα τὴν τε γλῶσσαν ἐξέκλυσε, καὶ ταῖς βελόλαις αἷς ἐς τὴν κεφαλὴν ἐχρήτο κατεκνύντσα πολλὰ ἄμα καὶ μισὰ προσετίσινε πύσσα. Fulvia autem id caput acceptum priusquam auferretur, insulansque amarulentis verbis & conspuens, genibus suis imposuit: orique ejus aperto linguam extraxit acubus quales secum comendi capitis causa mulieres ferunt compinxit, additis crebris ac turpibus opprobriis (22). Here is a strange sort of a wicked woman! there are some villains, whom we are in a manner forced to admire, because they shew a kind of greatness of soul in their very crimes; but here we see nothing but brutality, meanness, and baseness, and we cannot but be moved with indignation and contempt. Nevertheless Mr Moreri acquaints his readers, that it is affirmed, that Fulvia had some generosity.

VOL. III.

[F] They, who say she was Marc Antony's first wife, are mistaken.] Mr Moreri and Mr Chevreau have committed this fault; the first in the article of Marc Antony, and the other in his History of the World, page 105 of the second tome of the edition of Holland. Marc Antony's first wife was called Fadia, whom he married, because she was a fortune, without regarding, that her father was as contemptible by the blemishes of his person, as by the meanness of his extraction. Tuæ conjugis bonæ feminae, locupletis quidem certe, Bambalio quidam pater, homo nullo numero. Nihil illo contemptius, qui propter hæsitantiam linguæ, stuporemque cordis, cognomen ex contumelia traxerit. At avus nobilis, Tuditanus nempe ille qui cum palla & cothurnis nummos populo de rostris spargere solebat. Vellem hanc contemptionem pecunie suis reliquisset. — One Bambalis, a man of no account, is father of your wife, a very good woman, at least a rich one. Nothing can be more despicable than that man, who, by reason of an hesitation of speech, and stupidity, owes his very name to contempt. But his grandfather was noble, to wit, that Tuditanus, who, in his robes and buskins, used to sling money from the rostra among the people. I wish his posterity inherited this contempt of money. This is what Cicero advances in his third Philippic, at page 782 of my edition cap. VI. A little after he affirms, that this wife of Marc Antony was daughter to a freedman (23): Ipse ex libertini filia suscepit liberos. He had said the same thing towards the beginning of the second Philippic: Hoc idcirco commemoratum à te puto, ut te infimo ordini commendares: cum te omnes recordentur libertini generum, & liberos tuos, nepotes Q. Fadii (24) libertini hominis fuisse. — This I suppose you mentioned, to ingratiate yourself with the mob; since every one remembers, that you are son-in-law to a freedman, and that your sons are grandsons of Q. Fadius, a freedman. Glandorpius (25) has reason to suspect, that Marc Antony and Fadia's children were not long-lived, since neither Cicero, nor any other writer, mention them by their names. We only know, that the hostage, sent by Marc Antony to Cæsar's murderers, was son of Marc Antony and Fadia; for Cicero will not suffer us to doubt of it: Pacem haberemus quæ erat facta per obsidem puerum nobilem Marci Antonii filium, M. Bambalionis nepotem (26). Glandorpius has been strangely mistaken, in believing, that Bambalio was Fulvia's father, and that the passage of the third Philippic does not wholly relate to Fadia. This false conceit has occasioned his rash censuring Maturantius, for not having divided between two wives of Marc Antony the words of Cicero: Ex iis quæ retulimus quivis facile perspexerit quam probe Franciscus Maturantius, vir aliquo doctissimus, Fadiæ Bambalionem patrem tributau, eamque fuisse Tusculanam asserat. Deinde quæ Cicero Philipp. 3. de Fulvia seorsim & Fadia dicuntur, ipse cuncta miscens ad unam Fadiam omnia referat (27). — From what I have related it is manifest with how little ground Francis Maturantius, otherwise a very learned man, makes Bambalis the father of Fadia, and asserts, that she was of Tusculum. Lastly, what Cicero, in his third Philippic, says of Fulvia and Fadia distinctly, he confounds, and applies wholly to Fadia. Maturantius is in the right in all this; and I cannot sufficiently wonder how Paulus Manucius could believe, that these words of the third Philippic, at avus nobilis, &c. relate to Fulvia. If they did, there would be reason to say, that Cicero has put his words and thoughts in a very ill order: But if we consider it never so little, we shall plainly see, that Cicero reproaches Marc Antony only with his marriage with Fadia. He observes I. That that woman's father was a man of the meanest extraction: II. He raises an objection to himself, viz. that that woman's grand-father was nobly born: III. He relates the public extravagancies and follies of that grand-father. There had been nothing more ridiculous, than to suppose, with relation to the marriage with Fulvia, that, if Marc Antony did not marry beneath himself, it was because Fulvia's grandfather, by the mother's side, was nobly born. Now it is plain, that, if the objection, which Cicero proposes to himself, relates to the marriage with Fulvia, the proof of Marc Antony's not having married beneath himself, would be grounded on the noble extraction of the maternal grand-father of his wife (28): and therefore it is not credible, that the objection relates to that marriage. I have said, that it had been very ridiculous to have had recourse to the nobility of Fulvia's maternal grand-father, to clear Marc Antony from marrying beneath himself, which I thus easily prove. Fulvia was of one of the most ancient and illustrious families of Rome. The Fulvii traced their origin to a disciple of Hercules in matters of religion. This was Fulvia's nobility. Glandorpius should not have thrust her father out of the family of the Fulvii: that woman had a brother, who was really of that ancient family, and who was made high-priest by the interest of Clodius his sister's husband (29), and whose wife was married again to Murena (30). It is from Cicero we learn all this: 'Te ad tuum affinem non delectum à te, sed relictum à cæteris contulisti, quem ego tamen credo, si est ortus ab illis, quos memorie proditum est, ab ipso Hercule perfundo jam laboribus sacra didicisse, in viri fortis ærumnis, non ita crudelem fuisse, ut Ecce (31). — You had recourse to your kinsman, not chosen by you, but abandoned by the rest: who, if he be descended from those, who are said to have learned religious rites from Hercules, after his toils were over, would not, I am persuaded, have been so cruel, as to, Ecce. Mult he not have been out of his wits, if he had pretended, that Marc Antony could not have alleged Fulvia's paternal nobility of extraction to those who should have accused him of having married beneath himself?

There remains a considerable difficulty. Asconius Pedianus relates, that the last witnesses that were examined against Milo, the murderer of Clodius, were Sempronia Tuditana, and Fulvia; the latter the widow of Clodius; the other, Fulvia's mother. Ultima testamentum dixerunt Sempronia Tuditani filia, soror P. Clodii, & uxor Fulvia, & fletu suo magnopere eos qui adstant, commoverunt (32). I answer, that this difficulty, how great soever it be, cannot support Manucius's opinion against my objections. Why could not Fadia and Fulvia both descend from one Sempronius Tuditanus? there might be several brothers, and several cousin-germans, who were all called Sempronius Tuditanus; being distinguished only by their fore-names. Fadia's mother might be the daughter of one of them, and Fulvia's mother descend from another. At the worst, I had rather say, that Cicero confounded the maternal grandfather of Fulvia with Fadia's maternal grandfather, than to say, that he looked upon Fulvia as an under-match for Marc Antony. I shall not omit saying, that Glandorpius condemns what he himself is guilty of. He finds fault, that one should understand, of one single wife of Marc Antony, the whole passage of the third Philippic; and yet he applies it entirely to Fulvia; for he pretends, that she was Bambalio's daughter, and Tuditanus's grand-daughter; and so he leaves nothing in Cicero's words, that may suit with Fadia. For the rest, it is a great absurdity to pretend, that Bambalio, a man of the meanest condition (33), should be Fulvia's father. This is no less than to ascribe to Cicero the greatest faults which a writer can commit. For thereby he must have retorted the reproach of an under-match (34), by accusing Marc Antony of having married a lady of the first quality; for that is the character he gives of the family Fulvia (35), when he enquires into an action of Clodius's brother-in-law. This is to say, that he could draw no advantage from the meanness and folly of the father, to form prejudices against the conduct of the son; and that, among so many invectives, which he has uttered against Clodius, he has never reproached him with an alliance, which afforded so much room for satire. Let us conclude from all this, that Glandorpius did not rightly censure Maturantius; and here are new proofs of it. He hath not taken notice of three gross errors of Maturantius on these words of Cicero, At aequi nobilis, Tuditanus nempe ille. Maturantius fancies, in the first place, that that grand-father is Bambalio's grand father (36): 2. that that grand-father was like Tuditanus, but not Tuditanus himself (37): 3. that he was the grand-father of Marc Antony's wife. The last of these three faults is but a few lines distant from the first: so true it is, that authors are apt to contradict themselves in the same page. The reason of it is, because they sometimes bestow all their attention upon each period, so that they cannot think on what goes before.

I am much more concerned for an error, which I have found in Dion. That historian has inserted in his work, a direct speech of Cicero against Marc Antony: of which none can deny but he is himself the author, since we have still Cicero's Philippics, and may convince ourselves, by comparing them with Dion's words, that the speech of the latter is not the translation of any of the Philippics. It is therefore Dion, who has forged the speech. I grant him that liberty; but, at least, he ought to have said nothing that was not taken from Cicero's Latin. Now here are two things, which he has manifestly falsified; I have not examined the rest. He supposes, that Cicero reproached Marc Antony with not having recalled his uncle, neither during Cæsar's life, nor after Cæsar's death; and with loving Bambalio, a man sufficiently defamed by his very name. Τίς γὰρ ἐκ οὐδὲ ταύτῃ ὅτι πολλὰς εὐχόμενος καὶ ἐπὶ τῷ Καίσαρι, καὶ μετὰ ταῦτα ἐν τῶν γενομένων δὴ τῶν ἐκείνου ἀγαθῶν, ἐκ ἐπεκράτησε τῷ δέσπῳ . . . καὶ τὸν Βαμβάδιον τὸν καὶ ἀπ' αὐτῆς τῆς ἐπωνυμίας ἐπὶ τὸν ἀγαθόν. Ἰδὲ vero neminem latet, quod quum multos in exilium missos non Cæsare modo superstiti, sed defuncto etiam, ex libellis scilicet ejus in urbem reduceret, patruo suo non subveniret . . . Bambalionem etiam ipsius cognomen ratione infamem diligit (38). Cicero objected no such thing to his adversary. Does he not expressly say, that Caius Antonius was in the senate, when his nephew made a speech against Dolabella? Cæsar was then alive. Neither did Cicero reproach Marc Antony with being a friend to Bambalio, who, in all probability, was dead. He contented himself to say, that he, who had married the daughter of an inhabitant of Tusculum, the daughter, I say, of Bambalio, so called in contempt, was much in the wrong to alledge, that Octavius's mother was a native of Aricia. Should not these two falsifications make us suspect the truth of a thousand things, which Dion has related, and of which we have not the originals?

[G] Marc Antony had had as many wives, as she husbands. We are going to see, that those, who have said, that Fulvia was Marc Antony's second wife (39), have committed an error not much less than that of Mr Chevreau. Marc Antony's second wife was called Antonia; she was his cousin-german, and daughter of Caius Antonius, Cicero's colleague in the consulship. He did not keep her long: for, upon pretence that she had an amorous intrigue with Dolabella, he put her away. He was not ashamed to publish himself before the senate, and before his father-in-law, the affront his wife had done him; and he mentioned that injury among the reasons, for which he had broke with Dolabella. We must see how Cicero inveighs against him upon that account: Cicero, I say, who pretends, that Antonia was not guilty. 'Omnibus eum (Caium Antonium) contumeliis onerasti, quem patris loco, si ulla in te pietas esset, colere debebas: filiam ejus, sororem tuam, ejecisti, alia conditione quaesita, & ante perspecta. Non est satis, probri infimulasti pudicissimam feminam: quid est, quod alii possit? contentus eo non fuisti: frequentissimo senatu Kalendis Jan. sedente patruo, hanc tibi esse cum Dolabella causam odii dicere ausus es, quod ab eo sorori, & uxori tuæ stuprum esse oblatum comperisses. Quis interpretari potest, impudentiorne, qui in senatu: an improbius, qui in Dolabellam; an impudens, qui patre audiente; an crudelior, qui in illam miseram tam spurce tam impie dixeris (40)? — You have loaded him (Caius Antonius) with all kinds of reproach, II, cap. xxxviii. whom, if you had any piety in you, you ought to regard as a father: you have divorced his daughter, your sister, having before had another match in view.

Neither did he shew much regard to him upon other occasions [H]. As brave, violent, and brutish as he was, yet he found his master in Fulvia; who made him serve so severe an apprenticeship of obedience (c), that Cleopatra, who found him ready broke and tamed, had no great trouble to keep him under. He had at last the resolution to be terribly angry with Fulvia, and to shew her so plainly either his contempt or his hatred, that she fell sick, and died upon it (d). A rhetorician, who had rallied her upon her having one cheek bigger than the other, became thereby more acceptable to Marc Antony than he was before (e); which is a shrewd sign, that she had no great share in her husband's tenderness. She had merited it, if the imitating her husband's eagerness

* Nor is this enough; you have wounded the reputation of a most modest lady. What can be added? This did not satisfy you: in full senate, and in presence of your uncle, on the Kalends of January, you had the assurance to say, that the reason of your hatred to Dolabella was, that you had discovered an intrigue between him, and your sister and wife. Shall I charge you most with impudence, in publishing your fancied disgrace in the senate; with injustice, in imputing it to Dolabella; with immodesty in doing it in the hearing of your father-in-law; or with cruelty, in exposing the character of an unfortunate lady? Plutarch will help us to discover at what time Marc Antony was divorced from his wife Antonia. He says (41), that Dolabella, a tribune of the people, desiring to get some laws enacted, intreated Marc Antony his friend to second him. Marc Antony not only refused it; but, upon suspicion that his wife Antonia had suffered herself to be debauched by Dolabella, he put her away, and took part with the enemies of that tribune, to ruin all his projects. Cæsar returned to Rome, pardoned Dolabella; and, having been made consul for the third time, he associated to himself, in that dignity, Lepidus, and not Marc Antony (42). From this we learn, that Dolabella's troubles happened before the year 707 of Rome (43); and therefore we may place them a year after the battle of Pharsalia, which is also the year of Antonia's divorce. Now Marc Antony having another match in view, before he put away Antonia (44), it is very probable, that his desire of marrying Fulvia was one of the reasons, which occasioned that divorce. If we believe Plutarch, that marriage was contracted whilst Cæsar made war in Africa in the year 707; and so Fulvia is Marc Antony's third wife. It is without any ground, that Glandorpius (45) affirms, that Marc Antony, having put her away, married Antonia; and that, being soon disgusted with the latter, he was divorced from her, and then retook Fulvia.

[H] Neither did he shew much regard to him upon other occasions.] I make this remark, to discharge my promise (46). We have heard Cicero reproaching Marc Antony with having been so barbarous as to set forth Antonia's lewdness in a full senate, that lady's father being present. This was a great mortification for that poor father; but this was not the first time his nephew had used that poor man ill. Had he not left him in banishment, when he recalled a great number of exiles? Cicero did not forget to reproach him with it (47): 'Omnia persequitur quæ Senatus salva repub. ne fieri possent perfecterat: cuius tamen scelus in scelere cognoscite: restituebat multos calamitosos, in his patri nulla mentio. Si severus, cur non in omnes? Si misericors, cur non in suos? — He did every thing, which the senate, before the commonwealth was overturned, had taken care should not be done: yet one vile action, which surpassed the rest, deserves mentioning: he recalled several miserable exiles; but, among these, took no notice of his uncle. If he must be severe, why not towards all; if compassionate, why not towards those of his own family?' There are other unseemly things; Cicero lets them forth, when he mentions a law for recalling exiles, which was published after Cæsar's death, and supposed to be made by him. Cicero asks, among other things, why three or four persons were still left in banishment (48): 'Cur tua misericordia simili non fruentur? Cur eos habes in loco patrii, de quo ferre, cum de reliquis ferres, noluit? Quem etiam ad censuram petendam impulisti, eamque petitionem comparasti quæ et risus hominum & querelas moveret. Cur autem ea comitia non habuisti? An quia tribunus plebis fulmen finitrum nunciabat? Cum tuâ quid interest, nulla suspicia sunt, cum tuorum, tum sis religiosus. Quid! eundem in septemviro nonne destituit? Intervenit enim: Quid metuiti credo? ne salvo capite negare non posses. Omnibus cum contumeliis onerasti quem patris loco, &c. — Why do they not meet with the same compassion from you? Why do you deal with them as you did with your uncle, whom you excepted out of the general law? whom likewise you persuaded to demand the censorship, and procured him such competitors, as excited the laughter and complaint of the people. But why did you not hold that election? Was it because the tribune of the people denounced an unlucky omen? when your own interest is concerned, you disregard omens; when that of your relations, you are then superstitious. What! did you not forsake him likewise as to the septemvirate? you loaded him with all kind of injuries, whom, as a father, &c. You will find above (49) the sequel of this passage. Manucius has found this full of obscurity. Hic mihi, quod aiunt, tenebræ sunt. Non enim video, quo modo C. Antonius Kalendis Jan. vivo Cæsar in senatu esse potuerit: cum eum post Cæsaris interitum, id est, post latam ab Antonio de exsulibus legem, exulare, ex iis verbis intelligatur; cur eos habes in loco patrii? De quo ferre, cum de reliquis ferres, noluit (50). — This is to me very obscure: for I cannot see how Caius Antonius could be in the senate, during Cæsar's life, on the kalends of January; when we understand by these words, cur eos habes, &c. that, after Cæsar's death, that is after Antony's law concerning exiles, he was in banishment. There is, on one side, Caius Antonius neglected by his nephew, when, after Cæsar's death, all the exiles, excepting three or four, are recalled; and, on the other side, he is among the senators, when Marc Antony makes a speech against Dolabella, before Julius Cæsar's death. It is thus Manucius conceives the thing, and therefore it is no wonder he finds some contradictions in it: but it is easy to remove them, by shewing him the cause of his pretended obscurity. He fancies, that, when Marc Antony, after Julius Cæsar's death, alledged a pretended law of that emperor for recalling the exiles, Caius Antonius was left in banishment. This is not what Cicero means; but only that Marc Antony had excluded from the benefit of that pretended law, three or four wretches. Cicero asks him the reason of it: and, to remind him of other faults, he maliciously compares the exception of these three or four persons, with the exception which he, Marc Antony, had made of his uncle during his tribuneship. Why do you use those three or four persons, says he to him, as you did your uncle, whom you did not offer to recall, when you proposed the recalling of others? This ought to be referred to Marc Antony's tribuneship, which he exercised, whilst Cæsar was in Spain, against Pompey's lieutenants, before the battle of Pharsalia. In a word, this is the same thing with what we have seen above in these words of Cicero; Reliquæ partes Tribunatus principis similes. . . restituebat multos calamitosos: in his patrii nulla mentio. We must not therefore wonder that the same Cicero should say, that Caius Antonius heard in the senate-house his nephew's invectives against Dolabella, in which his daughter was so invidiously mentioned. I own that this is a proof of his being returned from banishment before Cæsar's death, since that invective was publicly spoken, to hinder the design Cæsar had formed of resigning his fifth consulship to Dolabella. Επει δὲ τὸ σέμπτον ἀπεδείχθη Καίσαρ ὑπατεύων, περσέλειτο μὲν εὐδὺς συνάρχοντα τὴν Ἀντωνίον, ἐβέλετο δὲ τὴν ἀρχὴν ἀπειπάμενον Δολοβέλλα παρρησιάζουσαι. καὶ τὸτο πρὸς τὴν σύγκλητον ἐξήνεγκεν. eagerness to get money, by the most unjust means, could have made her worthy of it. It was in Fulvia's chamber that kingdoms and provinces were sold by auction [I]. Some think that she persuaded Marc Antony to put away his second wife [K]; nevertheless, it does scivit collegam Antonium. Intendit autem abdicare se magistratu, & cedere Dolabella, idque ad senatum retulit: verum repugnante asperere Antonio, multaque maledicta in Dolabellam congerente, nec pauciora audiente, illius indignitatis Caesar pudore rem in praesentia omisit (51). But there does not result from thence any just reason to censure Cicero; for there is nothing in his Philippics which imports, that Marc Antony left his uncle in banishment after Caesar's death. That which is certain, is, that Caius Antonius must have been recalled in the time which elapsed between the beginning of Caesar's dictatorship, and his fifth consulship, which fell in the year 709; and he was made dictator, upon his return to Rome, after the defeat of Pompey's lieutenants. He began the functions of his dictatorship with recalling the exiles (52): I know not whether Caius Antonius was at that time comprehended amongst them; but I know that Dion (53) affirms, that Milo alone was not recalled. Glandorpius says, that Caius Antonius, after Julius Caesar's death, was restored by Marc Antony his nephew, who was consul. This is not true, with relation to Caius Antonius's return to Rome, and his privilege of going to the senate-house, since he sat with the senators, and heard his nephew's invective against Dolabella, during the life of Julius Caesar. We learn from Strabo, that that exile remained in the island of Cephalonia, and kept it under his obedience. He was building there a city, but had not time to finish it; for, having obtained leave to return home, he formed greater designs, and died before he put them in execution (54).

I have read a French translation of the second Philippic (55), where the author has somewhat confounded the passage I have cleared in this place. He says, in the 166th page, that Caius Antonius was among those three or four wretches, whom his nephew had left in banishment; and yet, in the 168th, he affirms, that he was present at the speech, which Marc Antony made in a full senate upon the first of January. It is needless to shew, that these two things are contradictory: every body is sensible of it; and I have already said how this difficulty may be removed. Maturantius (56) is guilty of more faults than that translator. First, he believes, that Caius Antonius was exiled by Julius Caesar, for having followed Pompey's party: than which nothing is more false. Caius Antonius was accused, in 694, of two crimes, viz. of being Catiline's accomplice, and of extortion (57). Cicero, who pleaded for him, lost his cause. Secondly, Maturantius affirms, that Marc Antony, when he recalled the exiles after Caesar's death, did not endeavour to get Caius Antonius recalled. Thirdly, he affirms, that Marc Antony, having at last recalled his uncle, persuaded him to stand candidate for the censorship, and raised against him very mean competitors, in order to expose him to laughter. This is to ascribe a non-sensical impertinence to Cicero: for if he had said, that Caius Antonius was not recalled from banishment, when his nephew, after Caesar's death, recalled most exiles, he had said two contradictory things in the same harangue, viz. I. that, at the time he spoke, Marc Antony had not yet recalled his uncle; for it is plain, that the three or four wretches, whom Marc Antony had deprived of the benefit of the pretended law of Julius Caesar, were actually in exile, when Cicero pronounced the second Philippic. II. That Marc Antony, having recalled his uncle some time before, had fraudulently engaged him to sue for the censorship. If I was not convinced of it by experience, I could never have believed, that those, who have commented upon classic authors, should not perceive the contradictory absurdities, which they sometimes put together.

[I] It was in Fulvia's chamber, that kingdoms were sold by auction. Every one knows what revolutions happened among the Romans upon Caesar's death. At first, Marc Antony did not think himself safe in Rome; and, not many days after, it was he who was dreaded there; it was for fear of him, that Caesar's murderers fled. It cannot be expressed how many unjust things he did to heap up money, under the false pretence, that Caesar had ordered such and things to be done. He forged these orders, and took care to be well paid for it: It was in that manner he cheated Dejotarus's ambassadors. He forged a pretended order of Caesar, by virtue of which Dejotarus was to be restored: but he caused the ambassadors to sign, in his wife's chamber, a bond for a great sum (58). Cicero has described, with his usual eloquence, the prodigious venality, which Marc Antony and his wife introduced into the commonwealth: and, when we know besides, Fulvia's character, we are apt to fancy, upon reading Cicero's words, that we see her selling, in her chamber, provinces and kingdoms, with the same greediness of gain, which is natural to women, that sell, in a shop, ribbons, or cloth by the yard. 'Quid illi immanes quaestus? ferendi ne? quos M. Antonii tota exant haufit domus. Decreta falsa vendebat: regna, civitates, immunitates in aes accepta pecunia jubeat incidi. Haec se ex commentariis Caesaris, quorum ipse auctor erat, agere dicebat. Calebant in interiore aedium parte totius reipubl. nundinae: mulier sibi felicior, quam viris, auctionem provinciarum, regionumque faciebat (59). — Can we bear with the extravagant gains of Marc Antony's whole family? He sold unjust decrees: he bartered kingdoms, states, and immunities for money. All this he pretended to do by virtue of Caesar's brief instructions, which he himself had forged. In the innermost apartments of his house was held a general mart of the commonwealth: where his wife, more successful for herself, than her husbands, put up kingdoms and provinces to auction.' I think that both husband and wife were equally, like Catiline, Alieni appetens, sui profusus (60); and knew as well how to squander away money, as to get it. Fulvia was not worth a groat, a year after those rich auctions: so that Pomponius Atticus was obliged to pass his word for her every where, and to lend her great sums (61).

[K] Some think, that Fulvia persuaded Marc Antony to put away his second wife. They ground their opinion on these words of Cicero; Filiam ejus sororem tuam ejecisti alia conditione quaesita & ante perspecta. Which signifies, that, before Antonia's divorce, her husband had so well concerted measures, that he was well acquainted with the woman he was to marry next. It is, at least, very likely, that Cicero had some shrewd meaning in his ante perspecta; and that, when he mentioned a certain design, contrived by Marc Antony in the house of Clodius (62), he meant, that he had endeavoured to lie with Fulvia, Clodius's wife. Nevertheless, I reject Manucius's thought about the word conditis, employed by Cicero. That learned commentator believes, that Cicero meant, that Marc Antony had viewed, or caused another to view for him, all the parts of the body of the woman he designed to marry. He thinks, that the Latin phrase, quaerere conditionem, does not only signify to look for a match, but likewise to inspect the most secret parts, which are the object of love, and make a strict review of them, in order to avoid the surprize of misreckoning, to which they may be exposed, who buy a pig in a poke, if I may use that proverbial expression. How long soever Manucius's passage is, I think myself obliged to transcribe it, that my reader may not object to me, that it is easy to reject and confute a man's opinion, when we either suppress or enervate his reasons. 'Invenio apud veteres usurpari solum hoc loquendi genus, condiciones quaerere, de iis, qui mulieres ad concubitum appetentes, prius vel ipsi, vel per amicos inspiciebant quales essent, num candor in corpore, num levitas, num succi plenae; denique num appetentis libidini responderent, ut eas ne acciperent, aut admitterent, nisi prius hoc tanquam experimentum cepissent. Id, ut dixi, vocabant, condiciones quaerere. Itaque exprobravit Antonius Augusto, id, quod Suetonius litteris prodidit, condiciones quaesitas per amicos, qui matres familias, & adultas virgines denudarent, atque perspicerent, tamquam Thorano mangone vendente. Et, quod apud eundem Suetonium scriptum est, Caesar ad retinendam Pompeii necessitudinem, ac voluntatem, Octaviam, sororis suae neptem, condicione ei detulit: facta scilicet inspicendi potestate, ut nisi probatam, non acciperet. REPUTATION of Manucius's opinion about the phrase, quaerere conditionem.

does not seem probable, that he married her immediately after his divorce: It is rather apparent, * adversus gentes, Dei uxores, inquit, ducunt conditionibus ante quaesitis. Sic de Faustina quaerente si bi condiciones in viris, ut cum iis, quorum condiciones probasset, concumberet, dixit Capitolinus in Antonino Philos. multi ferunt, Commodum omnino ex adulterio natum: siquidem Faustina, satis constet, apud Cajetam condiciones sibi & nauticas, & gladiatorias elegisse. Et Lampridius in Heliogabalo: Romae denique nihil egit aliud, nisi ut emissarios haberet, qui bene vasatos (sic. n. lego, non nasatos) perquirent, eosque ad aulam perducerent, ut eorum conditionibus frui posset. Nec multo post: Lavacrum publicum in aedibus aulicis fecit, simul & palam populo exhibuit, ut ex eo condiciones bene vasatorum hominum colligeret. Nec alio sensu accipiendum illud pro Caesio: habes hortos ad Tiberim: ac diligenter eo loco praeparasti, quo omnis juvenus natandi causa venit, hinc licet condiciones quotidie legas. Quibus adductis exemplis, Quærita, & Perspecta, ad conditionem malo, quam ad mulierem referre: ut sit: quaesivisti, & ante perspexisti aliam conditionem, non contentus ea, quam in sorore tua jam perspexeras. Jam enim constat, conditionem esse partem corporis, quam vel in muliere vir, vel in viro mulier explendæ libidinis causa querit, & qua inventa fruitur (63). — The ancient, I find, applied this phrase Condiciones quaerere to those, who, before marriage, examine, either in person, or by their friends, the beauties or defects of their intended wife; as, whether she be fair, of a smooth skin, or juicy; in short, whether she answer the desires of the lover; refusing to have any thing to say to her without this previous experiment. Thus, as I said, they termed Condiciones quaerere. Thus Antony, as Suetonius informs us, reproached Augustus, that he did, by his friends, Condiciones quaerere, that is, that he employed them to strip matrons and young women naked, and thoroughly examine them, as if they were exposed to sale by the bawd Thorianus. And we read in the same Suetonius, that Caesar, to keep up his relation and friendship with Pompey, offered him Octavia, his sister's niece, conditione, that is, with liberty to examine her, and, if not approved of, to reject her. Arnobius likewise, a very learned writer, and well versed in antiquity, in his fourth book adversus Gentes, says, the gods marry conditionibus ante quaesitis, having first examined their mistresses. So likewise Capitolinus, in the life of Antoninus the philosopher, speaking of Faustina, who examined the men, (condiciones quaerebat) with whom she had a mind to lie, says, it is reported by many, that Commodus was the offspring of an adulterous bed; since it is sufficiently known, that Faustina, at Cajeta, made choice of Sailors and Gladiators, having first examined them — condiciones nauticas & gladiatorias elegisse. And Lampridius, in the life of Heliogabalus says; all he did at Rome, was, to keep emissaries, who looked out for proper persons, and brought them to court, that he might examine whether they were for his purpose — eorum conditionibus frui. And a little farther he says; he built a public bath in the palace, and admitted the people in general to it, that he might have an opportunity of examining, and selecting those, whom he liked best — condiciones colligeret. Nor are we otherwise to understand those words of Cicero, in his oration pro M. Cælio: you have gardens on the banks of the Tyber, whither all the young men repair to swim, and where you may every day make your choice — condiciones legas. From which instances I am induced to refer the words Quærita and Perspecta rather to condicio, than mulier: so that it will be; you have made a fresh examination, (quaesivisti & perspexisti aliam conditionem), not satisfied with what you had already found in your sister. For now it is plain, that condicio means a part of the body, which a man looks for in a woman, and a woman in a man, and which both enjoy when found. Among all these passages, I see none that hinders me from being fully persuaded, that the words Quæreere condiciones signified the same thing, and no more, with our phrases, to look out for, to chuse a match, a lover, a mistress. The first example Manucius alleges plainly shews it: for if his opinion took place, it had not been necessary for Suetonius (64) to add to (64) In Augusti condiciones quaesitas per amicos, these other words, cap. lxiix. qui matres familias & adultas virgines denuarent atque perspicerent tanquam Thorianis mangone vendente. This addition shews, that the preceding words imported no more than this, *he charged his friends to look out for mistresses for him; and because that did not express the baseness Suetonius had a mind to reproach, it was necessary to descend to the particular explanation of the enquiries, which Augustus imposed upon his friends. Thus, to represent the custom of Moscow, with relation to the choice of the maid, whom the Czar is to marry, it would not be enough to say, that people are sent into all the provinces, with orders to look out the most charming and most lovely maids; but it would be necessary to go further, and to say how those maids are viewed, searched, and examined. Solent autem Moscovitæ, quum de uxore ducenda deliberant, omnium toto regno puellarum Virginum delectum habere, ac forma virtuteque, animi præstantiores ad se perducere jubere, quas demum per idoneos homines fidelesque Matronas inspicunt, ita diligenter, ut secretiora quoque ab iis contractari explorarique fas sit. Ex iis vero, magna atque sollicita parentum expectatione, quæ Principi ad animum responderi, Regiis Nuptiis digna pronuntiatur. Cæteræ vero, quæ de formæ pudicitiaque & morum dignitate contenderant, sæpe eadem die in gratiam Principum, proceribus atque militibus nubunt; sic ut mediocri loco nata plerumque, dum principes regie stirpis clara stemmata contemunt, ad summum Regalis thori fastidium, uti & Turcas Ottomannos solitos esse videmus, pulchritudinis auspiciis evectantur (65). — *The Moscovites, when they think of marrying, select the most beautiful and virtuous maids, whom, by proper men and matrons, they examine so carefully, that they are allowed to handle and inspect the most secret parts. She of these, who pleases the prince most, is declared worthy of the royal nuptials. Her competitors, in complaisance to the prince, are often married, on the same day, to the grandees and officers. Thus a maid of mean extraction is often raised, by her beauty, to the monarch's bed, who despises high birth. I cannot sufficiently wonder that Manucius should have paraphrased his second example as he has done: how could he think that Cæsar ever had so little spirit, or so little honour? for, without mentioning the violence, which must have been offered to Octavia's modesty, would it not have been a base condescension in Cæsar, and such as would have exposed him to contempt, to give Pompey, when he offered him his grand-niece, the liberty to refuse her, if he did not like her, after he had seen her stark naked? but, to shew how very absurd Manucius's opinion is, I need but refer him to these words of Suetonius in the sixty third chapter of the life of Augustus: 'Hoc (Agrippa) quæ defuncto, multis ac diu etiam ex equestri ordine CIRCUMSPECTIS CONDITIONIBUS, Tiberium privignum suum elegit. — Agrippa being dead, after considering of many matches among those of Equestrian rank, he made choice of Tiberius for his son-in-law.' We ought to say, according to Manucius, that Augustus, having a mind to marry again his daughter Julia, Agrippa's widow, spent a considerable time in causing several Roman knights to be stripped and examined quite naked, and that at last he chose Tiberius. I shall not take the trouble to shew the extravagance of such a supposition; neither shall I relate a hundred passages of good writers, which prove, that Conditio, in matter of marriage, signified nothing but what we call a match: Bona Conditio, a good match. I shall only quote some words out of the 257th declamation of Quintilian, which are as good as a definitive sentence against Manucius: 'Sed neque in me ille (sacer) probabit aliud quam pietatem; vidit fletus meos, vidit totius animi atque corporis deflectionem: sic homini inter principes nostræ civitatis numerando cæpi bona esse CONDITIO. — He will approve of nothing in me but my piety; he saw my tears, he saw my extreme grief: thus I began to be thought a good match by one, who is deservedly ranked among the principal persons of our city.' See Gro-novius's observations, in the sixth chapter of the first book, apparent, that he continued for some time in love with a concubine [L]. Several dictionaries (f) have affirmed, that he put away Fulvia in the beginning of the triumvirate, in book, pag. 62 and 65. It must be confessed, that Manucius ascribes a very obscene form to the ancient style of lawyers, who, in matter of divorce, used this phrase, Conditione tua non utor. Consult Torrentius's commentary upon Suetonius, in the twenty seventh chapter of Cæsar's life. I am very much surprized, that a learned Jesuit did not find the falsity of that criticism of Manucius, after he had given us so many examples of the signification of the word Conditio. 'Quid sit autem ante perspicere conditionem, malo te ex Pauli Manucii in hunc locum quam ex meis verbis addicere. — What the meaning of ante perspicere conditionem is, I had rather you should learn from Paulus Manucius on this passage, than from my words. Thus speaks father Abram, in his commentary on the second Philippic of Cicero, pag. 725.

But, to come to the point, are we to believe, that Cicero means, that Marc Antony cast his eyes upon Fulvia before he put away Antonia? I am inclined to be of that opinion, tho' there seems to be no small distance between Fulvia's wedding and Antonia's divorce. That is the subject matter of the following remark. Maturantius and Lambinus are both mistaken here: the first fancying, that Marc Antony had a design upon Calpurnia; and the other, that he had Octavia in view. I know not who that Calpurnia may be: but, as for Octavia, I know, that she was Augustus's sister; and that she did not marry Marc Antony till after Fulvia's death.

[L]... Marc Antony continued some time in love with a concubine.] That concubine was a player. Cicero calls her Cytheris, and observes that Marc Antony carried her with him in an open litter. 'Hic tamen Cytheridem secum lætica aperta portat, altera uxorem: septem præterea conjunctæ læticæ amicorum sunt, an amicorum? vide quam turpi leto peramus (66). — Yet here he carries Cytheris with him in an open litter, and his wife in another: with these are joined seven litters, carrying his mistresses, or shall I call them his friends? behold how shamefully we perish.' Cicero wrote this whilst Cæsar went into Spain against Pompey's lieutenants, that is, the first year of the war. Marc Antony was then tribune of the people, and had been left at Rome to keep Italy in awe, and in Cæsar's interest. This is the equipage, with which he travelled. These are the men, to whom God thought fit to deliver up, as a prey, the most illustrious persons in the Roman commonwealth. But that is not the question. This equipage of Marc Antony was objected to him, to his very face, in the second Philippic, cap. 23, and 24, in these fine words: 'Ecce quid enim unquam in terris tantum flagitium exstiterit auditum est? tantum turpitudinem? tantum dedecus? vehebatur in effuso tribunus plebis: licet res laureati antecederent: inter quos aperta lætica cum mima portabatur: quam, ex oppidis municipales homines honesti obviam necessariis prodeuntes, non noto illo, & mimico nomine, sed voluminiam confutabant. Sequebatur rheda cum lenonibus (67), comites nequissimi: rejecta mater amicis impuri filii, tamquam nurum, sequebatur. O misera mulieris fecunditatem calamitosam. Horum flagitiorum ille vestigiis omnia municipia, præfecturas, colonias, totam denique Italiam impressit. — Was there ever heard of so shameful a behaviour? such baseness? such disgrace? a tribune of the people was carried in a chariot: Lictors, crowned with laurel, marched before him; among whom an actress was carried in an open litter, who was saluted, by the honest burghers of the several towns, who were obliged to come out and meet her, not by her well-known theatrical name, but by that of Volumnia, forsooth. A chariot followed with a scandalous retinue of cock-bawds: the poor neglected mother followed her son's mistress, as if she had been her daughter-in-law. O the unfortunate fruitfulness of the wretched lady! such marks as these of his villany did he leave in every Borough, Prefecture, and Colony, in short over all Italy.' Note, that, among other indignities, Marc Antony is here reproached with having obliged his mother to follow the litter of Cytheris. In the letter I have quoted, Cicero says this not of Marc Antony's mother, but of his wife (68). It is hard to conceive, why Cicero should say nothing of the indignities done to the wife, in an oration, wherein he made it his business to load his adversary with shame. He might have said in three words, that Marc Antony allowed no place in his own coach, either to his mother, or his wife; and that he had confined them to other coaches, which followed the litter, in which he had put his concubine. The treatment of the wife served no less, than that of the mother, to render Marc Antony's behaviour odious; and therefore all that can be said in favour of the orator's silence, is, that Marc Antony's wife did not accompany him in his progress; and that, instead of reading, in the letter to Atticus, altera uxorem, we must read, alteram uxorem: and so the sense will be, that that tribune carried Cytheris with him, as if she had been his wife; as if she had been his second wife. Bosius (69) and Lipsius (70) have adopted this correction. Popma maintains the contrary (71): and pretends, not only that Cytheris, and the lawful wife, were in different litters or coaches; but also that the lawful wife was Fulvia; which is also Manucius's opinion. They quote to no purpose (72) the second Philippic, since the orator does not inform us, that Marc Antony placed his wife among the attendants of Cytheris. Mr Grævius has preferred Popma's opinion to that of Lipsius (73). It is certain, that Fulvia was not then Marc Antony's wife: for I have already shewn, that he did not marry her till after Antonia's divorce. Now Antonia was so far from being divorced, when Marc Antony went his progress through the towns of Italy with his Cytheris, that it is very likely, that she was not yet his wife. He put her away when he opposed the designs of Dolabella; that is, some time after he was returned to Rome, after the battle of Pharsalia (74). Now the progress he made with Cytheris was before that return to Rome; and therefore it is probable, that, when he went upon that progress, he was not yet married to his cousin Antonia; for he did not keep her long. We may add, that Fulvia was not a woman that would bear, that a concubine should have the honours, due to a lawful wife, paid her, during her husband's progress. She had too much pride to follow, in a coach, alone, the litter of the favourite Cytheris. Let us confirm the conjecture of Bosius and Lipsius. If it had been said, in the letter to Atticus, Cytheridem portat alteram uxorem, this would agree with other expressions, which are found in the second Philippic. 'At etiam quodam loco factus esse voluisti: quàm id te, dii boni, non decebat: in quo est tua culpa nonnulla, aliquid enim falsi ab Uxore Mima trahere potuisti (75). — Once you endeavoured to be witty; good GOD! how ill it became you? in which you are something to blame, since you might have borrowed a little wit from your theatrical wife.' When Cicero relates, that, at last, Marc Antony broke with Cytheris, he uses the terms, that were employed in putting away one's wife (76). Therefore it is probable, that we ought to read alteram uxorem in the letter to Atticus. Let us not forget, that the dismissing of Cytheris was posterior, not only to the battle of Pharsalia, but also to the war of Alexandria. Marc Antony, after the battle of Pharsalia, was sent back into Italy, to keep the people under the yoke of the conqueror, whilst Cæsar was in pursuit of Pompey. The actress Cytheris went to meet her gallant as far as Brundisium, and returned with him to Rome, with much the same equipage, which Cicero has above described. 'Venisti Brundisium, in sinum quidem, & in complexum tuæ mimulæ: quid est? num mentior? quam miserum est, id negare non posse, quod sit turpissimum confiteri. Si te municipiorum non pudebat, ne veterani quidem exercitus? Quis enim miles fuit qui Brundisii illam non viderit? Quis qui nescierit venisse eam tibi tot dierum viam gratulatum, quis, qui non indoluerit tam sero se, quam nequam hominem secutus esset, cognoscere? Itaque rursus percurfatio, eadem comite mima (77). — You arrived at Brundisium, to throw yourself into the very arms of your actress: what! do I belie you? how wretched is it, that you cannot deny what it is the

in order to marry Octavia. Which is false; for he did not marry the latter till after the death of Fulvia. It is not true, that Josephus speaks of this Fulvia [M].

* the greatest disgrace to confess? if you were not ashamed of your behaviour before the corporation towns, did not your veteran forces put you to the blush? for what soldier was not a witness of this at Brundisium? which of them knew not, how many days' journey she came to congratulate you? which of them was not, at last, ashamed of following so scandalous a leader? you traversed Italy again, in company with the same address. Whilst Cæsar was at Alexandria, invested the second time with the dictatorship, Marc Antony, who was made general of the horse, committed a thousand extortions at Rome: and by degrees proceeded to the audaciousness of selling Pompey's goods by inch of candle. By that means he purchased the house and furniture of that great man, and soon wasted, in that very house, the money he got by that sale; for he abandoned himself daily to the most expensive debaucheries. He had still his Cytheris: and he had already lodged in Pompey's house, when he dismissed that strumpet (78). Which I observe, to shew, that it is very probable that he kept her some time after Antonia's divorce; for Pompey's goods were not sold, till after Cæsar was gone from Alexandria (79). Plutarch, describing Marc Antony's debaucheries, his passion for Cytheris, &c. manifestly insinuates, that those disorders continued after the battle of Pharsalia: and, because he tells us, that Cæsar, being returned to Rome, shewed Marc Antony a great discontent, which produced two notable effects; he gives us room to believe, that some time passed between Antonia's divorce, and Fulvia's marriage. For, the two effects I speak of, are, first, that Marc Antony would not follow Cæsar in his expedition into Africa; and secondly, that he renounced his debaucheries, changed his course of life, resolved to marry, and made choice of Fulvia.

Εἰς τὴν μὲν τοῦ πολὺ τῆς ἀσελτηρίας αὐτῆς καὶ ἀσωτίας ἀφελῆν ὁ Καῖσαρ, ἐκ ἀνασθητικῆς τῆς παρρησιαστικῆς ἀρετῆς, ἀπαλλαγῆναι γὰρ ἐκείνη τὸ βίον, γὰρ προέσχε, φασίαν ἀγαπᾶν. Apparet tamen multum de Antonii amentia & intemperantia Cæsarem, peccata ejus non dissimulando, detraxisse. Siquidem explicuit se illa vita, antequam ad nuptias applicato Fulviam duxit (80). However, I would not deny, that, when he put away his second wife, he had not already taken measures to marry the third; for an engagement with a courtesan does not hinder great lords from marrying: but it is probable, he made no great haste towards that match, till Cæsar's discontent spurred him to it. Therefore I do not censure those, who apply to Fulvia these words of Cicero. Sororem tuam (i. e. Antonia) ejecisti, alia conditione quesita & ante perpecta.

I know some learned men, who apply them to Cytheris. But they are mistaken; for there is no likelihood, that Marc Antony ever thought of marrying that woman. They were both contented to do all that married folks do, eat, drink, and lie together: and, as for concubinage, and all the excesses of complaisance, which a gallant may shew to a mistress, Marc Antony could add nothing, after Antonia's divorce, to what he had already practised before the battle of Pharsalia. Father Abram has stumbled in that place: Marc Antony, according to his opinion, when he put away his second wife, had a mind to marry Cytheris, and married her in effect; and afterwards put her away, and then married Fulvia. Certe cum, ut ex Plutarcho & Cicerone constat, statim post repudiatam Antoniam, Italia Oppida obierit cum illa nimula, non videtur adhuc de Fulviæ nuptiis cogitasse, ne recentem uxorem iis flagitiiis offenderet. Quare nihil obstat quo minus ille Cytheridem vere tum uxorem acceperit, ut loquitur orator, à qua tamen paulo post fecit divortium, & Fulviam duxit uxorem (81). Father Abram's proofs are very bad. He pretends, that Cicero and Plutarch affirm, that Marc Antony, soon after Antonia's divorce, went upon a progress, with Cytheris, through the towns of Italy; and concludes from thence, that he had not yet married Fulvia, it being improbable that he would have given, so soon, such a mortification to his new bride. But he should have taken notice, that Cicero gives us clearly to understand, that Marc Antony's progress with Cytheris, through the towns of Italy, preceded Antonia's divorce. Cicero observes, that that mistress went twice upon such a progress with her gallant: first, before the battle of Pharsalia; secondly, when Marc Antony, being returned to Rome, after that memorable action, met at Brundisium his concubine Cytheris, who was come there to receive him. It is certain, that the quarrels of Marc Antony and Dolabella did not break out till after that second progress of Cytheris through the towns of Italy: and it is likewise certain, that Antonia's divorce, and her husband's quarrel with Dolabella, happened in the same time. The author, whom I consult, ought not to have laid a stress upon the word uxor, employed by Cicero with respect to Cytheris; for the words, we find a little after in Cicero, Rejeda mater AMICAM impuri filii TANQUAM nulum sequebatur, evidently shew, that this was not a true marriage.

I do not doubt, but the reason, which obliged Marc Antony to dismiss Cytheris, was, because he saw, that, without that, he could not conclude his marriage with Fulvia. I place that marriage in the 707th year of Rome, when Cæsar was in Africa. Two years after there was reason to suspect, that Marc Antony continued to be in love with Cytheris; for the letter, he delivered himself to Fulvia, and which he pretended to bring as a messenger from Marc Antony, contained little else besides assurances and protestations, that he was no more in love with that player, and that all the passion he had had for her was now turned towards Fulvia. 'Confestim ad eam, cujus causa venerat, deducitur, eique epistolam transdidit, quam cum illa legeret flens, erat enim amatoris scripta: caput autem literarum, sibi cum illa mima posthac nihil futurum, omnem se amorem abiecit illinc, atque in hanc transfudisse cum mulier fletet uberius, homo misericors ferre non potuit, caput aperuit, in collum invasit (82). — He is immediately introduced to her, upon whose account he came, and delivers her the letter; which when she read with tears (for it was written in very affectionate terms, and chiefly imported, that he had quite abandoned that address, and had transferred all his love to her); when, I say, the lady could not forbear tears, my gentleman took pity on her, discovered himself, and fell upon her neck.' He was then returning from Narbonne, whither he was gone to meet Julius Cæsar, who had defeated Pompey's sons in Spain. Cæsari ex Hispania redeunti obviam longissime processisti (83). We shall see in the article LYCORIS, that he little remembered his promise. What Plutarch observes, touching the time of Marc Antony's marriage with Fulvia, is confirmed by the observation Dion has made, that Antyllus, their eldest son, received the virile gown, after his father, who was defeated at Actium, was returned into Egypt (84). According to Plutarch, the marriage was concluded in the year 707; and Dion affirms, that Antyllus received the virile gown in the year 724, when he might be sixteen years old. He had been betrothed to Augustus's daughter (85); but they caused him to be murdered: and it was his virile gown, which exposed him to that fatal misfortune (86). Augustus thought he ought not to suffer him to live, since the Egyptians might look upon him as grown to man's estate. Marc Antony had by Fulvia another son, whom I have mentioned in another place (87).

[M] It is not true that Josephus speaks of this Fulvia. Glandorpius (88) has committed two faults in this: he refers us to the fifth chapter of the eighteenth book of the Jewish Antiquities, to be informed concerning Fulvia, Marc Antony's wife: and he says, in the same page, that Josephus speaks, in that place, of one Fulvia, who lived in Tiberius's time. This is a double imposition upon the reader, by making him believe, that the Jewish historian has spoken of two Fulvias in the same chapter; and that the one is she, who was married to Marc Antony. The truth is, he speaks but of one Fulvia, a Roman lady, married to Saturninus, who had embraced the Jewish religion, at the solicitation of four villains. She gave them all they asked of her under the fair pretence of religion; but, when her husband was informed, that they had kept for themselves all the presents, which she intended should be sent to the temple of Jerusalem, he complained of it to Tiberius; who, without distinguishing the innocent from the guilty, commanded all the Jews to depart from Rome.

FUNCCIUS (JOHN), a Lutheran preacher, son-in-law to Osiander, and his second in the disputes about Imputative Justice, took upon him to disturb the public repose another way, that is, by politic cabals; which at last brought him to the scaffold, at Königsberg in Prussia, the twenty eighth of October 1566 (a); being then in the forty ninth year of his age (b). See, in Moreri, the two verses, which he is said to have composed the day that he died. They contain a Greek word, which Mr Moreri has put into French (c); but, having translated that word only, he has made nothing of it but perfect nonsense. He should therefore have said, that those two verses contained an exhortation to all men to grow wise by Funccius's example, and to avoid, as one would the plague, the cursed itch of meddling with too many things. Mr Moreri has committed another fault [A]. Vossius is mistaken as to the age of Funccius [B].

[A] Mr Moreri has committed another fault. He says, that Funccius carried down his chronology as far as 1552, and then to 1560. He should have said, that, in the year 1544, Funccius printed the first part of his chronology, which reached from Adam to the birth of JESUS CHRIST (1); and that, in the year 1554, his whole chronology was published, which began with the creation of the world, and ended with the year of grace 1552. In a new edition, revised and corrected, he went down as far as the year 1560.

[B] Vossius is mistaken as to the age of Funccius. He says, that Funccius was beheaded in the fortieth year of his age (2). But let us rather lay the fault on his printers, and content ourselves to censure his having sent to them a very needless addition. He had said, in the 231st page, that Funccius, born in the year 1518, lost his life, being forty eight years old; and he ordered, that, in the 454th page, they should print an addition, which should inform us, that Funccius was beheaded in the year 1566. Could any thing be more needless than that? did not all his readers plainly see, by the 231st page, that Funccius died in the year 1566? the only way to excuse him, would be to say, that he had a mind to shew, by his addition, that Funccius was beheaded in the forty ninth year of his age; but that the printers put 40 instead of 49. It is certain, that Melchior Adam is not exact. For, having placed the birth of Funccius in the month of February 1518, and his execution the twenty eighth of October 1566, he should have placed his death in the forty ninth, and not in the forty eighth year of his age.

FURIUS (FREDERIC) surnamed Cæriolanus, because he was born at Valentia in Spain [A], flourished in the XVIth century. He studied at Paris under Audomarus Talceus, Hadrian Turnebus, and Peter Ramus (a); and afterwards came to Louvain, where he published a treatise of rhetoric, and maintained, against a doctor of divinity (b), that the holy Scripture ought to be translated into the vulgar tongue (c). He wrote thereupon a very fine treatise [B] in the same city, and went to print it in Germany. This brought him into trouble (d); but his learning, piety and candour, being made known to the emperor Charles V, he was preserved from the storm. That prince sent him back into the Low-Countries, and placed him near Philip his son (e), where he had the character of historian (f). Furius devoted himself all the rest of his life to the service of that master; and, having accompanied him to the states of Arragon, he died at Valladolid, in the year 1592 (g). I cannot set down his age exactly [C]. He endeavoured heartily to pacify the troubles of the Low-Countries (h) [D]. He was never married (i). Neither was he ever chancellor to the king

[A] Surnamed Cæriolanus, because he was born at Valentia in Spain. Nicolas Antonius (1) says, that the inhabitants of the kingdom of Valentia are vulgarly called Seriolis; and that, for this reason, our Furius has the surname of Seriolanus. He does not spell that word so, at the beginning of his book, intitled, Bononia, where he writes Cæriolanus. In the catalogue of Thuanus's library (2), he is miscalled Coriolanus.

[B] He wrote thereupon a very fine treatise. It is intitled, Bononia, sive de libris sacris in vernaculam linguam convertendis, libri duo ad Franciscum Boodillium Mendozium, Cardinalem Burgesem, and which was printed at Basil by John Oporinus, in the year 1556, in 8vo. It contains 365 pages. The reading of it was forbid by the Index Expurgatorius of the council of Trent.

[C] I cannot set down his age exactly. These words of Thuanus are not precise: Ad meliorem vitam baud paulum Montanus senior hoc anno migravit (3). For they only inform us, that Furius died much older than Montagne, who lived but sixty years (4). Those words were not understood in the eulogies of Mr Teissier, where it is said, that Furius was about sixty years old, when he died.

[D] He endeavoured . . . to pacify the troubles of the Low-Countries. You will find, in Thuanus, the substance of a project of peace, which Furius published in the year 1575. The conditions, he proposed to the provinces that had revolted, seemed very reasonable; but the prince of Orange answered, that they came too late, and could not be depended upon: and so he preferred war to so suspicious a peace (5).

Note, that Furius assured them, that the king of Spain would ratify the conditions, contained in his project; and that, if it was thought necessary to bind more strongly that monarch to the observation of the treaty, he would cause it to be signed by the grandees of Spain, both ecclesiastical and secular, by the princes of the empire, and by some of the most considerable cities in the Low-Countries. The author of the project promised, that the inquisition should not be established; that the imposition of the tenth-penny should be taken away; that the edicts against the new religion should be mitigated by certain proviso's, as should be amicably agreed on by both parties; and that such as would not be contented with those mitigations, should be at full liberty to go and settle elsewhere, without forfeiting any of their goods; that foreign soldiers should be disbanded, and sent out of the Low-Countries, if the malecontents did desire it, &c. Furius offered to go post, to carry immediately to the king of Spain the acceptance of these proposals of peace: but there was no need that he should take that trouble upon him; for the proposals were rejected. Ad ea Arausionensis, quoniam jam conventus delegatorum dissolutus erat, pridie Non. Maias respondet, quæ in pacis formula proponantur, de promissis servandis cautiones, quæ in re totius negotii cardo vertitur, eas non ita prudenti viro tutas videri, quin P. R. si non serventur, dispensare possint, & violatores absolvere: ea dissidentia fieri, & quoniam formula hæc serius transmissa sit, ut ipse abjecta omni meliori spe certum licet dubii eventus bellum incertæ atque adeo infideliæ paci præferendum duxerit (6). — The prince of Orange, because the assembly of the delegates was dissolved, answered, on the sixth king of Poland, as some pretend (k). His Treatise of the Counsellor has been much esteemed [E]. (k) See the last remark.

* sixth of May, that a prudent man could not depend on the promises in the plan of peace, on which the hinge of the whole affair turned, since the Pope could dispense with the observance of them; besides, that the project was transmitted too late; so that, rejecting all better hopes, he thought a certain war, tho' of doubtful event, preferable to an uncertain and therefore treacherous peace.*

It fares with historians as with travellers: they meet now and then with certain matters, some of which are like mires, or like an even, broad, well paved road, &c. Furius's project is a favourable passage for the historians, that write on the side of Spain; and disadvantageous to the historians of the other party. It is bright and fair for the first, and dull and sad for the latter: for after all, what finer field can a historian desire, to display the clemency of a prince, and to cast an odium on the stubbornness of his revolted subjects, than that step of Furius, and what followed thereupon? what greater perplexity, than for people to be obliged to say, that they cannot trust a master, who promises to redress all their grievances, and to suppress whatever forced them to take up arms? Nevertheless, in this case, the prince of Orange had good reasons for not trusting the king of Spain: for things were come to that pass, that he was compelled to practise, as he did, the maxim, that whenever drawn his sword against his prince must throw away the scabbard.

[E] His Treatise of the Counsellor has been much esteemed.] He intitled it, Del consilio y consejo. Simon Schardius was the first that translated it into Latin; and his translation was published at Cologne by Andreas Schottus, in the year 1618, with the treatises of Peter Magnus, and Hippolytus à Collibus, on the same subject. Christopher Warsevicus made another Latin version of it, and published it with his treatise De Legato & Legatione. It was published at Dantzic in the year 1646, if we believe Nicolas Antonius. But undoubtedly he is mistaken: for Warsevicus was not then alive; and we have some things of his printed in the year 1582, and an edition of his treatise De Legato & Legatione in 1595. Nicolas Antonius has mistaken, for an edition procured by that Pole, that which was made after his death. However it be, this is the praise which Warsevicus has given to Furius's book. 'Hoc opus multis multorum vel longiorum finis commentationibus est præferendum. Sic enim respondet acumen ingenii pectoris candori, & disputandi subtilitas sententiarum gravitati, ut tales Cæsarum Consilarii omni ævo optari quam sperari videantur mihi magis potuisse (7). — This work is preferable to all comments whatever, even the longest. For the author's wit is so answerable to his candor, and the subtilty of his reasoning to the gravity of his stile, that such counsellors are rather to be wished for, than expected, in every age.' There is a Latin translation of that work, printed at Basil in the year 1563, in 8vo, and at Strasburg in 12mo (8). For the rest, Gaspar Escolanus, who has said, in his history of Valencia, that Furius had the dignity of chancellor to the king of Poland (9), has, perhaps, been led into this mistake by some book, that contained both the Treatise of the Counsellor, and some other dissertation, dedicated to the chancellor of Poland.

GABRIEL (GILES) licentiate of the university of Louvain, priest, monk of the third order of St Francis, definer general, and apostolical commissary in the Low-Countries, is a Liegeois, who published, at Brussels, in 1675, a book intituled, Specimina Moralis Christianæ & Moralis Diabolicæ. This title alarmed the court of Rome, and obliged the author to go thither, to justify his doctrine, which being found to be sound, he thought he ought to communicate it to the public again, reforming a little the title (a). He therefore got his work reprinted, intitling it Specimina Moralia. This second edition is of Rome, 1680. There was a third in French, revised, corrected, and augmented. It is intituled, Les Essais de la Theologie Morale Essays of Moral Divinity, and contains 316 pages, in 12mo. This author approaches infinitely nearer to severe, than relaxed morality. I believe he is no friend to the Jesuits, nor, consequently, is beloved by them.

GAFFAREL (JAMES), one of the learned men, who has been much talked of in the XVIIth century, was a Provençal (a). He understood the oriental languages, and several others; and pretended to know almost every thing, but principally the occult and cabalistic sciences. Cardinal Richelieu chose him for his library-keeper (b), and sent him into Italy, to collect the best manuscripts and printed books that could be found (c). Mr de la Thuillerie, Ambassador of France to Venice, desired to have him near him, as a learned companion [A]. Gaffarel published a book, intituled, Curiositez Inouïes, (unheard of curiosities) which made a great noise, and which the Sorbonne censured [B]. He was obliged to retract it; for being possessed of ecclesiastical benefices [C], he could not with impunity bring his orthodoxy into question. Before that time, he had been exposed to many untoward suspicions [D], and it is very likely he held particular opinions. It is pretended, that cardinal Richelieu intended to employ him in his grand design

[A] Mr de la Thuillerie . . . desired to have him near him as a learned companion. Gaffarel did not pretend to be in the ambassador's house (1) upon the foot of a man, that was only proper to divert him at his leisure hours by his learned conversation. He did not believe politics to be out of his sphere; but thought he might be useful to Mr de la Thuillerie, even in the business of his embassy: wherefore he desired Mr Naudé, his good friend, to send him a catalogue of the authors, that have written on politics. That is the occasion, that gave birth to the Bibliographia Politica of Gabriel Naudé, which has been printed so often. In order to prove it, let us quote the beginning of that book:

Quæris à me, mi Gaffarelle eruditissime, atque etiam frequentibus literis vehementius urges, ut pro ea, quam in me non semel deprehendisti, diversorum librorum ac scriptorum cognitione, eorum nomenclaturam aut potius æconomiam ad te transmittam, quos instituentis tractandisque cum recta ratione & methodo politicæ studiis, non inutiles fore censeo. Quandoquidem ipsa tibi in præsentiarum maximopere esse necessaria, vel te ipso tacente ceteri omnes faciliè intelligunt, quos minimè fugit, te unum præ multis, non ut liberalibus modo disciplinis excultum, imbutumque sanctioris linguæ facultate præclarissimam, sed tanquam ad reliquas omnes disciplinas factum à naturâ, & diligenti arte expolitum, ab illustrissimo, sapientissimoque viro domino THUILLERIO, christianissimi nostri regis, ad serenissimam rempublicam Venetam oratore excellentissimo, selectum fuisse; quo cum de rebus gravissimis communicare, & subcivis horis sermones literarios miscere posset (2).

— You desire of me, my learned friend Gaffarel, and earnestly request of me by repeated letters, that, as you have often found me acquainted with a great variety of books and authors, I would transmit to you a catalogue, or rather complete series, of those whom I think will be useful in rightly pursuing and methodizing the studies of politics. How very serviceable they will be at present to you, every one knows, without your confession, who are apprized, that the illustrious and wise Mr de la Thuillerie, ambassador to the Serene Republic of Venice, has made choice of you, not only on account of your great knowledge in liberal arts, and acquaintance with the Hebrew tongue, but as being formed by nature, and cultivated by art, for all other kinds of knowledge; with whom he may communicate the most important affairs, and fill up his leisure hours with learned conversation.

[B] He published a book which the Sorbonne censured. Here is the whole title: Curiositez inouïes sur la Sculpture Talismanique des Persans, Horoscope des Patriarches, & Lecture des Étoiles. That is, Unheard of Curiosities about the Talismanic Sculpture of the Persians, Horoscope of the Patriarchs, and Reading of the Stars. The author pretended to shew, that the Talismans, or constellation figures, had the efficacy to make a man rich and fortunate; to free a house and a whole country from certain insects and venomous creatures, and from all the injuries of the air (3). Sorel, disguised under the name of the Sieur de l'Isle, confuted Gaffarel's work; and his confutation was well received. You will find in it (4) Gaffarel's recantation. The first edition of the Unheard of Curiosities was printed at Paris in 1629. There was another printed at Roan in 1631; and two others, without the printer's name, or the place where they were printed, in the year 1637 and 1650, in 8vo. The last has additions to it. This work was printed in Latin, at Hamburg, in 1676, with Gregory Michael's notes.

[C] Being possessed of ecclesiastical benefices. I shall set down, in this remark, all the titles, which I find were given him. He was doctor of divinity and canon-law, protonotary of the holy apostolic see, and prior, in commendam, of St Giles's (5). When he died, he was dean of the canon-law in the university of Paris, prior of Revest de Brouffe, in the diocese of Cisteron, and commander of St Omeil (6). Konig calls him, Signor apud Gallos Abbas.

[D] Before that time, he had been exposed to many untoward suspicions. This appears by the preface to the Unheard of Curiosities. A person of quality, says he sign of re-uniting religions; and that, in order to feel the pulse of the Protestants, he authorized him to preach against the doctrine of purgatory [E]. Gaffarel died at Signonce in the year 1681, being eighty years old (d). He had almost finished the work, which he had been upon a good many years [F]: I know not whether his friends will publish it. I shall not give an exact list of his works [G].

'whose desires cannot be refused without a crime, has drawn them out of my closet, where they should have always remained, since I had taken the resolution, after I had undergone so many calumnies, never to expose any thing more to the public: having a thousand times breathed out these words, formerly familiar to a Roman prince, Utinam nescissem literas.' How many authors are there, who would make the same wish, but that they have so much spirit as to despise the unjust censures of certain people.

[E] It is pretended, that cardinal Richelieu . . . authorized him to preach against the doctrine of purgatory. When, in one of the cities of Languedoc, the ministers of the place had the honour to wait upon him (7), and being fallen into discourse about a re-union in matters of religion, which he seemed to wish, since it had been happily restored in matters of state; they told him, that they saw but little probability of effecting it, so long as the Pope would so stiffly maintain his infallible authority. To which he answered mildly, that means would be found to bring the Pope to reason. And, as the Gazettes published then what the Sieur Gaffarel, a man of known erudition and reputation, authorized by his Eminence, had publicly preached in Dauphiné against purgatory; so we knew, in it's proper time, the secret negotiations, which, by his order, were entered upon by Father Audebert, a famous Jesuit, with some of our most celebrated ministers, to agree upon some propositions, which might be adjusted

'between both parties, about their chief differences.' This I extract out of a preface of Samuel Des-Marets (8). I know, that Gaffarel published a book about the pacification of religions.

[F] He had almost finished his work, which he had been upon a great many years. He had for many years been busy about a History of the Subterranean World, wherein he treated of caves, grottos, mines, vaults, and catacombs, which he had observed for thirty years in his travels through all the parts of the world. He had almost finished that work; the plates were already engraven, and it was going to the press, when death prevented the execution of his design. . . . We are put in hopes, that those two learned friends (9) who out-live Gaffarel, and with whom he entrusted his desires, will not deprive the public of so rare and curious a piece (10).

[G] I shall not give an exact list of his works. Here is only the title of some; Abdita divinae cabalæ mysteria contra Sophistarum logomachiam defensa, Paris 1623, in 4to. Arts nova & perquam facili legendi Rabbinis sine punctis. De mystica Hebræorum stupenda libellus. In voces derelictas V. T. centuriæ duæ. De stellis cadentibus opinio nova. Quæstio Hebraico-Philosophica, utrum à principio mare salum existerit. Mr Colomies (11) refers us to the Apes Urbanae of Allatius, from whence he has taken those titles, and where he has left many others. The Widow of Sarepta, and a Treatise of the Good and Evil Genius's are also two pieces of Gaffarel (12).

GAIGNEUR (WILLIAM LE) was of Angers (a), and lived at the beginning of the XVIIth century. We have seen his name (b) among those, who have excelled in the art of writing. I have read, in a description of France, that he was the first of all the writers of the kingdom, and that he paved the way for an infinite number of persons, who at that time professed the art of writing (c). There are some verses in his praise, in the poems of Peter le Loyer, who styles him secretary to monsieur the king's brother (d).

Being afterwards come to Geneva, he taught philosophy there, and was some time after rector of the college of Guienne at Bourdeaux. Being gone from thence, by reason of the envy they bore to him, he left France, to go into Flanders; where, having been discovered to be a Protestant, and put into the hands of the Spaniards, his countrymen, the most favourable treatment he received was, to be burnt by virtue of a decree of the Inquisition. This Galés had good books, and also some manuscripts (a) [B]. It was the Leaguers that took him, and delivered him up to the Spaniards. See Meursius (b).

GALLARS (NICOLAS DES), in Latin Gallafius, a minister of Geneva, was one of those, who assisted at the conference of Poissy. Those of Geneva lent him to the church of Paris, when they were desired to give them a minister in the year 1557. The deputy (a), who conducted him, was stopped at Auffonne with him, and some suspicious and prohibited books having been found in his portmanteau, he was carried to Dijon, where he suffered martyrdom. Des Gallars was permitted to pursue his journey, because they found neither books nor letters about him, that might render him suspected (b). Calvin had a great esteem for him, and was so much esteemed by him, that he found in him a transcriber of what he wrote (d). La Croix du Maine speaks of another N. DES GALLARS [D], who was minister of the French church in London, in the year 1561.

vin's commentary upon Isaiah is but an abstract of the lectures and sermons of Calvin upon that prophet, which was made by des Gallars. He has also made a Commentary upon the book of Exodus, and an Apology for Calvin against Cochleus. The abridgment of Gesner's Bibliothèque, where we learn this, does not mention the years, wherein those works were printed; which fault is too frequent in that abridgment of Gesner, and in most compilations of that nature. Note, That the commentary upon Isaiah was afterwards revised by Calvin, and therefore that des Gallars's edition is not the best. I prove this by Theodore Beza, who, having said, That Calvin, though sick in the year 1558, had not, for all that, given over working, goes on thus:

[C] We shall see, below, the date of some of his works.] In the year 1545, he translated into Latin a small treatise, which Calvin had published in 1540, on the Lord's Supper. Des Gallars was then minister of the church of Geneva (4). Some time after, he made a Latin translation of what Calvin had published, in 1544, against the Anabaptists and Libertines (5). He made, in 1548, a Latin version of the inventory of relics, published by Calvin in 1546 (6). He published, GALLIGAI (LEONORA), wife to the marshal d'Ancre, was daughter of a Joiner, and of Mary de Medicis's nurse (a). That prince's lov'd her tenderly, and brought her into France, when she came there to be married to Henry IV. Galligai, under the title of bedchamber-woman to that Prince, governed her entirely. She was extremely ugly, but had an infinite deal of wit. She married Concino Concini, a domestic of the same queen, and raised with him a prodigious fortune. They were more united by interest, than by affection [A]. They had fomented the division between Henry IV, and the queen (b); for their artifices and false reports occasioned the domestic jars, which made that great prince weary of his life. After his death, they found it still more easy to govern their mistress, and engross all the riches and best places of the kingdom [B], and were puffed up with unheard-of and monstrous pride.

[A] They were more united by interest, than by affection.] The marshal d'Ancre's wife heard, without shedding tears, that her husband was murdered; and her first care was to save her jewels, which she put in the straw of her bed, and, causing herself to be undressed, she went to bed (1). The provostmen, that went into her chamber, not finding the jewels, made her (2) rise, to search her bed, where they were found (3). She said afterwards to those, who guarded her, well, they have killed my husband; is not this enough to satisfy them? Let them suffer me to go out of the kingdom (4). When they told her, they had hanged the corps of the marshal, she seemed very much moved at it, without weeping however; but yet she said, that he was a proud, insolent, man: that he had nothing but what he deserved: that she had not lain with him for three whole years last past: that he was an ill man; and that, to part from him, she had resolved to retire into Italy this spring, and had made every thing ready for her journey; which she offered to justify (5). [D] La Croix du Maine speaks of another N. Des Gallars.] Nicolas des Gallars, whom he mentions in the 344th page, and N. des Gallars, of whom he speaks in the 363d page, are the same minister, and therefore he makes two authors of one. He has written in Latin, (thus he speaks touching the latter) and since translated into French, the form of the ecclesiastical government, settled in the French church in London, printed in the year 1561, at which time he resided in the said city of London (8). It may be objected, that, if La Croix du Maine is not mistaken as to the time, it is probable, that there are here two ministers; for Nicolas des Gallars was at Geneva in the year 1560 (9), and in France in 1561, at the time of the conference of Poissy. I answer, that this proves nothing. That minister was sent to London in the year 1560, to settle there a French church; that is certain: but at the same time, that does not hinder, that a year after des Gallars might have been in France at the conference of Poissy (10). ‘Eodem tempore quum non pauci pii Galli post Mariæ reginæ mortem singulari Serenissimæ reginæ Elizabethæ pietate & humanitate freti in Angliam refugerent, peterentque reverendi viri Edmundi Grindalli episcopi Londinensis assensu ut Geneva mitteretur qui ecclesiam Gallicam illic constitueret, missus est eo Nicolaus Gallarsius familiarissimus à multis jam annis Calvini collega, & cujus plurimum opera in excipiendis dictatis utebatur. Sed Calvinus nihil antiquius ecclesiæ adificationem fuit (11). — At the same time, when not a few pious Frenchmen, after the death of queen Mary, depending on the singular piety and humanity of the most serene queen Elizabeth, fled into England, and petitioned, with the assent of Edmund Grindall, bishop of London, that some one might be sent from Geneva, to establish a French church there, Nicolas Gallars was sent thither, an intimate acquaintance and colleague for many years of Calvin, and whom he chiefly employed in taking down what he dictated. But Calvin had nothing more at heart than the edification of the churches.’

(8) He had said, that N. des Gallars was minister of the French church in the city of London, in England.

(9) The epistle dedicatory of his Commentary on Exodus, is dated that year from Geneva.

went to interrogate her about her rings and other goods, she spoke to them with as much assurance, as if she had no manner of fear (6); and even told them, she hoped to come again into favour.

(6) Ib. pag. 61.

[B] They engrossed all the riches and best places.] See, above, the article CONCINI, and consider only, that they found in the marshal's pockets (7), in assignments from the treasury, in notes of receivers, or in bonds, the sum of 1985000 livres. They found in his house good assignments for 2500000 livres more (8). His wife said to the commissaries, that she had still her pearls, to wit, a necklace of 40 pearls of 2000 livres a-piece, and a chain of five turns of pearls of 50 livres a-piece, and that in all they amounted to above 120000 crowns (9). She had already sent jewels to the king, to the value of 200000 livres. The provostmen had not so well searched, but that she had still a box of jewels left: for, when they carried her to the Bastille, they asked her ‘before they went . . . if she had no more rings? She shewed a box, that had not been taken from her, wherein there were drawers pride [C]. But the end of this was extremely tragical. I have said elsewhere how the husband was used, and now I am going to relate what was done to the wife. She was committed to the Bastille, and afterwards to the prison of the parliament. She was tried by the parliament, and sentenced to be beheaded and burnt; which was executed the eighth of July 1617. She took up at last a good resolution, and died with constancy enough, and like a christian (c). She was convicted, among other crimes, of having not only judaized [D], but likewise of having used magical arts [E] to compass her ends. She was condemned for high-treason against God and the only some chains of amber: and being asked, if she had none about her, she took up her coats, and shewed as high as near her breasts, having on drawers of red Florence frise. They told her, laughing, that they must put their hands to her drawers. She answered, that, at another time, she would not have suffered it, but now all was permitted; and so du Hallier (10) felt a little about the drawers (11). This great wealth was a sufficient proof of their crimes.

[C] They were puffed up with unbecoming and monstrous pride. She would not even allow the princes, princesses, and the greatest persons of the kingdom, to come into her chamber, nor suffer people so much as to look her in the face; saying, that she was frightened when people looked upon her, and that they might bewitch her by looking upon her: Which was the reason that she would no longer see several of her servants, only for having looked on her; and towards the end of her favour, she had even banished from her chamber, on that account, Mr de Lufson, and Faydeau, who had been the last in her favour (12). Her superstition, as to witchcraft, and her ugliness, were the reason of this, more than her vanity.

[D] She was convicted of having not only judaized. This was also laid to her husband's charge. It was proved,

I. By the care they took to bring into France a Jew, famous for fortune-telling, being a physician called Montalto. They employed Vincenzio Ludovici, their secretary, in this negotiation. This was verified by letters, written from Venice to the said Vincenzio, the twenty sixth of April, 1611, by which they give him hopes of the said Montalto's coming into France (13); and by letters of the said Montalto himself, written, the sixth of May following, to the said Leonora Galligai, by which he assures her, that he is ready to come, by the means of so gracious and singular a protection; not meaning however to disguise or conceal his profession, but freely to exercise his Jewish religion, since he had refused great offers made him from Bologna, Messina, Pisa, and even to succeed the great physician Mercurialis, under the most gracious protection of the great duke Ferdinand; and that the first professorship of Padua had also been offered him; adding, that by one single act they might know his intention, to wit, that he shall receive no money on the day he is used to observe, that is, the Sabbath-day. These letters have been seen in the process in the literal production against the said Galligai, under the letter K: and it is to be observed hereupon that la Place, gentleman of the horse to the said Galligai, maintained to her, in the confrontation, that, since the coming of the said Montalto, she went no more, either to church, or confession, but spent her time in making little wax balls, which she put in her mouth (14).

II. It was alledged (15), that by their conversation with that Montalto, the prisoners disused the observation and practice of the christian religion, and accustomed themselves to judaism; and that it was the reason, that there were found in their house two books, one of which is intitled CHEINUC, that is, in Hebrew, Custom, which is a kind of catechism; the other is intitled Machazer, that is, Revolution of the annual service, for the use of the Jews of Spain, printed at Venice.

III. It was alledged (16), that from that conversation and catechizing followed their apostasy and desertion of the christian religion, to embrace, as they did, judaism, practicing the sacrifices, oblations, and exorcisms, used among the Jews. This is verified in the process, both by the testimonial and vocal proof, and by the confession of the said Galligai; and among other depositions, that of her coachman is ob-servable, by which it appears how they made use of several churches in Paris, to commit, in them, in the night, those impieties, found out by the cries and howlings heard in the same, when the said Galligai sacrificed a cock, which is an oblation used by the Jews in the feast of reconciliation, offering a cock for their sins. And that this oblation of a cock is Jewish, and that the Jews are used to practise the same in the places, where they are suffered to reside, appears by two books, produced by the king's attorney-general, when the trial was depending; the one inscribed Baal Hatturim, that is, the chief and patron of orders; in the first part of which, intitled Gracchaim, that is, The way and path of life, or The way of living which one ought to observe, or, The way of spending this life, that oblation is mentioned; and of which book, Rabbi Jacob, who pretends to be a Gaul, is the author. And the other, intitled The Jewish Synagogue; in the twentieth chapter whereof is written what is done in that feast of reconciliation during ten penitential days: and that, on the ninth, the Jews rise very early, frequent the school, sing, and rehearse several prayers; and as soon as they return home, each male, both young and old, takes a cock in his hand, and the female a hen, and the big-bellied women a cock and a hen together, and rehearse these words out of the psalm of David: † The foolish, by reason of their prevarication, and for their iniquities, are afflicted, so that their soul loathes all meat, and they are come even to death's door. This oblation of a cock, does not only argue judaism, but heathenism also, and declares the accused to be apostates, and consequently sacrilegious; for an apostate is accounted guilty of sacrilege by the imperial constitutions †, which punish such capital crimes with forfeiture of all their estate. As to what the said Galligai has said in her excuse, That she had made that oblation of a cock for her health, and to be cured of a disease she laboured with; it was answered to her, that such an impiety is punished with death, although it be practised by way of remedy.

IV. They alledged, as a proof of their affection to judaism, the endeavours they used to bring Jews into France, having sent to Amsterdam in Holland, where there are many of them, to invite some of them to Paris (17).

[E] . . . but likewise of having used magical arts. This accusation affected also both the husband and wife. It was proved (18),

I. By a letter of a woman called Gondy, and others of the said Galligai, the prisoner, to the lady Isabella, a reputed witch; by which she desires her to send her word, if she knows any thing à l'usage which regards any way her person, or the interest of her house.

II. By three books of characters, with another little character, found in the room of the said Galligai, and a box, wherein are five round pieces of velvet, of which characters the prisoners made use to get an ascendant over the WILLS OF THE GREAT ONES: which is verified by the depositions of Melon, Charton, and Nicolas Viart, confronted to the said Galligai. And as for the books of characters, found in her house, they are mentioned in the verbal process of Messieurs de Maupeou, and Arnauld, intendants of the Finances, containing the description of the moveables and papers found in the said house.

III. By the deposition of Philip Dacquain, formerly a Jew, and at present a Christian, who says, that he being at Molins, in the lieutenant-criminal's house, the prisoners sent him word, that they had made use of the Cabala, and of the books of the Jews, which serves against judaism and witchcraft; it being to be observed what Dacquain deposes, that

IV. Because they sent for some forcerers, who pretended to be monks, called Ambrosians, from Nancy in Lorraine, who assisted the marshal's wife in the offering of the cock.

V. Because there were found in their house divers things, which they used to hang about their necks (19) after the manner of the preservatives, called by the Jews, Kamea; by the Greeks, Phylacteria, and Periaptia; and by the Latins, Amuleta, and Ligatura: which are things condemned by the holy councils, particularly by the sixty-first canon of the sixth synod in Trullo, and by a Roman council under Pope Gregory III, and by another of Agatho, quoted by Gratian *, and by Yvo bishop of Chartres †, quoting a council of Arles, cap. v, which condemns Phylacteria diabolica, and Caracteres diabolici.

VI. It was proved against them, that they made use of images of wax, and kept them in coffins.

VII. And that they consulted magicians, and employed astrologers, who professed judicial mathematics; and that, among the rest, they made use of the diabolical science of Cosmo Ruger, an Italian.

VIII. (20) But, above all, it is to be observed, that the said Galligai invited to Paris one Matthew de Montenas, as a greater and more experienced magician than the said Ambrosians; by whom she caused her self to be exorcised in the church of the Augustines, in the chapel of the Epifames, and in the night, as has been deposed by several monks of the said monastery, most of whom have been confronted to her, without being excepted against by her. It being to be noted, that the exorcism was performed in another manner than among christians;

which was also done in the churches of St Sulpice in the suburb St Germain, and in the little St Antony in the city. She answered to that, that her causing herself to be thus exorcised in the night, was, lest it should be known for what distemper she did it; saying, that she was sometimes possessed. But this ought to have been done by men having the true character, as either by the bishop, or his vicar, that is, the curate of her parish, and not by unknown, grizzly, men, who have disappeared, and were no more seen; such as were those pretended Ambrosians.

IX. It is also to be noted, that, when these Ambrosians had a mind to perform any ceremonies of their art in the house of the said Galligai, they caused all the servants to go out, burnt frankincense in the garden, and made several things in form of benedictions upon the earth; and the said Galligai did eat, then, only cocks combs, and rams kidneys, which she caused to be blessed; of which there is a testimonial proof in the process.

X. It is also to be noted, that, every year, on the eve of the Epiphany, or Twelfth day, she caused father Roger to bless the water, which she used, for lustral, or holy-water: which was not without some mystery and design. And, being asked for what reason she did it, she would give no answer.

[F] She was charged with high-treason both against GOD and the king. For both husband and wife enquired after the king's life and health from some persons, who professed judicial astrology. This was proved by the deposition of John du Chatel, called Cæsar, who was a soothsayer and fortune-teller, confronted to the prisoners, &c. (21)

[G] She pleaded her belly. Having heard her condemnation read to her, she said, I am big with child. But it was answered to her, that she had said, being a prisoner, and during her trial, that she had not had her husband's company for two years before; so that this could not be, but to the prejudice of her honour: to which she answered nothing, and insisted no more thereupon (22).

GALLONIUS (ANTONY), a priest of the Oratory at Rome, hath composed, among other works, a treatise de Martyrum Cruciatibus, which is very curious. There is to be seen in it the figure of the instruments used by the heathens against the martyrs of the primitive church. He died in the year 1605 (a). I give the titles of some other works he composed [A].

A little book, printed in Holland in the year 1699, informs me of a thing, which, I think, deserves to be inserted in this Dictionary. It relates to the dispute, wherein Gallonius made himself a party, to defend Baronius against the monks of mount Cassin [B].

[A] I give the title of some other of his works. He wrote the life of Philip Neri, the founder of the priests of the Oratory, and an apology pro assertis in annalibus Ecclesiasticis Baronianis de monachatu sancti Gregorii Papæ adversus D. Constantinum Bellottum Monachum Cassinatem, Rome, 1604. in 4to. ex typographia Vaticana. See the Bibliothèque of Prosper Mandosio; wherein he has not forgot Gallonius, who was a native of Rome.

[B] He defended Baronius against the monks of mount Cassin. The little book, which furnishes me here with a commentary, is intitled, Critique du livre publié par les Moines Benedicteins de la Congregation de S. Maur, sous le titre de Bibliothèque divine de St Jerome. It contains but sixty six pages in 12mo. The advertisement of the bookseller informs us, that we are beholden for that criticism to Mr Simon's nephew, who wrote it from his uncle's Latin Memoirs. What I am going to copy from that book, is not the least curious passage in it (1). The monks of mount Cassin, are so liberal of their habit, that, having bestowed it on St Gregory the Great, they could not endure what that cardinal (2) had advanced in his annals, that it was false, that St Gregory had been a Benedictine monk; and published thereupon a book with this title, Gregorius magnus instituto Sanctissimæ

Patris Benedicti restitutus. But Antony Gallon, a priest of the Oratory at Rome, espousing the cause of his brother Baronius, wrote a very smart answer to them; and because it is grown very scarce, I shall send you some passages out of it, which may serve you till the whole be reprinted, with some other pieces on the same subject. It is printed at Rome, in 4to, with this title Apologeticus Liber... (3) I confess to you, that, if father Gallon's piety, as well as that of Baronius, were not otherwise known, one would be apt to think, that there is a great deal of passion in that answer; wherein the monks are charged with producing, to maintain their cause, some pieces, whose authors deserve the same punishment as Cicarella. Strange comparison! that Cicarella was hanged for his forgeries, by the order of Pope Pius V. It is true that the same Gallon owns, that he reveals things, which ought never to have come to the knowledge of the public; but he adds at the same time, that the extrem impudence of those monks had engaged him to publish them. He reproaches them with a great number of donations, which had been forged in mount Cassin under the names of Popes and Princes. All those deeds were printed at Venice, in 4to, in 1513, at the end of the chronicle of that monastery. By these

• these false donations several possessions, and even whole towns, are given to the monks of mount Cassin. It is true, that the monk Constantine, in defence of his monastery, produces records, which were found in his library, written in Lombardic characters, and which, by consequence, could not have been newly forged. But Gallon, who knew to the bottom the practices of the Benedictin monks, answers, that all the papers they have, written in those ancient characters, ought not to be credited, as if they were sealed with the seal of the Revelation; it being well known that they do not want writers, who have a hand good enough to imitate Lombardic characters: Ac si quidquid eo cacteris (Longobardico) exaratum invenitur tanquam sigillo Apocalypsis sit consignatum in dubitationem non liceat revocare, & desint hodie quoque scriptores qui eorumdem formam elementorum valeant imitari, ut plus apud te probat genus carasteris, quam veritas manifestis rationibus confirmata.

I have not seen the answer, which has been made to that little book of Mr Simon's nephew, by the Benedictins of Paris. If I had seen it, I would have extracted out of it all that could serve towards the clearing of this dispute, and I would have faithfully related what both parties have alledged.

GALLUTIUS (JOHN PAUL), a learned Italian astronomer, lived in the XVIIth century. He invented an instrument to observe the celestial Phenomena (a); and published several books of astronomy, and some of physics [A]. He was a fellow of the academy at Venice.

[A] He published several books. The following are those that are come to my knowledge: Della fabbrica & uso di diversi stromenti di Astronomia & Cosmografia, Venice, 1597. Speculum Urmicum, Venice, 1593. Cælestium corporum & rerum ab ipsis pendentium explicatio, Venice, 1605. This work has been wrongfully fathered upon Paulus Galvicius, in the catalogue of Thuanus's library (1). *Theatrum mundi & temporis, Venice, 1589. GALLUTIUS (TARQUIN), born in Italy in 1574, entered himself in the order of the Jesuits in the year 1590, and became very famous among them. He taught rhetoric in the Roman college for ten years, and morals for four. He died at Rome, the twenty eighth of July 1649, in the Grecian college, of which he had been director for eighteen years (a). He is the author of several works [A].

(a) Nathan. Sotuel. in Bibl. Scriptor. Societ. Jesu, pag. 753.

[A] He is the author of several works. He pronounced some orations before the Pope, that were printed. It was he, who made cardinal Bellarmine's funeral oration, which was also printed. Several other orations of his, collected into two volumes, and several of his poems, in three books, have been published. We have also of his two volumes of commentaries on Aristotle's Morals, printed (1) at Paris for Sebastian Cramoisi, in Folio. His book, intitled, Vindicationes Virgilianæ, & Commentarii tres de Tragedia, de Comædia, de Elegia, printed at Rome in the year 1621 (2), is very curious. His design 'was to justify Virgil at any rate. In order to that, he sets down all the objections, which he thought could be made to several places of that poet; but there are several, which he has not proposed with all their force, lest he should have found too much difficulty in answering them. Nevertheless, among some weak arguments, there are others rational enough, attended with a great deal of literature, and several fine maxims concerning the art of poetry (3). Mr Baillet shews here a piece of cunning, which is but too common in all sorts of disputes, but especially with controversies about religion. When they find themselves unable to answer an objection, they leave out of it the principal difficulty; that is, they disarm their adversary before they attack him. Father Gallutius published, at Rome, in the year 1633, the revival of the ancient tragedy, and Crispus's defence; which work is in Italian (4).

This JESUIT is, without doubt, the same author whom Balzac commends in the words you are going to read: I had learned in Italy, says he (5), that for a man to write well, he must propose good patterns to himself; and that good patterns were contained in a certain circle of years, out of which every thing was either in the imperfection of infancy, or in the corruption of old age. With this principle I happened to assist at cardinal Bellarmine's funeral oration, and I considered that great and admirable Jesuit, who, with the dignity of his gestures, the graces of his pronunciation, and the eloquence of his whole body, which accompanied that of his mouth, transported my soul into the ancient republic.

GALLUTIUS (ANGELUS), a native of Macerata in Italy, became a Jesuit in the year 1606, being thirteen years old, and got a reputation by his eloquence and poetry. He taught rhetoric in the Roman college for twenty four years, and died at Rome the twenty eighth of February, 1674, being above eighty years old (a). He is the author of some works [A].

[A] He is the author of some works. To wit, of some Latin orations, and of a History of the wars in the Low-Countries, from the year 1593, till the truce concluded in 1609. This history is in Latin, and was printed at Rome in 1671, in two volumes in folio; and reprinted in Germany, in 4to, in the year 1677.

GAMACHE (PHILIP), in Latin Gamacæus, doctor of the Sorbonne, and professor of divinity in the university of Paris, was accounted one of the most learned divines of the XVIIth century. He was born in the year 1586, and died the twenty first of July 1625 (a). His commentaries upon Thomas Aquinas, intitled Summa Theologica (b), are very much esteemed. See above (c) what he said of St Augustin.

GAMBARA (LAURENCE), a native of Brescia in Italy, was one of the good Latin poets of the XVIIth century. He lived a long while at Rome, in cardinal Alexander Farnese's house (a). He published in the same city a collection of poems, of which which Giraldus, who was a good judge, and a severe critic, gives a great character [A]. Manucius has commended yet more fully Gambara's poems [B], but we must remember, that he bestows those great praises in the letters he writes to the author. Muret went into another extrem [C]; for he spoke of that poet's works with the utmost contempt. It is reported (b), that Gambara had made some verses too free, and somewhat obscene; but that, being raised to the priesthood, he committed them to the flames in the presence of several persons, though the public was extremely impatient to see them. He composed a work, wherein he lays a heavy yoke upon poets [D]; for he will not allow them to meddle with heathenish fables. He translated into Latin verse some Idylls of Bion; but did not succeed well in it, if we rely upon Barthius's judgment (c). He died at Rome, towards the end of the year 1586, being ninety years old (d).

(d) Thuan. ubi supra.

[A] He published a collection of poems, of which Giraldus . . . gives a great character. Let us quote his words: 'Vixit adhuc Laurentius Gambara Riulanus ex Brixia, cujus poemata nuper legi Romæ excusa, non indigna illa quidem lectione bonorum, nam & numeris poeticis, ac figuris, & varia eruditione habetur insignis. Romæ versatur Basilio nostro Zanchio carissimus amicus, ut ex ejus carmine facile cognoscimus, & Zanchi ipsius epistolis (1). — There is still living Laurentius Gambara Riulanus of Brescia, whose poems, printed at Rome, I lately read; indeed they deserve the reading, the author being famous for poetical numbers and figures, and variety of learning. At Rome, he is in great friendship with our Basil Zanchius, as we easily perceive by his poetry, and Zanchius's letters.' You shall see, in the following remark, the confirmation of what you have just now read, touching the friendship of Gambara and Basil Zanchius.

[B] Manucius has commended yet more fully Gambara's poems. He wrote to him a letter (2), soon after the death of Basil Zanchius, at which he supposes him to be much afflicted, considering the intimacy that was between them. He takes notice, that they were looked upon as the two first poets of that time; but it was still undecided which of the two carried the prize: 'Fuit uterque vestrum ad poetiam facultatem natura propensus, ac mirè factus, ingenio verò ita pares, ut, cum nemo tam bonus poeta sit, quin vobis primas in componendis versibus partes tribuat, quam confessionem etiam ab invicem exprimit poematum comparatio, uter tamen utri præflet, nondum satis judicare quicquam possit (3). — Nature formed you both for poetry, but so equal in genius, that, when all other poets, how good soever, give place to you both, which confession a comparison between your poems and theirs extorts from them, whether they will or no, no one can determine which of you both deserves the pre-eminence.' In another letter he exhorts him to continue the poem, of which he had seen the beginning with extrem admiration: 'Patavii dum eras, habebas in manibus egregium illud poema de novis insulis à Columbo inventis: cujus ego cum exordium, multis præsentibus, legissem, admiratus gravitatem, & elegantiam carminis, exclamavi, Cedite Romani, in quo, adhuc qui à me dissentiret, inveni neminem, quo magis te horror, quamquam, ut spero, currentem, ut approperes, habesque rationem non expectationis modo nostræ, verum etiam gloriæ tuæ, cujus habes à natura præclarum seminarium, quod etiam studio excolis, ingenium tuum. Urge igitur, nec institutum dimitte (4). — When you were at Pavia, you had in hand that excellent poem concerning the new islands discovered by Columbus; the beginning of which when I had read in the presence of many, admiring the dignity and elegance of the poetry, I cried out, give place, ye Roman authors: in which I have yet found no one, who dissents from me. Wherefore I exhort you to make haste, and consider, not only our expectation, but your own glory, of which nature has furnished you with an excellent seminary, which you even improve by study, I mean, your wit.' Mr Teissier affirms that Gambara has published this Description of the Discovery of the New World (5). If that be true, Manucius's exhortation was not fruitless.

(5) Teissier, Elog. Tom. II, pag. 71. He only quotes Manucius's letter.

[C] Muret went into another extrem. There is, without doubt, a blameable hyperbole in Paulus Manucius's flatteries; but the opposite exaggeration of Muret is still more faulty. He wrote these two verses at the head of his book of Gambara's poems:

Brixia, vestratis merdosa volumina vatis
Non sunt nostrates tergere digna nates (6).

Father Sirmond had seen that book in the library of the Jesuits at Rome (7). Mr Menage opposes, to that Judgment of Muret, the praises Thuanus has given to Gambara (8). If he had thought on Giraldus and Manucius, he would have made use also of their authority against the dislike he has quoted.

(7) Id. lib. 2.
(8) Id. lib. 2.

[D] He composed a work, wherein he lays a heavy yoke upon poets. Read these words of Mr Baillet: 'he has wrote a Latin treatise, concerning the method of advancing poetry to perfection, printed at Rome, in 4to, the year he died. He pretends to shew in that work, that there lies an indispensable obligation upon all poets, or all versifiers and rhymers pretending to poetry, to retrench, not only all that is obscene, wanton, and free in verses, but likewise all that belongs to fables, and the worship of false deities (9). I refer you to the reflexion, which Mr Menage makes hereupon (10).

GAMON (CHRISTOPHER DE) is no otherwise known to me than by a work, which he published in 1609, entituled La Semaine ou Création du Monde, contre celle du Sieur du Bartas. — The Week or Creation of the World against that of du Bartas. See the remark [A].

[A] See the remark. Mr Bullart, after having much commended du Bartas's Week, adds this: 'but because men's opinions are various, Christopher Gamon, a person famous for his learning, pretended to shew faults in that book, and to lessen it's merit by another he composed on the same subject, and which he published some time after du Bartas's death. However he contended for the prize with him with some respect; nor could he, after all, refuse to the memory of that great man the praises, which he acknowledged to be so justly due to him (1).'

(a) You will see, in the remark [D], the accident which was the pretence of Hebe's being turned out. Charles Stephens relates it, and quotes Servius: Cum Jove, says he, apud Ethiopias exstante, Hebe pocula illi ministrans, perque lubricum minus cautè incedens, cecidisset, revolutisque vestibus obscena superis nudasset, ab officio est amota, ejusque loco Ganymedes subrogatus. Hæc Servius. . . . At Jupiter was feasting with the Ethiopians, Hebe, his cup-bearer, happening to stumble, discovered her nakedness to the gods; for which she was turned out of her office, and Ganymede put in her place. This Servius tells us.

Note, that, in these verses, Homer does not say, as he does elsewhere (3), that Jupiter carried away Ganymede; but that the gods carried him away, to make him cup-bearer to Jupiter. He adds, that Ilus, Ganymede's eldest brother, begot Laomedon, who was Priamus's father. I observe this, because it is necessary to examine whether Cicero be justly censured by those, who charge him with a slip of memory, when he says, that the boy, who was carried away, was son to Laomedon: 'Trois igitur fuit filius Ganymedes non Laomedonis, ut videtur sensisse Cicero 1. Tuscul. lapsus videlicet memoria (quo nomine solent magni viri laborare, qui gravioribus impeditis curis, cum citant vel auctores, vel auctorum testimonia, toto, quod aiant, cœlo aberrant: id quod diligens lector sæpe in Aristotelis deprehendet libris, præsertim de moribus). Verba Cicero's hæc sunt: 'Nec Homerum audio, qui Ganymedem à Diis rapitum ait propter formam, ut Jovi pocula ministraret: non iusta causa, cur Laomedonti tanta fieret injuria. Fingebat hæc Homerus & humana ad deos transferebat, divina mallem ad nos (4) — Ganymede therefore was the son of Troi, not of Laomedon, as Cicero seems to have thought, 1. Tuscul. plainly by a slip of memory, to which great men are very subject, who, being taken up with affairs of importance, when they quote authors, or the testimonies of authors, err very widely: which the careful reader will often discover in Aristotle's books, especially his Ethics. Cicero's words are these: nor do I regard Homer, who says that Ganymede was carried away by the gods, because of his beauty, to be Jupiter's cup-bearer. This great injury is unjustly offered to Laomedon: Homer feigned the story and transferred human things to the gods; I had rather be bad transferred divine things to us.' Tanaquilus Faber pretends, that that censure is unjust; and, to prove it, he alleges (5) a passage of Euripides's Scholiast, wherein an ancient writer testifies, that Ganymede was Laomedon's son. This shews, that, there being different opinions about the matter, Cicero might enjoy the liberty, either to follow Homer, or not to follow him: and therefore, that it is not thro' inadvertency or forgetfulness, but by choice, that he said, that Ganymede was Laomedon's son. With the apologist's leave, methinks the censure is very well grounded; for Cicero relates in that place a tradition, which came from Homer, whom he also quotes. Therefore it is not likely, that he meant to contradict him, with respect to the father of the fine boy, who had been taken away; and so we may say, he believed that Homer made him the son of Laomedon, and conclude that his memory failed him.

(3) Commentar. in Emblemata Alciati, pag. 20, col. 1. Clavius de Verbor. Crit. in Authen. pag. 207, hæc criticat on that fault of Cicero.

Note, that, when I used the indefinite expression, son to a king of Troy, I had in view the variations, which are to be found in authors, as to this matter. Hyginus affirms, in the 224th chapter, that Ganymede was son of Asfaracus; and in the 271st, that he was son to Erichthonius. Some (6) make him Laomedon's brother, and consequently Ilus's son: others (7) make him the son of Dardanus. Homer's opinion is the most common.

[B] Jupiter . . . made him his cup-bearer, . . . and employed him to other criminal uses.] The verses of Homer, which I have quoted in the preceding remark, do not intimate, that Ganymede was stolen away out of any lascivious motive. They only shew, that the beauty of that young man prompted the gods to translate him into heaven, that he might be Jupiter's cup-bearer, and live among immortal beings. It is as much as if we should say, that they thought him so handsome, that he ought to be an ornament to the celestial court, and that, the earth not deservng to possess so great a treasure, they ought to procure him an habitation more worthy of him; that is, a good place in the country of immortal blessedness. All this denotes no lasciviousness: and Homer keeps exactly within the same bounds, when he speaks of Ganymede in the hymn to Venus. He changes indeed some other circumstances; for he supposes, that Jupiter carried him away, in order to make him cup-bearer to the gods; but he does not alter the rest.

Apollonius follows the same notion: and it would argue too suspicious a temper to think otherwise, under pretence of the last words he has made use of; since they are reducible to the same sense which Homer had expressed:

Ganymede was carried away, and what he was then doing [E]. Some say, he was on mount Ida; others place him elsewhere: Some pretend he was a hunting; and others, that he kept a flock. I shall not lose time in relating the allegorical explanations that have been given (b): For those are only conceits, which may be multiplied in infinitum, and by the help of which one finds in every thing whatever he pleases: But I shall not pass over in silence, that some writers have related this as historical matter of fact. They pretend, that Ganymede was really stolen away by a prince, who was in love with him [F]. Those Painters, who represent him as carried away on the back of an eagle, compence for the service performed by him in delivering Hebe, Laomedon's daughter, who was exposed to a sea-monster (28). Note also, that, unknown to Laomedon, Anchises was so cunning as to get of these horses a breed (29). Lastly, note, that, according to some authors (30), the present, which Jupiter made to Ganymede's father, was a golden vine, wrought by Vulcan. For the rest, if the authorities before-mentioned (31), touching this young man's dedication, should not suffice, we might add to them the testimony of Pindar (32), and that of Lucian (33), besides this commentary of Servius: 'Honores dixit, vel propter ministerium poculorum, ad quod receptus est, remota Hebe filia Junonis, quæ Jovi bibere ministrabat, vel ob hoc quod inter sydera collocatus, aquarum nomine accipiet, & non ob hoc tantum irascitur Juno, sed quod violatus sit ut divinos honores consequeretur (34)'. You see, in these words of Servius, two remarkable things: first, that Hebe, whose office it was to fill drink to the gods, was deprived of that employment; and that Ganymede was preferred to her place: secondly, that he was placed among the stars, and was that sign of the zodiac, which is called Aquarius. This is observed by Hyginus (35). What a mortification was it for poor Juno, to see her husband's darling fill the place from which her daughter Hebe was turned out! The misfortune, which had befallen Hebe, was indeed the pretence, for which she was turned out, but not the true cause. She happened to fall, and shew all the had, whilst the gods were at table (36): whereupon Jupiter, who desired passionately to make Ganymede his cup-bearer, improved this opportunity to turn away that unfortunate maid.

[E] There are different opinions as to the place, from whence Ganymede was carried away, and what he was then doing.] Lucian (37) supposes, that Ganymede was a shepherd on mount Ida, when Jupiter stole him away. Virgil supposes, that he was a hunting the place, where the rape was committed: see the following remark.

[F] Some eritors pretend, that Ganymede was really stolen away, by a prince who was in love with him. Herodian relates, that the place called Pessinus in Phrygia, was so called, either because the image of the mother of the gods was dropt down there from heaven; or because the combat, which was fought there between Ilus and Tantalus, cost many people their lives. Those two princes, the one a Phrygian, the other a Lydian, made war upon one another, either because they could not agree about the boundaries of their dominions (45), or rather because Tantalus had stolen away Ganymede. The latter lost his life in the field of battle, in the hands of his brother, and those of his ravisher, the one pulling him one way, the other another. His body not being found, his adventure was represented as something marvellous and divine; and from thence was framed the fable of his being carried away by Jupiter (46). We read in Eusebius's chronicle (47), that, upon the account of Ganymede's rape, there arose a war between Tros, the father of that young boy, and Tantalus: which is affirmed upon the credit of a writer named Phanocles. He was an Erotical author (48), or, to explain myself, a compiler of amorous adventures. Orosius has spoken of that action of Tantalus in these words (49): "Neque mirum nunc enumerare opus est Tantalum & Pelopis faturpia, & fabulas turpiores: quorum Tantalus rex Phrygiurum Ganyemdem Trois Dardaniorum regis filium cum flagitiosissimè rapuisset, majore concertu certaminis fœditate detinuit, sicut Phœnacles poetæ confirmat, qui maximum bellum excitatum ob hoc fuisse commemorat: five quia hunc ipsum Tantalum, utpote aesclem deorum, videri vult raptum pernum ad libidinem Jovis familiari lenocinio preparasse, qui ipsum quoque filium Peleopem epulis ejus non dubitavit impendere. — Nor need I mention the scandalous actions, and more scandalous stories, of Tantalus and Pelops, of whom Tantalus, king of the Phrygians, having most wickedly ravished Ganymede, son of Trois, king of the Dardanians, detained him for a more shameful purpose, as is confirmed by Phœnacles the poet, who relates that this was the occasion of a very great war: because, perhaps, he thought, that Tantalus, as being an attendant on the gods, might have prepared the boy for Jupiter's lust, and furnished a dinner to his guests.

“since be made no scruple to serve up his own son Pelops as that god's table.” Euthalius (50) having said, that, according to some authors, Tantalus had ravished Ganymede, adds, that others charged Minos with that rape. If we consult Suidas, we shall learn many circumstances of that attempt of Minos. There we shall see, that that king of Crete went to pay a visit to Tros; and, being informed, that that prince's three sons were a hunting, he declared, he had a mind to hunt with them. He had no sooner seen Ganymede, than he conceived a most violent passion for him; and, having caused him to be carried away, he put him on board one of the ships he had sent before into the Granicus, and returned into Crete. Ganymede was so concerned at his misfortune, that he ran himself through with his own sword. Minos buried him in a temple; and for that reason it was given out, that this young man conversed with the gods (51). Euthalius (52) relates the particulars in another manner. He says, that Ganymede, having been ravished, hanged himself; and that the gods made his father believe, that a whirlwind and a cloud had carried him away, to be Jupiter's cup-bearer. You will find, in Athenæus, that Echemenes, who wrote a book touching what concerned the isle of Crete, affirmed, that Ganymede was not ravished by Jupiter, but by king Minos. Ludovicus Vives affirms, that Tantalus, having stolen that young boy, transported him into the isle of Crete, and gave him to Jupi-

Suidas on the Word Ἰλίου, and Cedrenus also, relate, that king Tros, having subdued several princes, his neighbours, sent his son Ganymede, attended by fifty men, to make a sacrifice of thanksgiving, in a certain temple of Jupiter, which was in the dominions of Tantalus. But Tantalus, supposing that Ganymede came as a spy, to view the strength of his kingdom, made him prisoner; whereupon Ganymede fell sick and died (55).

[G] The painters, who represent him as carried away on the back of an eagle, are mistaken, and do not consult antient authors.] Salmastius (56) has censured that mistake: for he says, that, according to the ancient poets, the eagle took up Ganymede by the hair between his talons. The author whom he explains (57) says the same. Note, that Martial supposes, that the eagle was afraid of hurting Ganymede.

An ancient carver represented this wonderfully well (59). A learned Englishman has followed the common error of painters, in a book, whose French translation was printed at Roan in the year 1656, with the title of, Le Monde dans la Lune; that is, the world in the Moon. This is what he observes (60): If there be so great a bird in Madagascar, as Paulus Venetus relates*, the feathers of whose wings are twelve foot long, and which can take up into the air a horse with his rider, as easily as one of our kites could take up a little mouse; it were then but instructing one of these birds to carry a man, and he might ride as far on his back as Ganymede did on an eagle.

GARASSE, (FRANCIS), a native of Angoulesme, became a Jesuit in the year 1601 (a). He made himself much talked of by the zeal he shewed against libertine wits, and against the enemies of his society: But he inveighed principally against the poet Theophile, and against Pasquier. He wanted neither genius, nor reading; and having a great deal of fire, a fruitful imagination, and good lungs, he passed for a great preacher. He was very proper to maintain a cause in the pulpit; for his turns of wit, and his way of delivery, made very strong impressions, considering the taste of that age: But he ought not to have meddled with writing; or, if he could not renounce the title of author, he ought to have made only Latin verses, or have exercised himself on some subject of little importance: For, having adventured to write on the most sublime truths, which libertines may call in question, he has contributed less to convert that sort of people, than to confirm them in their errors [A]; because, he perpetually departed from the gravity, which becomes such matters, and because he made use of bad proofs, and false quotations. He found himself exposed to the criticism of several formidable pens. Pasquier's sons vindicated their father with great stateliness [B]. But he, who wrote with most vehemence against this Jesuit, was the

[A] He contributed less to convert the Libertines, than to confirm them in their errors.] This is the title of a book he published at Paris, in the year 1623. The curious doctrine of the wits, or would be such, of this age; containing several maxims pernicious to the state, religion, and good manners; confuted and overthrown by father Francis Garasse, of the society of JESUS. He thought he had quite confounded those libertines; but he was soon acquainted, that, according to the judgment of the public, his book was much more proper to foment atheism, than to destroy it. The judgment and censure of that work was addressed to the Jesuits (1); and the author tells them, that people could not believe, that they, who were the first and strongest champions of truth, should have chosen father Garasse to defend it. That man, being better qualified for a satirical poet, or a force-writer, than for a catholic doctor, has lately written a book, which carries a specious title, against Atheists; but which, to speak sincerely, and as it were in the presence of GOD, is a sink of impiety, a common sewer of prophanations, a collection of buffoonries and facetious jests, a malicious and slanderous satire against many men of probity and merit (2). After having said several things, in the same strain, to characterise that book, he asked the Jesuits, whether those be the means to defend the venerable truths of our religion; whether those be the true weapons to combat atheism; or whether those be not rather the instruments of the ruin of souls, and the inventions of the father of lies, to render truth ridiculous and more contemptible amongst his wretched supporters. The same year 1624, Naudé published a book (3), wherein we find these words (4): As for father Garasse, it is true, he has taken some of their articles out of father Robert, which he has so aptly brought into a parallel with the ways of the libertines of our days, that, both upon that score, and for the industriousness of his wit, and variety of his learning, I am sorry he should undergo the censure, which is passed upon all those, who have shewn their learning in that matter: that is, that no body ever wrote better against the atheists, than the recorders, who draw up the sentence of their condemnation: if, however, according to the saying of Tertullian, the church, full of mercy, Non quaerat potius pudorem suffundere, quam sanguinem effundere. He returns to the charge in the last chapter of his book, in this manner: I have some monsters to encounter, says he (5), . . . who, through an abominable indolence, draw impiety out of the book of the Curious Doctrine; which, by an unparalleled impudence and temerity, they brand with the most pernicious title of the Art of Atheism; which gives me occasion to deplore the misfortune of our age, which has attained to that degree of malice, that it deprives us even of the liberty of opposing the greatest impieties, and of confuting them by the most common and lawful means; since corruption is so very great, that, when a religious society, jealous of the honour and integrity of their religion, Voluerunt, as Lactantius says, posteris etiam approbare, quanta pietate defenderint religionem, auctoritatem religionum ipsarum testantur do minuerunt.

[B] Pasquier's sons (6) vindicated their father with great stateliness.] They made no noise, till Garasse had shewn his obstinacy in falling foul upon him (7). He had written a book (8) against his Recherches the year 1622. The next year, he abused him in a hundred places of his Curious Doctrine; and went on in the same strain, in the year 1624, in his answer to the prior Ogier. Thereupon they lost all patience, and published a very violent book against that Jesuit, which they addressed to him, wherever he might be. The reason of this address was, because Francis Garasse had dedicated his book to the late Stephen Pasquier, wherever he might be; for, (said he) having never been able to know your religion, I was at a loss which way you were gone at your departure from quier, abbot of St Cyran [C]. Some pretend, that, upon that score, father Garasse was the Helen of the war between the Jesuits and Janfenists [D]. The last action of his life was very fine. He preffingly asked leave of his superiors to tend upon the infected with the plague, during a dismal pestilence, which raged in Poitiers; and, having obtained it, and contracted the disease in that charitable office, he died at the hospital, among the infected [E], the fourteenth of June 1631, being forty six years old (b). He had reconciled himself with a good grace to the prior Ogier [F], and to Balzac [G]. Placcius has been led into a mistake by the title of his Rabelais Reformed [H].

this life, and therefore I am constrained to write to you at a venture, and to direct this packet, WHERE-EVER YOU BE. To pay him in the same coin, they accosted him thus (9). This has made me use the same freedom with you, and has forced me to direct this packet to you, IN WHAT PLACE SO-EVER YOU MAY BE: for, not knowing whether you be at the service-tree, (which you call a tavern of honour, and where you own you have had many a belly-full at free-cost) or at the town of Clamar, in the suburb of St Germain; (where your name is written in so fair characters on all the mantle-trees of the chimney) or in some other place of that nature; I am constrained to send you this book at a venture, and to address it to you, in what place soever you be.

[C] He who wrote with most vehemence against this Jesuit, was the abbot of St Cyran. [H] He attacked the volume in Folio, which Garasse had published, in 1625, with the title of, La Somme Theologique des Veritez capitales de la Religion Chrestienne: His criticism (10) is intitled, La Somme des Fautes & Faussetez capitales contenues en la Somme Theologique du Pere Francis Garasse. It was to contain four volumes: I have only seen the two first, and an abridgment of the fourth, and, if I am not mistaken, that is all that was printed. The first tome contains the faults, which Garasse had committed in quoting the scripture, St Austin, and St Basil of Selucia. The second contains the faults in the quotations of the other fathers, and secular authors. The third was to contain the faults in divinity, philosophy, chronology, cosmography, &c. The fourth was to contain several heresies, errors, impieties, irreverences, buffooneries, and insupportable boasting. The author dedicates his book to cardinal Richelieu, and says, in his epistle dedicatory, that he honours the society of the Jesuits, as one of the strongest companies of the son of God's army, and which surpasses in courage, on days of battle, both the invincible squadron of Macedonia, and the inseparable band of lovers, who died together for the public good in Lacedaemon (11). He gives himself, in the king's licence, the name of Alexander de l'Excluse (12). I do not think it easy to find so good a criticism as that is. We see in it an exact and profound learning, a solid judgment, and a wonderful sagacity in discovering the faults of a writer. It is the most useful book a man can read, especially if he designs to set up for an author, that supports his reasonings by authorities, allusions, comparisons, &c.

[D] It is pretended, that . . . father Garasse was the Helen of the war between the Jesuits and Janfenists. [E] It is what the Janfenists pretend: for here is what one of them has published (13). 'In the year 1626, it (14) began with the book of a Jesuit called Garasse, intituled, Somme des Veritez capitales de la Religion Chrestienne. The late abbot of St Cyran, having found in it a prodigious number of falsifications of the scripture, and of the fathers, and of heretical and impious opinions, thought that the honour of the church required of him, that he should take upon him to confute it, tho' at the same time his modesty made him resolve to conceal his name as he always did in his other books. The first part of that work being in the press, the noise it made every where gave occasion to people to examine more nicely Garasse's book. The rector of the university made complaints about it to the Faculty, who named commissioners to examine that book. But this noise having given the alarm to the Jesuits, they made it appear, that it is no easy undertaking to confute the book of a Jesuit: for their cabal prevailed so far with the magistrates, that the book of St Cyran was a long time stopped.' The author adds, that Garasse picked out himself fifty three propositions in his book, the most easy to maintain that he could find, and of which not three of them were of the number of those, which the abbot of St Cyran found fault with in his work; and, having afterwards formed a censure to his fancy, he confuted it at his ease; and by that artifice he dazzled, for some time, the eyes of the world, and perplexed the examination of his book, on which the Sorbonne was intent. So that the abbot of St Cyran had much ado to remove the stop, which the Jesuits had put to the publication of his confutation, and to undeceive the world, who had suffered themselves to be imposed upon by the artifice of Garasse. However, he compassed it at last, and, in spite of all the cabal of the society, and the long delays, which were granted to father Garasse, to retract what he had advanced, his book was censured, as containing several heretical, erroneous, scandalous, and rash propositions; several falsifications of passages of scripture, and of the holy fathers, falsely quoted, and wrested from their true sense; and an infinite number of expressions unworthy to be written and read by christians and divines. The Jesuits shewed . . . some sort of prudence in this affair . . . they were not obstinate in supporting their father Garasse, but confined him far from Paris to one of their houses, where he was no more heard of; and so they terminated that affair. And happy had they been, if, by stifling that difference, they had also stifled in their hearts the resentment they conceived thereupon against the abbot of St Cyran, which has since engaged them in so many horrible and violent proceedings.

[F] He was reconciled . . . to the prior Ogier. As soon as Garasse's apology was published, the prior prepared himself to reply; but there were mediators of peace, who terminated the dispute. The Jesuit prevented his antagonist by a letter full of civilities: Which Ogier answered in the same strain. The public was presented with those letters, as soon as they were written (16). Father Alegambe has committed here a fault; for which Monsieur Ogier would have demanded reparation, if he had been as nice as Janfenius's relations (17); for it plainly results from Alegambe's narrative (18) that Ogier had been an heretic, and was converted to the church of Rome. Southwell has not corrected Alegambe's fault.

[G] . . . and to Balzac. The account of their reconciliation, and the letters they wrote one to another, are to be seen at the beginning of the Somme Theologique of father Garasse.

[H] Placcius has been led into a mistake by the title of his Rabelais Reformed. That author has wrote a book, de Scriptis & Scriptoribus anonymis atque pseudonymis. He had reason to put Francis Garasse among the anonymous authors; for there are several works of that Jesuit, to which he did not put his name. Such was the book he intituled, Rabelais Reformed. Mr Placcius fancies, that Garasse did by Rabelais, what many have done by Martial and Catullus, which they have published, after they had expunged all obscene expressions from them. The works of Rabelais, says he (19), Ut ut jucunda, sic obscenis aliisque scandalosis plena, castigata, imo castrata, titulo Rabelaisii Reformati, Pictavii & Bruxellis, in 8vo, nomine reformatantis Francisci Garassii, scriptis aliis notissimi Jesuitae Galli, non adjecto prodere, docente Alegambe, pag. 124. The truth is, that the Rabelais Reformed of father Garasse is a book of controversy; wherein he speaks satirically of several ministers,

He employ'd against poets a maxim which is very good at the bottom, but which was turned against himself [1]. He pretended, that it is not a good excuse for prophane thoughts, to say, that they are not written in prose, but in verse.

I should have said, that he is author of a diffamatory libel, intituled, The Banquet of the wife Men, composed against the honour of one of the first magistrates of France (c). He, did not put his name to it; but however, he was discovered to be the author of it: Alegambe does not deny it (d). He was sharply censured for publishing the tale of the tapestry of Joan d'Albret, which I have related in the article of that queen (e). It was pretended, that his calumny in that respect was an injury done to Henry the great, and Lewis XIII (f). They affirmed, that he had called that princess libertine, prophane, ridiculous, a wanton, and that he had loaded her with a thousand other calumnies (g). The accusation was groundless, and he sufficiently justified himself (b). He ministers, particular of Peter du Moulin, whom he accuses of being an imitator of Rabelais, and a Rabelais risen from the dead. See what a man exposes himself to, when he speaks of a book, which he knows only by it's title.

[1] He employed against poets a maxim, which is very good at the bottom, but which was turned against himself. See how he begins in the confutation of a sonnet of Theophile: 'To answer these impieties, I must, by way of anticipation, enervate a foolish and weak defence, which many have in their mouths, touching the impieties of that writer: for, provided they may say, that such things are said in verse, they think the crime is advantageously palliated, because it is not in prose; as if rhyme could blot out all impieties, and authorize wits to pronounce blasphemies. It is true, those impieties and impertinences, which I am to confute, are in verse; I am sensible of it: but, for that very reason, I look upon them to be more criminal, than if they were written in bare prose; for they are thereby the more studied, enquired after, and consequently delivered in more efficacious, forcible, and elaborate terms, which make a greater impression on the minds of the readers. Was not Cleanthes used to say, that the voice, which comes out of a flute, and a trumpet, hath a greater force, than that, which comes barely out of one's mouth; and that the thoughts, which are darted by a well turned verse, are more forcible, more durable, and stronger, than those, which are expressed by a period in prose, wherein the words are generally languishing. I have fully answered this ridiculous objection, in the twentieth chapter of my apology; wherein I have shewn, that an impiety in verse is the more pernicious (20).' Pray observe, that I have said, that, at the bottom, that maxim is very good: for I do not pretend to adopt it in so great a latitude as that Jesuit has done, nor for all the reasons which he alleges. I am thoroughly persuaded, that, upon a thousand occasions, it is not so great a sin to breach loose maxims of morality in verse, as to propose them in prose, and that we ought to abate much of the weight of our censures, when it is a poet who speaks. A man, who should maintain dogmatically heretical propositions, would be a thousand times more criminal, than if he should convey them in a piece of poetry. There is many a poem, wherein the author advances a thousand things, which he does not believe, and which he would never reduce into a formal disputation, and would not even say in verse, if he thought, that his readers would look upon them, not as witty conceits, but as tenets, and articles of faith. He takes more pains, I confess, in turning and polishing them, than if he wrote them in prose; his mind is therefore more intent upon them; he meditates more deeply upon them; but yet, after all, this is not always the true picture of what passes in his heart; he does not pretend to give either his confession of faith, or a model of belief to those that read him: and it must be acknowledged, that men are not such fools, as to let themselves be as easily persuaded of an heresy delivered by a poet, as of an heresy delivered in a pulpit, or in a dogmatical work. Therefore I do not adopt father Garasse's reasons, though I agree with him in the main part and bottom of his hypothesis, that an ill maxim, either against sound morals, or against speculative doctrines of faith, is very criminal, in what sort of poetry soever it be proposed. I own also, that the licentiousness of a poet, in advancing several thoughts against morality and religion, may produce ill effects.

And I even acknowledge, that the beauties and charms of poetry sometimes render a poison more pernicious than it would be in prose. One cannot too much lament the mischiefs, which the poetical impieties of Homer, and his imitators, introduced among the heathens. Men of sense and penetration were sensible of it, and loudly complained of it. They murmured with reason against the poet's ascribing to the gods the same crimes, which are committed upon earth (21).

I have quoted elsewhere (22) a passage of Plato; and here is a fine one out of Cicero: 'Nec enim multo absurdiora sunt ea, quæ poetarum vocibus fusa, ipsa suavitate nocuerunt, qui & ira inflammatis, & libidine furentes induxerunt deos, feceruntque ut eorum bella, prælia, pugnas, vulnera videremus: odia præterea, dissidia, discordias, ortus, interitus, querelas, lamentationes, effusus in omni intemperantia libidines, adulteria, vincula, cum humano genere concubitus, mortalesque ex immortalibus procreatos (23). — Nor are those things much more absurd, which, uttered by the poets, have done mischief by the very pleasantness of the fiction; such as introducing the gods inflamed with anger, or raging with lust, and describing to us their wars, combats, and wounds; as also their enmities, dissensions, quarrels, births, deaths, lamentations, intemperate lusts, adulteries, bonds, intercourse with women, and mortals sprung from an immortal fire.' The dramatic pieces, wherein the gods were so unworthily represented, excited a thousand irregular passions. Cicero confessed it; and St Augustin made use of his testimony. 'Quomodo tanta animi & morum mala, bonis præceptis & legibus, vel imminentia prohiberent, vel infusa extirpanda curarent Dei tales: qui etiam seminanda & augenda flagitia curaverunt, talia vel sua, vel quasi sua facta per theatricas celebritates populis innotescere cupientes: ut tantam autoritate divina sua sponte nequissima libido accenderetur humana: frustra hoc exclamante Cicero, qui cum de poetis ageret, ad quos cum accessisset, inquit: Clamor & approbatio populi, quasi magni cujusdam & sapientis magistris, quas illi obducunt tenebras? quos invehunt metus? quas inflammant cupiditates (24)? — How can such gods prohibit, or extirpate, such great vices by wholesome precepts or laws, who take care even to implant and propagate them, desiring to have their own vices represented on the theatre to the people: so that human lusts are spontaneously set on fire, as it were by divine authority; Cicero exclaiming after this manner to no purpose, when he is speaking of the poets; what darkness do the applause and approbation of the people induce? what fears do they excite? what lusts do they inflame?' Cicero complains, in one of his books, that the reading of the poets effeminates the heart, and weakens all the nerves of virtue. 'Videsne poetæ quid mali afferant? Lamentantes inducunt fortissimos viros. Mollunt animos nostros; ita sunt deinde dulces, ut non legantur modo sed etiam ediscantur. Sic ad malam domesticam disciplinam, vitamque umbratilem, & delicatam quum accesserunt etiam poëtæ, nervos omnis virtutis elidunt. Recte igitur à Platone educantur ex ea civitate, quam finxit ille, quum mores optimos, & optimum reip. statum exquireret (25). — Do you see the mischiefs arising from poets? They introduce whining heroes: they effeminate our minds: besides they are so pleasing, that they are not only read, but learned by heart. Thus when to bad domestic discipline, and a luxurious life, the reading of the poets is added, there is an end of all virtue. Justly therefore has Plato banished them from that state, which he formed, when in search of the best 'manners, and the best form of government.' Presently after, he observes, as a great abuse, the custom of causing such authors to be learnt by heart by the Roman youth. 'At vero nos, docti scilicet & Græcia, hæc à pueritia legimus & discimus; Hanc eruditio- nem liberalem & doctrinam putamus (26).'

'Greece has taught us to read and learn these from our childhood, and this we call a liberal education and learning.' Plutarch was of another opinion: he thought, that reading of the poets might be very useful (27); but he is forced to own, that it is only because they contradict themselves (28). Their tenets, says he, are sometimes good, and sometimes bad; sometimes impious, and sometimes pious: that is the reason why their authority is doubtful, and has not weight enough to do harm; and it is our duty to pick out what they advance for the good cause. Αἱ δὲ τῶν ποιητῶν ὑπερπαιδείας πρὸς αὐτὰς ἀναπαύσασθαι τὴν ψυχὴν, ἐκ ἑσῶν ἰσχυρὰν ἰσθὴν γινώσκειν πρὸς τὸ βλάπτον· οὗ μὲν ἐν αὐτοῖς τοιούτοις συνήγιντο ἑκκατὸν ποιεῖν τὰς ἀντιλογίας, δὲ τὸ βέλτιον συνυποθεῖν. Ποιῶντα γὰρ ἐν ἀντιθέσει τοῖς λόγοις διδόντων δὲ διὰ τὴν ἀντιθεσὶν, οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν αὐτοῖς ἡ ἀλήθεια, ἀλλὰ τὸ ἀντιθετικὸν καὶ τὸ ἀντιθετικόν.

what the poets advance in favour of vice, than to pick out what they say in praise of virtue. Besides, their contradictions lead us to believe, that their gravest and most devout maxims are only starts of fancy, of which they themselves are not persuaded. We imagine that they deliver them only because they have found them susceptible of all the beauties and majesty of poetry. And, indeed, there are poets, who, having no piety, or belief, have nevertheless made magnificent and admirable verses on the most sublime truths of religion. They chose that subject, because it gave them an opportunity to display the finest phrases, and the most shining figures of their art. Another time, they would chuse a subject quite opposite, provided it should favour the enthusiasms of their fancy; that is, provided it should furnish them with such Ideas, as they should think themselves capable to express well. Now what weight can the found doctrine have, which we find in authors, whom we believe to be of that temper?

Let us take notice, by the way, that modern poetry has excited many murmurings. I have related elsewhere (30) the complaints, which Thuanus and Mezerai have made against the poets of Henry the second's court. I might also have quoted the Sieur de la Planchette; for here is a fine passage out of his book: 'What aggravated, in that matter, the wrath of God was, that the knowledge of humane learning (a singular means, ordained by God to teach us to know him rightly, and consequently for the preservation of human kind), having been brought again into France by king Francis, more famous for that, than for any other thing done in his reign, was turned, by malicious and curious wits, into an occasion of all manner of wickedness; which was found principally in certain great wits addicted to French poetry, who, at that time, appeared in shoals; whose writings, impure and obscene, and full of blasphemies, are the more detestable, as they carry with them such soft allurements, as may entice, not only to all manner of lasciviousness, but also to all manner of horrible impiety, all those, who have them in their hands (31).' Add to all this, the bitter complaints of Gabriel de Puy Herbeau (32); and the reasons, which engaged Pope Hadrian VI not to favour poets (33). If you would have instances of their prophaneations, do but read Sorel's commentary on the Extravagant Shepherd (34).

wherein he addresses himself to Neptune and Thetis, whom he calls Numina, and where he addresses himself to nature as to a goddess. The same author refers him to his own maxim, and to St Austin's retractations. That great saint was sorry (37) that he had given to the muses the name of goddesses, though he did it only as a witticism. The same Garasse is censured for having excited beastly and lascivious ideas, in the poem he had made, in the form of an Epithalamium, on the divine and humane nature of CHRIST. I omit that he was censured for his prayers in prose; wherein he spoke of the wanderings of Ulysses, of the laurals of Thrace, and of his talent for poetry.

[K] He was censured . . . for having quoted indecent passages. He pardoned no obscenities, says an author (38), which he could not so perfectly know without having practised them. He replied (39), that this was to reason wrong, and shewed it, among other instances, by that of the lawyers, who write down at length robberies, that have been judged and condemned by the court (40), and neither approve, nor practise them; and by that of the casuists, who write down minutely all kinds of immodesty, from simple thoughts to incest and bestiality: which they know only by theory, and by the report of the guilty (41). 'It was urged against him (42), that St Austin says very elegantly, that de pudendis rebus, cogit necessitas loqui; honestas, circumloqui: That the weakness and necessity of man often oblige him to speak of leud and immodest things, but that decency requires him to speak of them with circumlocution and periphrasis.' Here is his apology (43): 'To say nothing of an hundred instances of this incomparable doctor, in which he speaks of the god Stercutius and his relation Cloacina, he expresses himself in terms much more material than those they reprehend in me, who never dreamed of any impurity in them. Let them answer me as to this observation of St Austin, in the fourteenth book of his Civitas Dei, cap. xxiv. Non nulli ab imo sine pudore ullo tam numerosos edunt sonitus, ut etiam ex illa parte cantare videantur. And those, who relate the pretty observations of Vives concerning the ass, who had drank the moon, to shew me my pretended impertinence, let them take the pains to read what Vives says on this head, concerning the young German, who did wonders that way.' He had said, in his book (44), that, publishing these impious maxims, he had done nothing but what had been practised by the saints and fathers of the primitive church against the Gnostics and Carpocratians (45). His censor (46) found three disparities in this comparison: the first is, that the Gnostics and Carpocratians taught, as articles of faith, what the fathers attribute to them. It was therefore necessary to refute, and consequently to relate, those impious doctrines. But the prophaneations, recited by Garasse, are barely actions and words of wicked and debauched minds, who never affirmed they had either said or committed them (47). The second is, that the fathers never relate, but with regret, the impure heresies, which they are obliged to refute. Garasse, on the contrary, has raked together an heap of ordure (48). In the third place, the fathers wrote for learned men (49). St Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, wrote in Greek, which was neither the language of the western empire, nor that of Gaul in particular (50). At that time, books could not be communicated so easily as they are at present, through the convenience of printing (51), and the Christians and Catholics led an angelical life. . . . They would have seen and heard these impieties and prophaneations with an incredible detestation and aversion (52). None of these circumstances could excuse Garasse. He did not reply with exactness: he supposed, that the first disparity consisted in this, that the fathers were under a necessity of publishing these abominations; inasmuch as they were public, and as it were authorized by the world (53); and he replied, that 'the immodest actions of Carpo- cras were never so known in the towns of Greece, as the impudences of Theophile, the blasphemies of Vannini, and the impieties of Charron, are known by France (54).' You see, he forgets the principal point of the difference; for the impieties and obscenities of Theophile were by no one maintained as tenets of religion. This did not take away a right to refute them, and I wonder Garasse did not say, that a faction of debauchees, who impudently publish prophane and impure maxims, to corrupt youth, do not deserve more countenance, than dogmatizing heretics; that therefore the books of these debauchees ought to be cried down, and the passages cited, to avoid the imputation of calumniating them. He has said nothing upon the second disparity, and he even affirms (55), that his censor has alledged but two. Nevertheless, he might defend himself two ways, by denying, that, purposely, he had raked together an heap of filth, and by maintaining, that the reluctance, with which the ancient fathers displayed them, could not free them from blame, if, at the bottom, it was a pernicious and sinful thing. He strongly attacked the third disparity: it is there he triumphs. It is false and ridiculous, says he (56); for the censor 'says, that the ancient fathers, who have made public, by their writings, the abominable and scandalous actions of the Carpocratians; did it, not in their mother-tongue, but in a language unknown and little used in the world, and that it was only for the learned: and of his reason he gives us a wonderful instance, since, says he, St Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, did not write in Latin, which was the language then known in France; but he wrote in Greek, that he might not be understood by the vulgar, nor expose the vileness of heretics to the knowledge of all the world. Now that St Irenæus wrote in Greek I will not dispute; I know it very well, thank God: but I say, it was not for the reason alledged by our prior, but because he was a Greek born, as his name witnesses, and that he was better acquainted with this language than the Latin: for, if the reason, alledged by our prior, were admitted, it would follow, that St Epiphanius and Theodoret, who were Greeks by nation, and who wrote, among the Greeks, the impurities and turpitudes of the atheists and heretics of their time, ought to have written in Latin or in German, not to have been understood by the vulgar: yet, for all this, they wrote in Greek, a language familiar to all the people of that country, more abominations, than there are in fifteen volumes as large as mine. But what would my gentleman say to doctor Cochleus, who has written, in German, a book intituled, Luther with seven Heads, which was afterwards translated into Latin, in which he relates, like an honest German, speaking to Germans, all the impurities, which Luther had sowed in Germany, so far as to produce infamous proverbs, and horrible sayings, which the immodest women had in their mouths; nay, he goes so far as to say, that in all the towns of Germany they now only talked a certain jargon peculiar to bawds and pimps; the particulars of which he cites, which I forbear to produce, tho' I am not ignorant of them, having read them in the book of this doctor, not without horror, so prophane are they and filthy.

Note. He denies that he has made use of the word lavement in a new sense (57). 'At this word, says (57) We do not find the word be (58), my enemies write, that I have indecent words in my mouth, and that I am void of shame; to whom I reply . . . in justification of myself, that they make me more knowing and less innocent than I am; for they imagine, that I am conversant in the language of physicians and apothecaries; but thank God I know no more of it than the vulgar. By the word lavement I understand only what I have learned grossly from vulgar usage, and ancient books of physic, which are not so delicate as the modern; for, in the old French versions of Leonardus Fuchsius, I see, that the word lavement signifies only gargles; as when he says in the fifth, that, for the tooth-ach, we should take a gargle of water of plantain, and gargle our mouth with it. That, if the modern apothecaries be so finical to have prophaned this word, I am not obliged to make use of it in their indecent sense: for, otherwise, when I talk of hypocrits, in divinity, I must be cautious how I use this term, since the apothecaries have prophaned it, applying it dishonourably to the urine of their patients; and, consequently, if I borrow a comparison from the hypocrits, I ought to be accused of expressing myself with impurity.' This is to pretend great delicacy and innocence, to deny that we understand the modern sense of the word lavement; a word invented only to succeed other terms too gross. It has been a long time in fashion among the most polite persons. They begin not to be so fond of it (59).

(5) Id. Ibid. pag. 10.

[A] He was of a more illustrious birth than some authors have said. It may be proved for certain, that he was descended from RORERT DE LA GARDIE, lord of Ruffol and la Gardie, who, in 1382, married Anne de l'Estandart. The successors of that Robert, down to JAMES DE LA GARDIE, father to our Pontus, and husband of Catherine de Sainte Colombe (1), were married into very noble and ancient families; and namely into that of Bellegarde, from which, by the woman's side, sprung the marshal de Bellegarde, governor of the marquisate of Saluces under Henry III (2). You will find the particular circumstances of all this in the life of Pontus de la Gardie, composed by Mr Oernhielm, historiographer of Sweden, and published in the year 1690. He quotes Thuanus, who says, Pontus Gardius nobili loco apud nos in Petrocoriis natus (3); and Mezerei, whose words he translates thus: Pater ejus (Ponti de la Gardie) illustri domo ortus prope Ruesium in Septimania. He believes, without reason, that the Petrocorii of Thuanus are now a part of Languedoc (4): He had done better to censure that famous historian, who, without doubt, meant, that Pontus de la Gardie was born in Perigord, which is not true. Perhaps his mistake proceeds from his having heard, that Pontus was born at Peiregoux; which is a lordship in the diocese of Caltres, that belonged to the family of la Gardie, and was always the share of the eldest son (5). Mr Oernhielm takes notice of it (5); and adds, that la Gardie is situate between Caltres and the Albigeois. This is an error, pardonable in one, who is so far distant from that country. Caltres is in the Albigeois; and so the situation of la Gardie was not well marked; and it ought to have been placed in the diocese of Carcassonne. However this be, it cannot be denied, that this author quotes two very illustrious French historians, who aver, that Pontus de la Gardie was of a good family. It is also most certain, that he justly censures Father Maimbourg, who has said, That fortune took pleasure in raising Pontus de la Gardie, from a mean birth, to the first employments of the kingdom of Sweden: for, having left the village, where he was born, near Rieux in Languedoc, he followed arms, to which his inclination led him, and went as a common soldier into Scotland, under the lord d'Orfel, lieutenant of Francis II (6). There is no body, who, from these words, will not imagine, that our Pontus was at the most the son of a tradesman, or country attorney: for there is nothing intimating that his father was a gentleman. Therefore we may say, that Maimbourg is guilty of a gross fault; which is not the only one he has committed. Mezerei affirms, Rieux, in Languedoc, a poor soldier of fortune, being desirous to see the world, went into Scotland, under the command of the Sieur d'Orfel, lieutenant of Francis II; and therefore he was not there as a common soldier. His general was called Oysel, not Orfel; and, because Oysel was sent into Scotland by Henry II, Maimbourg had done well not to have mentioned Francis II; for that makes one lose the true thread of chronology. Note, that all these faults have been blindly copied out of Florimond de Remond (7). If king Francis II, Mr Varillas had copied them with the same exactness, Plor de Remond, Vieillesse de France, he had not encreased the number of them; but adventuring to walk some steps without a guide, he has lost his way. 'La Gardie, says he (8), was a Frenchman, born in the province of Languedoc, and in a pag. m. 495.' village of the bishopric of Rieux, near that little town. He had dedicated himself very young to the profession of arms, and had served a long time as a common soldier. He was still in that condition, when

Montoliou, in the diocese of Carcassonne; but the ardour of his courage did not suffer him to live long in that cloister; he soon left it to go to the wars. He bore arms first in Piedmont, under the marshal de Briffac; afterwards he went into Scotland, with the troops, which Henry II sent thither, under the conduct of Henry Clutin d'Oysel, to succour the queen-mother against her subjects. That Scotch war being at an end, he went into Denmark, and signalized himself in the armies of king Frederic II, against Eric king of Sweden. He changed his master some time after; for, having obtained a very honourable discharge from the king of Denmark, he betook himself to the service of the king of Sweden (b). This happened in the year 1565. He was sent into France the following year, with another ambassador, to ask of Charles IX leave to raise men in his kingdom; which negociation was so well managed, that they carried into Sweden three thousand foot, and as many horse (c). They found at their return the affairs of that kingdom in a very ill situation, both on account of the war, which the Danes, the Poles, and the city of Lubec, had declared against Sweden, and by reason of the misunderstanding between the king, and John duke of Finland, his brother. This fire, having been concealed for some time, broke out at last. The duke, and his wife, sister to Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland, had been committed to prison; several persons were ill used upon suspicion of favouring them: The king flew into great excesses of cruelty; but, being informed, that people began to say, that, of right, he had forfeited the crown (d), he affected to give a great instance of clemency, by restoring his brother to his former state, and by placing near him a lord, who was a man of sense and courage [B], and who, upon all occasions, might be serviceable to him. This lord was our Pontus de la Gardie. Some time after, it was thought, that the king designed to make away with all his brothers during the solemnity of his nuptials: Wherefore they were exhorted not to assist there, and to free the kingdom from oppression [C]. They followed that advice, took a progress

* when d'Oysel, whom king Francis II sent into Scotland with troops, carried him thither. He stayed there till the peace of Caiteau-Cambresis, by which being disbanded, he was reduced to lift himself, with twenty of his comrades, under a captain, who carried them into Denmark. It is an untruth to say, that he was born in a village near the episcopal city of Rieux. Those historians, who say, that he was born at Rieux, or therabouts, do not mean that city, but a place in the diocese of Narbonne, or some other. Varillas should not have said, that Francis II sent troops into Scotland before the peace of Caiteau-Cambresis; for Henry II, his father, survived that peace, and it was properly he, who sent Clutin d'Oysel to the queen-regent of Scotland, mother-in-law to the dauphin, who had married the heiress of Scotland. Besides, the peace of Caiteau-Cambresis did not put an end to the divisions of Scotland; for some new troops were sent to the regent, soon after the conclusion of that peace.

All the proofs of Mr Oernhielm against father Maimbourg are not good. If Pontus de la Gardie, says he (9), had not been nobly descended; or had been born in a village, Charles IX, and Henry IV, would not have used the style they employed, when they wrote to him. The ambassadors of France, not to mention the emperor Rodolphus, Mary his mother, Frederic king of Denmark, Radziwill, or Zamoyski, would not have paid him all the honours which appear in their letters, with extream eagerness to cultivate his friendship. This reason is frivolous; for, as soon as a man enjoys the greatest employments in a state, and the favour of his master, every body respects him: foreign princes do all they can to gain him; his extraction is not regarded, but only his present condition, and his ability to serve or hurt. Who is ignorant of the flatteries of Charles V towards cardinal Wolsey, the son of a butcher?

Let us conclude, by saying, that most of the gentlemen in France come from a village: they are born in some castle, seated near some small lordship belonging to their father. And there are several families without a title, and who never appeared at court, nor ever had any considerable employment in their province, who nevertheless are of a most ancient nobility, can produce pedigrees of three or four hundred years standing, and are related, tho' perhaps at a great distance to houses, that bear the most magnificent titles. This is what might be supposed of that of our Pontus. I take notice, that neither the place, nor the time, wherein he was born, could be marked by Mr Oernhielm; which is very surprizing.

[B] By placing near him a lord, who was a man of sense and courage. These are Mr Oernhielm's words (10):

VOL. III.

* Hujus (populi) iram ut mulceret insigni aliquo specimen clementiae, fratrem Johannem Ducem, deterio carceris squalore, libertati dignitateque pristinae restituit. Eidemque, praeter caetera argumenta duraturae in posterum benevolentiae PONTUM DE LA GAR- DIUM concedit, virum in negotiis pacis ac belli spectatae industriae, ut ejus uteretur opera, ubicunque rerum magnitudo posceret. Soon after he quotes this passage out of a history of Sweden in manuscript (11). 'Duke John, a prince prudent and wise, who was well acquainted with the humour, temper, and infirmities of the king his brother, yielded at last to his commands, and accepted the burthen of that great and painful office; to wit, of viceroy, lieutenant-general, and governor of Sweden, and of both the Gothlands. But he sincerely remonstrated to him, that his long confinement had made him lose, not only all his faithful servants, but likewise the good and ancient acquaintance he had at court; and therefore he most earnestly besought his majesty to give him some trusty counsellor, and worthy second, in whom his majesty might entirely confide, and who might be an illustrious witness and companion of his actions and behaviour. His request being just, Eric readily gave him Pontus de la Gardie, or de la Garde, a French gentleman, whom he loved exceedingly, both for his wit and courage, and had raised him so high in his dominions, that he followed his wholesome counsels in all great and important affairs.' Florimond de Remond relates the same thing, tho' with a circumstance, which Joliver has omitted. 'The king, says he (12), who, during this discourse, saw, that the duke kept his eyes fixed upon a Frenchman, whom he loved, called Pontus de la Gardie, told him, through the suggestion of his evil genius, (for Pontus was the author of his ruin) brother, I give you Pontus, make use of him, and trust to his courage and loyalty, of which I have had many proofs.'

[C] They were exhorted to free the kingdom from oppression. They could not use a more pressing motive to prompt them to it, than that which they employed: for they had intelligence sent them from all parts, that the king designed to destroy them: 'Adferuntur ad principes amicorum ab omni parte literae, monentes, caverent sibi à futuris inaugurandae Reginae elocandaeque sororis solemnibus epulis, quibus haud aliter usus sit rex quam retribus, captivis everfuisse haud dubie suspectos fratres Regnique Proceres, operosa aliis conquirendos indagine. Ad haec adjungunt se Ducibus aliquot, de sua ipsorumque jam salute solliciti, decretam adferentes omnium necem, certumque debere opprimi, ni opprimant. into all the provinces, raised men up and down, and put themselves in a condition to dethrone the king. They marched directly to Stockholm, entered the city, and, after some parleys, and skirmishes, wherein la Gardie, one of the commanders of the troops of John duke of Finland was wounded in the arm, they brought their design about. King Eric was dethroned, and committed to prison in the year 1568. John, his brother being chosen to succeed him, gave immediately to la Gardie the place of high-steward of his household, and committed to him all the care of his coronation, which was not performed till the tenth of July 1569. No man had more contributed than la Gardie to the success of this revolution; wherein his vigilance, address, and resolution, shone wonderfully. The new king, not having been able to conclude an honourable peace with the king of Denmark, marched against him. A battle was fought, wherein la Gardie, having received a great wound, was made prisoner: He did not recover his liberty, till the treaty of peace, ratified the sixteenth of March 1571. He had been made a knight (e) on the coronation day; and he had a new title conferred on him the twenty seventh of July 1571, to wit, that of baron of Eckholm, to which a great estate was annexed. At the same time, he was sent (f) upon an embassy, with two others, to some imperial cities, to the bishop of Munster, the count of East-Friesland, the duke of Alva, the king of France, the king of Navarre, and the king of Spain: And, soon after his return, he was employed in military affairs; for he was sent into Livonia in the month of August 1573, to stop the progress of the great duke of Muscovy (g). He was recalled three years after, to be entrusted with an embassy of great importance, which he discharged very well. He negotiated at first with some imperial cities, &c. and afterwards at the court of Rodolphus, lately made emperor. Afterwards he passed the Alps, to go to Rome, where he had several audiences of Pope Gregory XIII, and then went to Naples, to receive what was due to his master (h) for his share of the estate of Bonna Sforza, mother to the queen of Sweden. He came back to Rome, and there had some conferences with cardinal

Erici, ludentis jam perjuriis, ut solent pueri astragalis (13). — The princes received friendly admonitions, from all hands, to beware of the ensuing inauguration of the queen, which the king would certainly make use of as a snare, to entrap and destroy his brothers, and the nobles of the kingdom, whom he suspected, whom it would be difficult otherwise to draw into his net. They join themselves likewise to certain leaders, already solicitous for their own and their safety, affirming that they deserved to be oppressed, unless they prevented it by first destroying the oppressor: that it was in vain to trust to the promises, so often sworn to, and yet broken, of king Eric, who played with perjuries, as children at cockall. Upon these occasions, people must do nothing by halves: the discontented ought not to say only, that there is some danger; they must positively assure a presumptive heir, that he is undone without recovery, unless he gets his adversary out of the way; and that he has no other resource, than to be beforehand with the tyrant, with regarding the fair promises, or submissions, which danger might extort from him. You see, that the managers of that intrigue in Sweden made use of this machine. Our Pontus, who was the principal director, bethought himself of a fine stratagem, which was, to stir up to that enterprize the duchess, who was to be queen, in case it should succeed; well knowing, that ambition causes more violent motions in the heart of a woman, than in a man. See in what manner he spoke to her. 'Madam, all the court wonders, that my lord your husband does not pity this miserable kingdom, where every body, being infinitely offended at, and weary of, the insolent cruelties and tyranny of the king his brother, he alone can easily remedy them. I do assure you, that all, both great and small, cast their eyes upon him, to put the crown upon his head, if he pleases to accept of it. He deserves it as justly as that barbarous prince, who, in the judgment of all, is unworthy of it. If my lord your husband pleases, it is easy to make him master of this kingdom, and to render him a great prince from a duke, as he is now, who undoubtedly cannot avoid either death or perpetual imprisonment; from which, both he and you have already been freed, as it were by a miracle, when you least expected it. I know for certain, from all the captains, that the six thousand Scotchmen, whom Eric keeps in his pay, are discontented, and desire no better than to change their master, for want of pay. Besides, it is certain, that the dukes Magnus and Charles, his brothers, with the greatest men in the kingdom, are extremely offended and grieved, that so great a king, as their brother, should have married the daughter of a man, whose profession is odious, a wretched bum-bailiff. Therefore, madam, take this favourable occasion, which presents itself, by the forelock, for the good of the state, the quiet of the people and provinces, and the advancement of your dear husband and family (14).' Mr Oernhielm, who relates this discourse, confesses, that he finds nothing like it in the history of that nation; but he might have read them in Florimond de Remond, with the answer of the duchess: These are fine discourses, Pontus said she, but difficult to be put in execution: however, be wise and discreet; I'll speak of it to the duke my husband (15). Florimond declares (16), that he found these words in the manuscript memoirs of the ambassador of France, sent into Sweden in the year 1566, who was eye-witness of the strange changes which happened in that country (17). We must not forget the circumstance. Whilst all things were preparing to celebrate the nuptials, a report was spread among the people, that the destruction of the king's brothers, and of the grandes of the kingdom, was resolved upon. It was not known at first, whether that report was chimerical or well-grounded; but it became likely enough some time after, through the king's mad freaks; and, at last, the letters, which were written from all parts to his brothers, put it out of all question (18). 'Dum hæc parantur, manat in vulgus struendarum in Principes fratres Procereque Regni insidiarum rumor, verus an vanus, ab initio non satis sciebatur: Quem tamen similium vero mox fecerunt, ingenium Erici suspicax, insidum, in modum Euripii æstuans, & mobili semper ad obsequia præve consulentium. . . . Tot rebus adstruenda primo rumori fide.' These are commonly the preparatives towards revolutions; at first, news and reports are spread, and handed about from street to street, from town to town. There are speculative men at hand to lay a fire upon them; and at last, grave men to confirm them by their letters. I do not pretend to say, however, that this is always done with a design; for it sometimes happens, that such reports are both true, and confirmed by a laudable zeal for the public good: and I do even observe that it is so in the present case. Florimond de Remond was concerned in king Eric's justification, to render more odious the behaviour of Pontus de la Gardie, whom he treats very ill, because he looks upon him as one, who hindered Sweden from returning to the obedience of the Pope; yet, nevertheless, he relates a thousand abominable crimes committed by that king, and affirms that he advances nothing but what he had from very good hands (20). He quotes particularly (21) the letter, which cardinal Hofius; but it is not known what affairs he treated on with the Pope (i) [D]. Nineteen months passed before he returned to Stockholm. He married, in January 1580, a natural daughter of the king of Sweden; and he was ordered, not many months after, to make an inroad into the dominions of the great duke of Muscovy, with all the troops he should find in Finland, and in the neighbouring provinces. He went upon this expedition in the quality of general (k); and his instructions were, among other things (l), to do no hurt to such Muscovites as should submit, and to allow the monks and nuns full liberty of conscience, without taking from them their images or other religious utensils [E]. He made himself master of the province of Carelia in a very little time (m). He was made (n) governor of Livonia and Ingria the following year, and continued his conquests upon the Muscovites with great success and prudence. He took from them the important place of Nerva, and several others, and (o) obliged them, in 1583, to agree to a truce of three years, without recovering any of the towns they had lost. During this truce, he bestowed his thoughts on the most effectual means to make his government prosperous. He was also (p) the second plenipotentiary of Sweden, in the conferences held at Pernaw, in the year which the new king wrote to Charles IX. Now after that, does he not make himself ridiculous by concluding with these words? But oftentimes false reports are raised against princes, to make them odious to their subjects, and stir up the latter to rebellion, as was done against Eric, who died miserably in prison (22).

Mr Oernhielm has made a good reflexion: to wit, that a prince, who follows nothing but the dictates of his passions, without regarding what is due to God, and his subjects, deprives himself of the most necessary supports of his greatness: for he does not find in his people that loyalty, which might check those that attack him. Prævenit adventum Ducum fama collecta in Regem exercitus, ad quam ille excitus, implorat opem civium, quorum plerique pertæsi acerbi regiminis, furdas obvertunt aures precanti, hilares, advenisse tempus, quo jurgi in dies ingravescentis leventur onere, antequam succumbant penitus interituri. Itaque subnixus ope paucorum, in quorum animis nondum obsoleverat Majestas sui Principis, congressuque eum pluribus ac fortioribus, non poterat non redigi ad angustias. Atque tum prætorum Regi adparuit, & favore civium, & successu succulentiæ potentie destitui potentes rerum, cum exultu reverentia Numinis, ex amplâ potestate usurpant nil præter truce quidvis in subiectos agendi licentiam. Id Erico Regi accidit. Quem solio sublimem vidit sol oriens, eundem occidens vidit provolutum ad aliena genua (23). — The king received news of the arms raised against him, before the arrival of the dukes; at which being alarmed, he implores the aid of the citizens; most of whom, weary of his tyranny, turn a deaf ear to his entreaties, rejoicing that the time was come, in which they should be eased of a burthen, which grew every day more heavy before they quite sunk under it. Relying therefore on the assistance of a few, who still preserved some loyalty towards their prince, and engaging with men superior in number and courage, he could not but be reduced to straits. The haughty monarch then became sensible, that kings deprive themselves of the only support of their royalty, the favour of their subjects, when, throwing off all regard to the deity, they employ their power only in oppressing their subjects. This was the fate of king Eric: the same person, whom the rising sun saw seated on a throne, the setting beheld groveling at another's feet. The number of princes, that have been either assassinated or imprisoned for their tyranny, is so great; and, on the other hand, the number of those, that have been able to maintain their administration, and have not hastened the coronation either of a son, a brother, &c. by their violent conduct, is so very small, that one cannot sufficiently wonder, how there can be any, who do not take warning by those examples.

Descendunt reges & sicca morte tyranni.

Few tyrants without blood resign their breath,
Or sink maturely in the arms of death.

As for the rest, the revolutions of states, whereby crowns are transferred from one head to another, have always been so frequent, that it is matter of wonder they have not been more so: for, after all, the worst that, can happen, is to miss one's aim; whereas, if a man succeeds, he will find a thousand ways to defend himself against all imputations of injustice; and he will never want approvers, or alliances.

[D] It is not known what affairs he treated on with the Pope. Mr Oernhielm owns, that he could not find it out. Quid Regis nomine cum Pontifice egerit non perinde liquet, cum regiorum mandatorum nihil ea de re videre contigerit (25). He looks upon as a fable what father Maimbourg relates (26); that Pontus de la Gardie was instructed to treat with Pope Gregory XIII, about the reduction of Sweden to the obedience of the church, upon certain conditions; which where (27), I. That the nobility should freely enjoy the church-lands they were possessed of: II. That the bishops and priests should keep the wives they married: III. That the laity should be admitted to receive the sacrament in both kinds: IV. That divine service should be performed in the vulgar tongue. This is taken out of Florimond de Remond; who adds (28), that la Gardie, at his return, found the king alarmed being apprehensive, lest, by meddling with religion, these very men should take the crown, from off his head, who had placed it there: that poor king, not being able, or not daring, to restore intirely the catholic church, compounded with the Lutheran archbishops and bishops, who were the principal lords, by leaving them, during their lives, their wives, the communion in two kinds, and the mass in the vulgar tongue. The ecclesiastics might have been gained, since they were allowed their benefices; but these, who wore a sword by their sides, would not let go their holds. Thus that design came to nothing; not without suspicion, that la Gardie himself had put a stop to it, being particularly concerned, by reason of the great estate he enjoyed, through the favour of his master, whom he governed entirely.

[E] Without taking from them their images, or other religious utensils. This prohibition was necessary; for it had been ill observed before. 'Omniis autem vis omnis ac injuria abesse deberet à corporibus ac bonis ipsorum, qui se ritè huic Regno submittent, præcipuè verò ab his, qui peculiari solitoque ei genti ritu, etiam si à sacris penes nos receptis non nusquam recederent, sexu utroque incolenter montes, steria, quorum ornamenta, imagines, cæteramque sacram suppellectilem intacta inviolataque eis linqui præcipit, secus quam factum hactenus (29). However, this order of the king's was not regarded; for they took out of the church of Carelgrod the images, statues, and priestly vestments, and transported them into Finland, for the use of the parishes there. The king was displeased with it, and threatened to punish with death, for the future, such as should violate his prohibition. Let us hear once more the Swedish historian. Utcunque non probârit, quod, privato ausu, sculptas pictasque tabulas aris impositas, stolasque, quibus sacra peracturi sacerdotes amictiuntur, templo arcis Kexholmenfis detractas, nonnulli in vicinam Finlandiam, ad eorum, in quibus habitarent, paræciarum templa iis exornanda, aveli curaverint, quas reductas in sacrario templi arcis Viburgensis locari præcepit, donec ipse de eis aliter constitueret: interminatione mortis prohibens, ne quis regno se submittens ex hostibus, ulla adficeretur injuria, aut horum devictorum templis ac monasteriis ulla vel minima vis fieret (30).

1585, with the ambassadors of Poland, about the peace between the two kingdoms. These conferences were soon broken up: After which, a negotiation was set on foot with the ambassadors of Muscovy, either for the prolonging the truce, or for a treaty of peace. He perished unfortunately in a river [F], during the course of these negotiations, the fifth of November 1585 (q). He was interred at Revel, where four years after they erected to him a marble tomb (r). His posterity is still very flourishing in Sweden [G]. I shall say, in another place (s), something relating to this Article.

[F] He perished unfortunately in a river. He and his colleagues had parted with the ambassadors of Muscovy, without having agreed upon any thing, save only a truce of fifteen days. He embarked on the river for Nerva; but, when the ship was come within half a league of that city, some pieces of cannon being discharged, a plank happened to start, and, the water getting in through that hole, the most timorous threw themselves on the other side, so that the ship was over-set: La Gardie was one of those, who were drowned (31). This is the account Mr Oernhielm gives of that accident. There is in that part of his book a marginal note, wherein the narrative of Father Maimbourg is censured. As Pontus de la Gardie, these are that father's words (32), returning from his embassy of Muscovy, was ready to enter into the port of Revel, the capital city of the Swedish Livonia, of which he was viceroy, the bark, in the stern whereof he sat in an arm-chair, having struck with great force against a rock, the head was lifted up so high with the blow, that two of his gentlemen, who stood up before him, being thrown down, and falling on his chair, caused the stern to sink yet lower, so that they fell all three together in an instant into the sea, and were no more seen. Florimond de Remond, the original author of this account, has added to it two falsities, which Maimbourg has not copied: 1. That la Gardie had a conference with the great duke: 2. That, having ended his negotiation, he put to sea with his ships. In the marginal note, Father Maimbourg is accused of not understanding geography: for he supposes, that, on the frontiers of Muscovy, there is a river, that goes down to Revel; which is false. He is blamed for saying, that Revel is the capital city of Livonia; he should have said, of Esthonia: and he is blamed likewise for saying, that Pontus was governor of Livonia: for, says Mr Oernhielm, that province did not then belong to Sweden, having been conquered since by Gustavus Adolphus. Methinks this last censure is not reasonable, since Mr Oernhielm says expressly, that Pontus de la Gardie was made governor of Livonia and Ingria in the year 1581 (33). I should have been contented with censuring the word viceroy, which Maimbourg has borrowed from Florimond de Remond.

The article GARDIE, in the Supplement to Moreri, being taken out of Father Maimbourg, you will easily find in these remarks, wherein that is defective.

[G] His posterity is still very flourishing in Sweden. He left two sons and one daughter. JOHN DE LA GARDIE, the eldest son had none but daughters, who were very advantageously married. JAMES DE LA GARDIE, the younger brother, was made count (34), senator, and great confable of the kingdom, president of the council of war, &c. His eldest son, MAGNUS GABRIEL DE LA GARDIE, married the sister of Charles Gustavus, king of Sweden, and was father to GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS DE LA GARDIE, senator of the kingdom, and president of the supreme council of Sweden. Gabriel Magnus's brothers had also great employments, and left children behind them. See the pedigree of that family at the beginning of our Pontus's life. The latter left two brothers in France, who were married; but their male issue is extinct (35).

GARISsoles, (ANTONY) pastor and professor of divinity at Montauban, his birth-place, was a very eminent divine. He was born about the year 1587, admitted into the ministerial function at the age of twenty three, or twenty four, years, and appointed one of the ministers of the church of Puylaurens. He was settled in the professorship of divinity at Montauban in the year 1627, after having been appointed for that employment by several synods of his province, and charged particularly by a national synod, held at Castres, to go and exercise that function; which he discharged gloriously 'till the year 1650, in which he died. He composed a great many books, some of which have been published [A], and the others have most of them perished in the late persecution. He took a great delight in Latin poetry, and had the satisfaction to see in print the epic poem he had made, to sing the great exploits of Gustavus Adolphus [B]. I shall speak of it below (a). He was moderator in the national synod held at Charenton in the year 1645 (b) (§ a).

[§ a] On that occasion, they say, upon some misconduct of the famous Milletiere, Garissoles the moderator rebuffed that false brother with these terrible words of our Saviour: That thou dost do quickly. You take me then for a Judas, said Milletiere to him. Not entirely so, replied Garissoles; for Judas had the purse, but you seek for it. REM. CRIT.]

[A] He composed many books, some of which have been published. He published a volume of sermons, intitled, La Voe de Salut—The way to Salvation. His other printed books are in Latin; some theses of divinity; a treatise De Imputatione primi peccati Adæ; another, De Christo Mediatore; The Explanation of the Catechism. This last work was begun by Mr Charles, Mr Garissoles's colleague. It is to be observed concerning the book, De Imputatione primi peccati Adæ, that the author composed it by order of his synod, after he had had an amicable conference upon that subject with Mr Amyrault, in the presence of the national synod held at Charenton. Mr Amyrault did not defend his own opinions, but only those of Mr de la Place (1), who had desired him to stand proxy for him, and to explain and defend his sentiments before the assembly. Mr Garissoles, having dedicated his book to the four evangelical cantons, caused it to be presented to them by his eldest son, who was honourably received every where. A year after, they made a fine present to the father; to whom they sent four great silver gilt cups, exquisitely wrought, accompanied with a letter in Latin, full of encomiums, and signed by the four syndics of the four cantons (2).

[B] He saw printed the epic poem he had made for . . . Gustavus. It is called Adolphus. The author had dedicated it to queen Christina, and to the five grandees of the kingdom; but he was obliged to alter the epistle dedicatory, because his eldest son wrote to him from Stockholm, that it would not be possible to present that work, unless it were dedicated to the queen alone. He therefore made a new epistle, addressed only to that princess, and so the poem was presented. The queen received it in a most gracious and obliging manner, and shewed a great deal of civility to the author's son. She told him, that certain people had endeavoured, more than once, to give her an ill opinion of the poem, and of the poet: But that, having perused it, she was extremely pleased with it, and was filled with veneration and admiration for its author. These were her very words. Gratius was suspected of having endeavoured to do that ill office, though, having been desired to give his opinion of that piece, even before it was printed, he had given a great character of it, as wanting little of being perfect. However, the book was greatly commended by the queen;

the author was honoured with a fine gold medal; and his eldest son had the expences of his journey largely repaid him (3). Note, that Mr Gariffoles made a poem on the coronation of that queen.

GARNACHE (FRANCIS DE ROHAN, LADY DE LA), was daughter of Renatus de Rohan, first of the name, and of Isabella d'Albret, daughter of John d'Albret, king of Navarre. She was consequently cousin-german to Joan d'Albret (a), mother of Henry the great. Neither such powerful and illustrious relations, nor the most ancient nobility of the house of Rohan, were able to secure her against the most grievous injustice, that can be done to a person of her sex. The duke of Nemours had promised her marriage, and thereupon had obtained all the favours he could expect from her: To be plain, he got her with child. When he was called upon to perform his promise, he laughed at it with the greater confidence, in that he saw, that Antony, king of Navarre, though first prince of the blood, had neither courage nor authority enough to force him to repair the honour of the lady. It was still worse, after the king of Navarre, who had some sort of credit during the triumvirate, was killed. The duke of Nemours, who had left France at the beginning of the troubles, because it had been discovered, that he had a mind to steal away the duke of Anjou, brother of king Charles IX (b), was soon recalled, and served successfully against those of the reformed religion: This, together with the death of the king of Navarre, encouraged him to press the court of Rome to declare his engagement void. He obtained all he desired (c): The just right of the lady Rohan was entirely oppressed, because she had declared herself for the Huguenot party [A]; so that she was forced to undergo the disgrace of being a mother, without being married, and the grief of seeing her faithless gallant enter into wedlock with the widow of the duke of Guise, and as much respected every where, and cared for by the ladies, as if he had been the honestest man in the world. All the comfort she had left, was the title of prince of Genevois, which she gave her son [B]; and as for herself, she was called the lady de la Garnache (d), or the duchess of Loudunois (e). She maintained herself dexterously in her estate during the civil-wars [C]. It is likely that Brantome speaks of her

[A] She declared for the Huguenot party. If you will not trust d'Aubigné, we must strengthen his testimony by that of Thuanus. The clandestine marriage between the duke of Nemours, and Frances de Rohan, was again mentioned, but only with a design to cast the plaintiff, in hatred of her religion, and to put the other in a capacity to marry the dowager of Guise (1). Let us now hear Thuanus, Eodem tempore, that is, in 1566, his olim agitata inter Franciscam Roanam & Jacobum Sabaudum Nemorosium, & superflite Navarro qui Roanæ cognatæ patrociniabatur intermissa demum renovata, & prævalente hinc Nemorosii gratia, inde odio religionis protestantium cui Roana addicta erat, prægravante, interventu Pontificis decisa est, schedula Nemorosii de matrimonio præsentibus verbis contracto irrita pronunciata (2). — At the same time, the cause between Frances de Rohan, and the duke of Nemours, which lay dormant during the life of the king of Navarre, who favoured his kinswoman de Rohan, was again set on foot, and, through the duke's interest on one side, and hatred of the protestant religion, to which the lady de Rohan was addicted, on the other, was decided by the intervention of the Pope, who disannulled the duke's promise of marriage.

[B] All the consolation, she had left, was the title of prince of Genevois, which she gave to her son. If I had followed Virgil's notions, I should have said, that that lady's grief for the infidelity of her gallant was alleviated by the son he left her; but it is a long time since our ladies are no more of the same temper with the Dido of that great Roman poet. That good prince's greatest sorrow was, that her perfidious lover went from her without leaving one of his race behind him; and, if she had had a little babe, or at least had found her self with child by him, her affliction had been a great deal less.

Saltem si qua mihi de te suscepta fuisset
Ante fugam soboles, si quis mihi parvulus aula
Luderet Æneas, qui te tantum ore referret;
Non equidem omnino capta aut deserta viderer (3).

(3) Virgil, Æn. lib. iv, ver. 337.

Ob! that —

E'er from my sight for ever thou wert gone,
Thy kind embrace had blest me with a son;
Some young Æneas, in whose lovely face
His father's features fondly I might trace.
Some comfort in thy absence this would be,
Nor were poor Dido quite undone by thee.

Such a tender sentiment would now-a-days be exploded, even in a romance, it is so contrary to custom. The greatest sorrow of those kind-hearted ladies, to whom a gallant breaks his promise, is, not for having granted him more than they ought, but for not having been able to prevent the consequences. A big-belly, or a child, are such convictions of dishonour, as no chicanry can elude: they are speaking proofs, & luce meridiana clariores: they are witnesses without reproach, & omni exceptione majores. That is therefore the principal source of a lady's misfortune and despair, Quis est qui vellet pueri inasperi i miei martiri. And indeed, I believe, thus Brantôme speaks (4) of the ladies he had seen at court, that the best time they ever had, (I put it to their consciences) was, when they were maids; for they had their free will to be nuns, and votaries, as well of Venus, as of Diana; provided they could have been so wise and cunning as to know how to preserve their bellies from swelling. In some respects, it must be confessed, that the fate of the lady Garnache was pretty like that of Dido: for her gallant pretended, as well as Æneas, that he never intended to marry.

[C] She maintained herself dexterously . . . during the civil-wars. I shall quote here no other author than d'Aubigné. We must add, says he (6), that the lady de la Garnache, sister to the duke of Rohan, held the town of la Garnache, and the castle of Beauvois on the sea, in neutrality, preserving her self by the submissions and artifices, which cannot adventure [D]. Mr Varillas has mentioned it at large, not without committing many faults [E]; some of which are so very gross, that one cannot but wonder at it.

'be blamed in her sex and condition. Her son (called the prince of Genevois, upon pretence of his mother's marriage with the duke of Nemours) having made himself master of la Garnache, by the help and contrivance of the servants, that depended upon him, hoped to make it a place of arms for his party, and thereby to provide for his own necessities. He attempted also upon Beauvois, by intelligence; but his mother, being an artful woman, he found himself her prisoner. The issue of all this was, that the king of Navarre, soliciting his liberty, obtained it, and, by the same means, the town, when the lady of the place, who was also called the duchess of Loudunais, saw the affairs of the country pretty favourable for the religion she professed; because, by this time, there were reckoned eight places, that 'held for the reformed.' He speaks at large of the siege of la Garnache (7); the Protestant garrison whereof was at last forced to surrender to the duke of Nevers. One may confidently reckon, among the submissions and artifices of that lady, the letters she wrote to her brother, when besieged in Lusignan (8). She did all she could to persuade him to accept of the honourable terms, which the duke of Montpensier offered him; but all in vain.

[D] It is likely that Brantôme speaks of her adventure. He says, that he has 'known a gentlewoman of high degree, who happened to be with child by a very brave and gallant prince . . . King Henry was the first who knew it, and was extremely troubled at it; for she was somewhat related to him . . . One night, at a ball, he danced with her the dance of the Torch, and afterwards made her dance, with another, the Gaillard, and other dances, wherein she shewed her disposition and dexterity better than ever, with her shape, which was very fine, and which she fitted so well that day, that her big-belly did not in the least appear; inso-much that the king . . . came and whispered to one of his most intimate familiars, those people are very wicked, and wretched, that have invented the report, that that poor lady was big with child . . . They have reported a falsehood, and are much to blame. Thus that good prince excused that fair and honourable lady, and said as much to the queen that night, being in bed with her: but the queen, not trussing to that, caused her to be searched the next morning, in her own presence, and found her to have gone six months with child; the lady confessing that all this had been done upon a promise of marriage. Therefore the king, who was very good-natured, caused the whole mystery to be kept as secret as could be, without exposing the lady, though the queen was very angry at it. They sent her, without noise, to her nearest relations, where she was brought to bed of a fine boy, who nevertheless was so unhappy as never to be owned by his supposed father; and the law-suit about it was long depending, but the mother never got any thing by it (9).' It is easy to know, by this account, the lady de la Garnache, who was maid of honour to Catherine de Medicis, when that accident befel her (10). She was not the only lady, who got a big-belly in that queen's service.

[E] Mr Varillas . . . has committed many faults. These are his words (11): 'James, first duke of Nemours, surnamed the fair and gallant knight, by way of excellence, had been in love with Frances de Rohan, who appeared at court under the name of Mademoiselle de Leon . . . He had given her a promise of marriage in due form. That lady added, that he had pronounced the matrimonial vow, and that the marriage had been consummated. No issue was come from it; and things still remained in an uncertainty, when Poltrot killed the duke of Guise. The duke of Nemours's passion for the duchess of Guise was presently rekindled, as soon as she was a widow, and he married her before Mademoiselle de Leon had taken all her measures to put a stop to it. Her relations, who had but indifferently assisted her before the infidelity of the duke of Nemours, grew incensed when they saw him married; and the king of Navarre, her second cousin, those of the house of Rohan, and all the other lords of the kingdom, that were related to them, let the duke of Nemours know, that, unless he gave satisfaction to Mademoiselle de Leon, he must fight them all in a single combat, one after another. This was a terrible extremity. And, though the duke of Nemours was one of the most valiant men in the world, it was not possible for him to satisfy so many persons, without losing his life at last in the quarrel. This made him use precautions, which for some years exempted him from fighting. . . . The duchess of Nemours was brought to bed of two sons . . . and the lady Leon took upon her to prove, that they were not legitimate. Things were prepared for a trial with great solemnity. The most famous professors of the civil-law in Europe were consulted, as well as the most celebrated lawyers of the parliaments of France; and the majority of them answered, that the question appeared difficult, and that the best way was to accommodate the matter. The quarrel about religion, which immediately followed the other about marriage, did but inflame it; for, on one side, the house of Rohan turned Calvinist. . . . The lady Leon was a younger sister of Bretagne, and by consequence had but a small portion. She loved expence; and it was by furnishing her wherewithal to maintain it, that the duke of Nemours had gained her esteem. They attacked her on that weak side; and the queen-mother offered her, that, provided she did not insist upon her pretensions, the town of Loudun, and its jurisdiction, should be dismembered from the royal demesne; and, if the whole was not worth fifty thousand livres a year, the adjacent lands should be bought, and added to it, to make up that sum; that the whole together should be erected into a duchy and peerdom: and that the patent should import, in express terms, that that duchy and peerdom should pass from the lady Leon to her issue, male and female for ever, supposing she had any; and, in case she had none, to all the males and females of the house of Rohan also for ever. Mademoiselle de Leon rejected at first the proposal of the queen-mother. . . . She was so teased by her relations, that she durst no more openly oppose an accommodation. But fresh obstacles were still raised, when they thought they had overcome the former. The parliament of Paris, who were to register the patent for erecting Loudun into a duchy and peerdom, made a scruple of it, alledging, that, to make a lawful settlement of a duchy and peerdom, there must be found an estate, of which the future duke and peer be incommutable lord; that is, that he should be so absolutely possessed of it, that none should have a right to deprive him of it; which could not be with respect to the lordship of Loudun, since it was of the royal demesne; and that whatsoever precautions should be taken to divide it from it, it would still be lawful for the king to re-unite it; and though his majesty should neglect it, he being but usufructuary of his kingdom, his successors would nevertheless be in a capacity to do it. It was difficult to confute this reason by an opposite one of equal strength: but the queen-mother would have over-ruled it by all her credit, and the authority of the king her son, if the change, which happened in the person of the duke of Nemours, had not hindered her. That prince . . . was afflicted with the palsy . . . and died, after having languished in his bed for two whole years (12). Every body compassionating his indisposition, the lady Leon superseded her prosecution, and the judges would never hear it mentioned, after the death of him, who had given ground for it. The king was extremely glad he had no more occasion to alienate his demesne, and to create a new duchy and peerdom upon so unworthy an occasion . . . And, having consented to the alienation of Loudun, out of meer complaisance to the queen-mother, he was glad he was dispensed with the performance of his promise by the death of the duke of Nemours.'

In the first place, I take notice, that the lady in question is called by Brantôme Mademoiselle de Rohan (13), not Mademoiselle de Leon. II. I have shewn (14) by the testimony of Thuanus, that the law-suit of the lady was definitively determined, to her prejudice, in in the year 1566. The promise of marriage, which she produced, was declared void. Mr Varillas knew it well enough, when he composed his history of Charles IX. See the words, which I quote in the margin (15), they positively declare, that the duke of Nemours's marriage with the duchess of Guise was preceded by the sentence, which made void the pretensions of the lady Rohan (16). Why then does he say, in this place, that, before this lady had taken all her measures to put a stop to it, the duke of Nemours had married the widow of the duke of Guise? III. How is it likely, that that lady renewed her prosecution after the birth of the two sons of the duke of Nemours by that widow? That marriage was concluded after the definitive sentence, which ruined the pretensions of the lady Rohan, and therefore nothing could be alleged against the issue of that marriage. IV. And therefore those consultations of professors in civil-law, and of lawyers, those solemn Preparations for a trial, touching the quality of the duke of Nemours's two sons, are meer chimeras. V. The quarrel about religion was not subsequent to the birth of those two children; for that duke did not marry the dowager of Guise till after the law-suit with the lady Rohan had been determined in the year 1566, before which time there had been a most bloody war about religion. VI. The house of Rohan did not turn Calvinist after the birth of the duke of Nemours's two sons; for Mr Varillas remarks (17), that, in the year 1562, the viscount de Rohan embraced Calvinism, in hopes of marrying the heiress of Soubize. VII. That compassion, which, we are told, prevailed with the lady Rohan to supersede her prosecution against the duke of Nemours, who was sick of the palsy, is also another chimera. VIII. According to Mr Varillas, king Henry III did not erect Loudun into a duchy; the duke of Nemours's death exempted him from the performance of his promise. Nevertheless it is certain, that that erection was made in favour of the lady Rohan. IX. The most enormous fault of that author, is, his saying, that the duke of Nemours had no children by that lady. See, above (18), the passage of the Sieur d'Aubigné (19).

GARONNE, in Latin Garumna, one of the four great rivers of France. Papyrius Masso (a) will furnish you with several passages of the poets concerning this river. Add to that, the pretty and pleasant fiction of Messieurs Chapelles, and Bachaumont (b), about it's flux and reflux. I content myself to mark some faults of Moreri [A].

[A] I content myself to mark some faults of Moreri. I. He says, that the Garonne crosses the plain of Aran, in the county of Comminges. This shews he did not understand the Latin he copied; for these are the words of Mr Baudrand, whom Mr Moreri has falsely translated: Oritur (Garumna) in montibus Auræ in Arania vallis Hispanicæ ditensis in confinio Aragoniæ. Mr Baudrand does not speak of the plain of Aran, but of the valley of Aran, and says, that it belongs to Spain, in the borders of Arragon; but not that it is a part of the country of Comminges. II. He should not have said, that the Garonne passes through Rieux, but near Rieux. The Sieur Coulon has avoided that fault, by saying, that it runs along the bishopric of Rieux in the county of Foix (1). These last words are false, since the city of Rieux is not of the county of Foix; and that part of the diocese of Rieux, along which the Garonne runs, is not in the county of Foix. III. It is not true, that the Garonne receives, at Toulouse, the Little Lers, which runs into it far below that city. IV. He should not have forgot, that, a league above Toulouse, it receives a river much more considerable than the Little Lers, I mean the river Ariège. Inde patentes & fertiles campos rigans duobus milliariis à Tholosæ in vinculo (2) S. Crucis Aurigeram (3) fluvium excipiens, arenulis aureis intermicantem, jam suis aquis & externis valentior Tholosam Tellosagum Metropolim alluit: These are Papyrius Masso's words (4). V. To say, as Mr Moreri does, that the Garonne comes near Bourdeaux, shews as if he would have the readers fancy, that it does not wash the walls of that city; which would be a most false imagination. VI. He says, the Garonne and the Dordogne form one single channel of the Garonne, which passes by Blaye: Which is a phrase so barbarous, that the most ignorant Walloon would have expressed the thing better. VII. He should not have said, that there is on the right side of the Garonne, and on the shore of Xaintonge, a town called Marmande, but a town called Mortagne. VIII. Instead of Pavillac and of Soulac, he should have said Paulliac and Souillac. The second and fifth faults are found in Mr Baudrand's Geographical Dictionary.

GEDDICUS (SIMON), doctor of divinity, and minister at Magdeburg, is only known to me by the answer, he published, in the year 1595, to a little book, wherein the author pretended to prove, that women do not belong to human kind, Mulieres non esse homines [A]. This is much more happily expressed in Latin, than in [A] The author pretended to prove . . . mulieres non esse homines. I have spoken elsewhere (1) of the great noise and storms, that were raised against poor Acidalius, who had given his bookeller a copy of that dissertation; and I have advertised my reader in that place, that I should speak here of that little book. I question very much, if Gediccus has understood the true intention of the author. He has bestowed great pains in making a formal apology for the fair sex; which shews he thought he confused a book, the principal design of which was to abuse the women: wherein, in my opinion, he has shewn no great penetration. The author of the Dissertation does not principally aim at the women; and it is only by accident, and very indirectly, that he abuses them. His principal design is to turn into ridicule the system of the Socinians, and their method of playing with the most formal and express texts of the word of God, touching the divinity of Christ. This has been observed long ago by a Journalist. These are his words (2): 'Why should not every body be allowed to convince themselves, that the Socinians make use of trifling and wretched cavils; and that it has been proved, that, by their glosses, one might elude all the passages of scripture, which prove that women are human creatures, I mean, of the same species with me. This was the subject-matter of a little book, which was published towards the end of the last century, mulieres homines non esse; to which one Simon Gediccus, a minister in the country of Brandenburg, made a very serious answer, not being aware of the design of the author, which was to write a violent satire against the Socinians: For how can one turn them into ridicule, or mortify them more effectually, than by letting them see, that the glosses, whereby they combat the consubstantiality of the son of God, are sufficient to hinder us from proving by scripture, that women are humane creatures?' Cocheus made use of the same machine, but to very little purpose, against Luther. He wrote some books, wherein, after the Lutheran way, he pretended to prove, by passages of scripture, that Jesus Christ is not God; that God ought to obey the devil; and that the Blessed Virgin did not preserve her virginity. 'Cum Lutherani scripturis ad suas nugas aptatis luderent, Cocherus (3) in actis Lutheri anno 1527, se librum ex Scripturis male confertis confarcinasse testatur, ad probandum, quod Christus non sit Deus, additque anno 1528 se item simili arte ac scopo, scripsisse de obedientia Diabolo debita à Deo, & de B. in English; for as it is very ridiculous to maintain in Latin, Mulieres non esse homines, it is no less ridiculous, in our tongue, to aver, That women are men. That little book has been reprinted several times [B], and some people have maintained, in earnest, the position, which is to be seen in the title page [C]. I could not find queen Elizabeth mentioned in that book [D].

There are those who believe, that the author of the Ecclesiasticus has confuted the paradox, That women have no souls. If they were in the right, we must conclude, that the Italian Author, who has maintained that paradox, has revived a very obsolete chimera [E]. To make, in that sense, an old decrepit young again, is no very difficult

* quote the scriptures in proof of their chimerical notions, Cocleus, in the acts of Luther, ann. 1527, confesses, that he patched up a book with scraps of the scripture ill put together, to prove, that CHRIST is not GOD; and he adds, ann. 1528, that, with the same artifice and design, he had written concerning the obedience due from GOD to the devil, and of the violated honour of the Blessed Virgin. Whence he would make it plain, that nothing is so sacred, but the scriptures may be wrested to overthrow it.

The author, from whom I borrow these words, had just before given a great instance of the power of chicanry and cavilling: for he had shewn, that, if one should scan the creed, according to the principles of some critics, not one of it's articles could stand the test. He complains, that Petrus Aurelius had lately censured that example of chicanry (5); but I cannot approve his complaint, after having read in Mr Baillet what follows.

* Father Theophilus Raynaud . . . shews, that there is no book, how perfect and pious soever it may be, wherein a man may not find something to censure, right or wrong, when once he has undertaken to pervert all, and to find fault with every thing. But it was not very necessary, that he should give such sensible and effectual proofs, by endeavouring to persuade us that he understood, as well as any other, the art of tricking and cavilling, when he has published a loose and impious censure of the Apostles Creed; wherein, either himself, or he to whom he ascribes it, and whom he calls a most Catholic and most learned man, wrests, in effect, the sense of all the words of that Creed, to shew that every one of them is in some sense suspicious, dangerous, captious, impious, and heretical. That is indeed a specimen of what chicanry may produce: but I cannot well see what game that most catholic author had a mind to play, by playing thus with our profession of faith. I know not whether it was for the simple, and such as are easily offended, or for the pretended Esprits-forts (wits), that he wrote that piece; and whether he had a mind to serve the Socinians, or Deists (6).

(5) Jugemens des Savans, Tom. I, pag. 202, 203.

[B] That little book has been reprinted several times. The edition I make use of is of the Hague, 1638, in 12mo. I do not mark the others. I cannot positively tell whether the work, condemned by the congregation of the Index, at Rome, the eighteenth of June, 1651, is a translation of this. That work is intitled, Che le donne non siano della specie de gl'huomini: Discorso piacevole, tradotto da Horatio Platta, Romano (7).

[C] Some have maintained in earnest the position in the title. You will see the proof of it in this remark; tho' all the examples, I shall instance in, are not proper to shew, that that position was maintained in earnest. I believe with Vossius that Cujacius affirmed it only by way of jest (8): Eoque cum Cujacius contenderet, mulieres non esse homines, credo a seriis animum remittens (prope amittens in tali negotio dixerim) paucillum voluit nugari, quod post magnam virum alius etiam nugandi praebebat occasionem. That question was much debated in Holland, whilst Sorbier was there. Mr Beverovic, says he, has written a book of the excellency of women, upon occasion of a dispute about a thesis, advanced, in form of a paradox, by a student, who had a mind to exercise his wit; mulieres non esse homines. That dispute has passed from the schools into the conversation of the best companies, and much has already been written pro and con about it. At last Monsieur de Beverovic has entered the list, and has given us as gentle and learned a piece as can be written upon that subject. He has forgot nothing that could be said to the advantage of the fair sex; and he has verified, by a thousand examples, what he has endeavoured to prove methodically, and by good reasons, that women were not inferior to men in any qualities, either of mind or body (9). I wish Vossius had made as sound a judgment of Aristotle's opinion, as of that, which Cujacius undertook to maintain: but such a thing was not to be expected from him; for Aristotle's authority was yet too much respected. That great philosopher has maintained a strange doctrine; that nature made no women, but when, through the imperfection of matter, it could not arrive at the sex which is perfect. Vossius (10) commends Cajetan for having owned this with respect to particular nature, and for having denied it with respect to universal nature. Therefore, in the judgment of those two doctors, human nature aims not at engendering women; it's design is always to get males; but because, if it should always compass that end, the universe would suffer too much by it, there is an universal nature, which remedies it. What a pitiful jargon! what an odd idea of wisdom! what strange philosophy here is! human nature would labour to preserve itself; and yet it should not aim at producing that being, without which it cannot be preserved. This is the grossest of absurdities, and nevertheless, there is an infinite number of physicians and philosophers, who have asserted, that nature makes females only when it is out of it's road; and so that it produces none, but by chance, by accident, by force. Let us hear this foolery in Italian: Huomini sapientissimi hanno lasciato scritto, che la natura, percio che sempre intende, & disegna far le cose piu perfette, se potesse, produrre continuamente huomini: & quando nasce una Donna, è difetto, o error della natura, & contra quello, ch'essa vorrebbe fare: come si vede ancor d'uno, che nasce cieco, zoppo, o con qualche altro mancamento, & ne gli arbori molti frutti, che non maturano mai. Così la Donna si può dire animal prodotto à sorte, & per caso (11).

The most learned men have left in writing, that nature, which ever aims at perfection, would always produce men; and that, when a woman is born, it is, as it were, by mistake, and an error of nature; as when any one is born blind or lame, or with any other natural defect, or like the fruit of some trees, which never ripen. Thus a woman is an animal produced by accident. What I find most strange, is, to see, that, in a council (12), the question was gravely put, whether the women were human creatures, and that it was not carried in the affirmative, but after a long debate.

[D] I could not find queen Elizabeth mentioned in that book. Here is what we find in the life of that queen, published by Mr Leti. 'I always looked with indignation, says he (13), upon a wretched book, intitled, That Women are not of the same species with men; wherein the author has the boldness to mention the example of that great queen, to laugh at those, who have commended her capacity for the management of affairs; and to say, that, during her reign, her favourites, her council, and the parliament, managed all the business, and that she only lent them her name.' It being likely, that there are other dissertations upon the thesis mulieres non esse homines, besides the treatise, which Gediccus has given himself the trouble to confute, it would be very rash in me to deny what Mr Leti says; for I own I have read nothing concerning that subject, except the book Gediccus has confuted. However I may say, that Mr Leti would have obliged his readers, if he had described the book (14), wherein he had read that slander against queen Elizabeth.

cult piece of work, and such as can be done without the help of Medea's art. However, this new author, not having been in a capacity to make use of the arguments of those, that are confuted in Ecclesiasticus, he may claim the honour of invention, in some respects. You will find below (a) a passage out of the Mélanges d'Histoire & de Littérature, by Mr de Vigneul-Marville.

* A Spaniard has said, that beasts have no soul: a Frenchman has said it also: but an Italian is gone beyond them, by maintaining, that women have no souls, and are not of the same species with the men: Che le donne non babbino anima, & che non sieno della specie de gli huomini, e vienne comprobato da molti luoghi della Scrittura santa: Which the author endeavours to prove by several passages of the holy scripture, which he adapts to his fancy. As long as this book was printed only in Latin, the Inquisition was silent; but, as soon as it was translated into Italian, they censured, and prohibited it. The ladies of Italy put various constructions upon that system: some were sorry for having no souls, and for being ranked so much below men, who, for the future, would use them little better than apes: others were indifferent upon the matter; and, looking now upon themselves as meer machines, designed to move their wheels so well, as to make the men mad. It was very reasonable to stop the course of that heresy, which is so very ancient, that the preacher seems to have confuted it, when he says, that God had created for Adam a companion like unto him; and had given them both a tongue, eyes, ears, and, over and above all that, a soul, to think and govern themselves. The author of the commentary upon St Paul's epistles, falsely ascribed to St Ambrose, says plainly, upon the eleventh chapter of the first to the Corinthians, that the women are not made * after the image and likeness of God: Feminas ad ad imaginem Dei factas non esse (15). Touching this last question, see Gisbert Voëtius, in the third tome of the Politica ecclesiastica (16). He proves in few words, by three reasons, that the woman was made after the image of God; and answers the objection, which might be grounded upon a passage of St Paul (17). He confutes also (18) as briefly the false position, mulieres non esse homines; and observes that Aristotle's opinion, mentioned here above (19), was adopted by Thomas Aquinas, and by several other schoolmen, with the same modification, that we have seen (20) that Cajetan added to it. An mulier sit duplex natura, erratum naturæ & mai occasione, & per accidens generetur, atque adeo sit monstrum? Resp. Tale quid excidit Aristoteli lib. 2. de generat. animalium cap. 3. & lib. 4. cap. 2. Hanc opinionem adoptavit Thomas part. 1. qu. 92. art. 3. c. Genes cap. 94. Ejusque sequaces, Viguerius Institut. cap. 21. §. 2. v. 4. Et Commentatores ad Thomam Summam Cajetanum, Medicus, Alagona, & Ferrarius ad 3. c. Genes cap. 94. Insuper ex sententiis Bonaventura, Egidius, Richardus ad 2. dist. 20. Sed pænæ distinctionis emoliri putant crudam hanc opinionem, quod femina sit occasione, non per se, respectu agentis particularis . . . sed quod . . . sit per se ex intentione agentis universalis, & naturæ (21).

GELDENHAUR (GERARD), in Latin Geldenbaurius, a native of Nimeguen [A], held a considerable rank among the learned men of the XVIth century. He studied classic learning at Deventer, under very good masters (a), and went through his course of philosophy at Louvain so successfully, that he became qualified to teach that science there. It was in that illustrious university that he contracted a very strict friendship with several learned men, and particularly with Erasmus. He stayed some time at Antwerp, from whence he was called to the court of Charles of Austria, to be reader and historian to that prince (b): But, because he did not like to change often his habitation, and did not think it convenient to accompany him into Spain, he disengaged himself from him, and betook himself to the service of Philip of Burgundy, bishop of Utrecht. He was his reader and secretary for twelve years [B], that is, till the year 1524, when that prelate died; after which he performed the same functions with Maximilian of Burgundy. He was sent to Wittenberg in the year 1526, to examine the state of the schools, and the church. He reported ingeniously what he had observed there; and owned, he could not disapprove a doctrine so conformable to the prophets and apostles, as that he had heard there: Therefore he renounced Popery, and retired towards the Upper Rhine. He married at Worms, and taught there the youth for some time: Afterwards he was called to Augsburg [C], for the same employment; and at last, in the year 1534, he went to Mar-

[A] He was a native of Nimeguen. He was better known by the name of his country, than by that of his family; for he was commonly called Gerardus Noviomagus: nor does Erasmus call him otherwise in the letters he wrote to him. König (1) mentions him only under the word Noviomagus. Some other Bibliographers (2), for want of examining things, have split one author into two, and distinguished Gerardus Geldenbaurius from Gerardus Noviomagus. La Popelinier's error is not less gross; Gerard de Noyon Noviomagus, says he (3), has written the history of Holland, 1530. Does he not seem to make Noviomagus his family-name? It is certain, at least, that he believes him to be a native of Noion in Picardy. We find a like mistake in the first tome of the Bibliothèque Universelle. Mr Matthæus Jæwus, that Eligius had already preached the gospel to the Frieslanders . . . and that he was the first bishop of Nimeguen (4). There are three errors in these words. The Latin word Eligius used to have been translated by that of Elai; and the term of Noviomagus, by that of Noion; for it was of Noion that St Elai was bishop. Nimeguen never was an episcopal see.

[B] His reader and secretary for twelve years. These are the words of the author, who has furnished me with this article (5); Se ad Philippum Ultrajectinum præfulem contulit, eique à Secretis in Latina lingua, & in cubiculo à lectionibus fuit per annos XII. I wonder Paul Freherus does not say, that Geldenbaur was employed in religious functions by that bishop, as we are assured by Valerius Andreas (6); Philippo Burgundo, Episcopo Ultrajectino a sacris. This is Valerius Andreas's expression, which Mr Moreri has translated by chaplain to Philip of Burgundy: and indeed there is no doubt but Geldenbaur, who was a monk, assisted his prelate in his devotions. Valerius Andreas is not the only author, that informs us of the monastical profession of Geldenbaur (7): for I find it in one of Erasmus's letters. Quod si vera prædicas mea sententia nec aula dignus es, nec cuculla (8): that is, if it be true that you are of so bashful a temper (9), you are neither fit for the court, nor for the cowl. Note, that this monk was also chaplain to Charles of Austria, if we may believe Vossius (10).

[C] He was called to Augsburg. Melchior Adam (11) relates, that, in 1531, the magistrates of that city having erected a school, which they called St Ann's, purg, where he taught history two years, and then divinity, 'till his death. He died of the plague, the tenth of January, 1542, being sixty years of age (c). He had been a Monk (d). His changing his religion, and some writings he published against the church of Rome, made him fall out with Erasmus [D], who speaks very ill of him; and who, instead of assisting him in his poverty, jested upon it [E], and called him a man of a feditious spirit: A reproach, which deserves no less to be taken notice of, than sent for Geldenhour to be the master of it. See what I quote out of Erasmus, towards the end of the following remark.

[D] His changing his religion and some writings made him fall out with Erasmus. Read Erasmus's letter in Pseudoevangelicos (12), which he wrote to Geldenhour, whose name he changed into that of Vulturius. He blames him for having published scoffing books, which did but exasperate princes against Luther's followers. 'Parum erat evulgasse epistolam ad Spirense Concilium; non magno intervallo profluit nobis ridiculus ille Cometæ Caroli Cæsari dictus. Quum iterum te meis scriptis admonuisssem, ut à talibus joci temperares, qui & Principum animos ad vitam irritarent, & adeo nihil juvarent causam, à cuius victoria vestra pendet incolunitas, ut etiam gravissimè lædant, placidè quidem respondisti: sed perinde quasi te fuissem hortatus, ut simile quiddam iterum designares, ita rursus ad concilium Spirense, cui tum rex Ferdinandus præsidebat, missus est libellus, nomen Erasmi literis bene magnis prærens (13). — It was not enough that the letter was made public at the council of Spire; soon after came out that ridiculous Comet dedicated to The Emperor Charles. When I again admonished you, by letter, to avoid such jesting, which might exasperate the minds of princes, and, instead of serving, greatly injure the cause, upon whose success your own safety depends, you returned indeed a civil answer; yet, as if I had exhorted you to attempt the like again, another writing was sent to the council of Spire, in which king Ferdinand then presided, signed with the name of Erasmus in pretty large characters.' He blames him also for having prefixed the name, and some notes of Erasmus to some letters, the drift of which was to prove, that heretics ought not to be punished: which exposed Erasmus to the hatred of the court of Rome, and to the indignation of such princes as persecuted Lutheranism; for it was as good as to say, that Erasmus furnished the innovators with weapons to fight their enemies. That learned man could not bear, that any should do him that ill office; for age had made him a coward in that respect. His complaints against Geldenhour, and the Lutherans, are very bitter, and were answered in writings, which he thought very violent. He took Geldenhour to have been the chief promoter of them, and therefore he sticks not to compare him to the treacherous Judas (14). 'Sed nondum commigrarat Argentoratum, ille (15) mirabilis concitandæ seditionis, & mox turbatis rebus, alioque profugiendi artifex: ille qui loca ex omnibus epistolis meis ad calumniam idonea enotaret, moxque fingeret sibi librum à fratribus clam ereptum. Qui adeo flagrabat impotenti odio, ut hunc librum è mendaciis & conviciis non aliter contextum, quàm cento contextur ex pannis, non potuerit expectare, sed furtim emisit insulsiſſima scholia, & interim mihi scribebat blandas epistolas: Eram dominus ac præceptor, à quo libenter admoneretur, qui sine imagine mei non poterat vivere, qui proximis ad me literis etiam consolatus est me, hortans ut læto essem animo, contemnens rabulas loquaces & scribaces: denique jamdudum edita epistolâ meâ, quod me facturum scripseram, in suis ad amanuensum meum literis volebat mihi commendari, & interim hæc parabantur, tantâ arte mordacia, ut magis lædar laudatus, quàm convitiis affectus. Et hi se cum apostolorum sanctimonia conferunt, quum hoc Vulturii factum propius accedit ad exemplum Judæ proditoris, quàm CHRISTI. — This artist at raising sedition, and afterwards slipping his neck out of the collar, was not yet gone to Strasburg: He, I say, who marked the passages in all my letters, which might give a handle to calumny, and afterwards pretended that the book was stolen from him by his brothers: who was so maliciously set against me, that he could not wait for that book, that patch-work of calumny and lies, but published, underhand, most stupid comments; and, in the mean time, wrote complaint letters to me: I was, forsooth, his master and preceptor, whose admonitions he willingly received, he could not live without my picture, and, in his very next letter to me, he endeavoured to comfort me, advising me to be cheerful, and expressing a contempt both for talking and scribbling brawlers: lastly, after my letter was already published, he wrote to my amanuensis, recommending to me what I had declared in writing I intended to do; in the mean time all these things were carried on with such malicious cunning, that I was more injured by praises, than affected by calumnies. And these are the men, who pretend to apostolical sanctity, when this action of Vulturius comes nearer to the example of the traitor Judas, than of CHRIST. By this we learn, that Geldenhour was at Strasburg in the year 1530, where he shewed a very turbulent spirit; which however neither Melchior Adam nor Paul Freherus mention. Erasmus says in another place, that no man in Strasburg attempted any thing against him before Geldenhour came there. He wrote this when Geldenhour was professor of poetry at Augsburg: 'Argentorati nemo quicquam in mea molitus est, priusquam eò commigrasset Noviomagus, qui nunc agit Augustæ, profecteturque poeticam salario, ut aiunt, sexaginta florenorum (16).'

[E] . . . who instead of assisting him in his poverty, jested upon it. After having represented to him several things, which hindered him from relieving his friends in their indigence, he tells him, that poverty is no misfortune to those, who devote themselves to the purity of the gospel; that they ought to relieve one another; and that, by being contented with little, and reducing themselves to bread and water, they will always find wherewithal to live: 'Porro, quod significas tibi molestam egestatem, equidem nec tam sum inops, ut non possim; nec tam parvus, ut graver amiculo aureos aliquot impartiri; sed hæc benignitas quantum haberet momenti ad tuam egestatem sublevandam? Res mihi sanè mediocris est, minimumque superest meis necessitatibus: multum impendii requirit hoc corpusculum . . . jam bona pars mihi decidit in famulos, &c. . . . Verum postquam, mi Vulturii, induxisti in animum Evangelicam vitam profiteri, miror paupertatem esse molestam, quum beatus Hilarius, ubi non inveniet quod pro nullo solveret, gloriamdum duxerit, quod insciens ad tantam Evangelii perfectionem pervenisset. Gloriatur & Paulus, quod sciat abundare, & penuriam pati, quod nihil habens omnia possideat. Idem collaudat Hebræos quosdam Evangelium amplexos, quod rapinam bonorum suorum cum gaudio suscepissent. . . . Adde si Judæi non patiuntur inter ipsos esse pauperes, quanto magis convenit ut qui jactant Evangelium, fratrum inopiam mutua beniginitate sublevent: præsertim cum Evangelica frugalitas minime sit contenta. Si panis cibarius addit & aqua, non desiderant Attica bellaria qui spiritu vivunt. Nesciunt luxum, jejuniis pascuntur. Ipsi Apostoli confectis manu arillis famem sedasse leguntur. . . . Fortassis hic tibi videbor cavillis ludere, at aliis non idem videtur (17). — As to what you hint, that poverty is become burthensome to you, I am not so poor, that I cannot, nor so stingy, that I grudge to bestow a few pieces on my dear friend: but what will this bounty avail towards relieving your wants? My circumstances are but narrow, and I can spare but very little from my necessities: I am at no small expence in maintaining this body of mine . . . Then a good part goes in servants wages, &c. . . . But, my dear Vulturius, since you have resolved to profess an evangelical life, I wonder you should complain of poverty, when St Hilarius, not being able to pay the hire of a boat, valued himself upon arriving unexpectedly to so much gospel perfection. St Paul likewise boasts, that he knew how to abound and how to want, and that, having nothing, he possessed all things. The same apostle commends certain Hebræos, who had embraced the gospel, that they took the spoiling of their goods with joy . . . Add, that if the Jews suffer no poor among them how much more is it the duty of those, who profess the gospel, mutually the care Erasmus took to deny, that he condemned the punishment of heretics [F]. Mr Moreri has committed some considerable faults [G]. Paul Freherus has not been to relieve the wants of their brethren, especially since they are ready to refuse to their neighbours as soon as they shall be able to force them. Non aliter hæc sacra constant.

[F] A reproach, which deserves no less to be taken notice of, than the care Erasmus took, to deny, that he condemned the punishment of heretics. Erasmus's dispute with Geldenhour has made me take notice of two things with some surprise.

The first is, that, according to Erasmus, the exhorting princes, and men in power, to take away from the monks the great estates they possessed, and not to resist the gospel, was seditious and scandalous: 'Nisi forte non videtur seditiosum hortari Principes, ut facultates sacerdotibus ac Monachis adimant, ut bonos vestri similes conferant: aut non offenduntur illorum animi, quum audiunt, Noli occidere innocentem, Noli tuo periculo recalcitrare Evangelio, Sine verbum Dei in tua ditione prædicari. Hæc quid aliud sunt quam atrocissima convitia nondum persuasus, imò in diversum persuasus. Quos tu vocas innocentes, illi habent pro seditiosis & hæreticis; & quod tu vocas Evangelium, illis persuasum est esse doctrinam Satanae. Prius igitur erat illis persuadendum: Quod si non potes, aliis rationibus tractandus erat illorum animus (18). — Unless, perhaps, you do not think it seditious to exhort princes to rob the priests and monks of their goods, and bestow them on good men like yourselves: or that their minds are not offended, when they hear, Kill not the innocent; spurn not at the gospel to your own peril; suffer the word of God to be preached in your jurisdiction. What are these but the keenest reproaches on those, who are not yet brought over, nay are persuaded of the contrary? Those, whom you call innocent, they consider as seditious and heretical; and what you call the gospel, they are persuaded is the doctrine of Satan. The first step therefore should have been to convince such persons themselves: if you failed of this, they should have been treated after another manner.' It is what he represents to Geldenhour, who had published some letters addressed to princes, and written in that strain, which is censured in this place. This discourse of Erasmus is a true Janus, with a double face; for it is reasonable in some respects, but it appears unjust, when one views it another way. Those, who believe, that it is necessary to convert the world to a new doctrine, and to destroy reigning errors, must needs desire to be heard, and beg to have no violence offered them: and therefore they are unreasonable to demand, that those of another opinion be persecuted, dispossessed of their goods, and hindered from speaking and appearing in public. It seems therefore, that Geldenhour went too fast, in asking, that the estates of the monks should be taken from them; and that Erasmus had reason to tax him with rashness. We must suffer that to be granted to others, which we ask for ourselves; for every one pretends to maintain truth. To say to princes, who persecute us, that they oppress the kingdom of God, is certainly very abusive: It seems therefore, it would be better to soften one's stile, and not to suppose so positively the very thing, which is in question. We should, in the first place, make people relish our maxims and proofs; and if we could compass that, we might afterwards qualify our opinions, and those of our adversaries. Thus far Erasmus's observations appear very judicious: But when we consider on the other hand, that, unless we represent to the world, that they are undone without recovery, unless they reform, unless they cease to make war against God by opposing the reformers, we make no great progress, nor sufficiently excite the attention of the public; when, I say, we consider this, we find, that Erasmus acted too much the philosopher, and was ignorant of the small efficacy of reason, when weakly assisted by the passions. However it be, it does not seem very possible, that great revolutions in religion may be accomplished, unless people ask at first for themselves a toleration, which they are ready to refuse to their neighbours as soon as they shall be able to force them. Non aliter hæc sacra constant.

The second thing I was surprized at, is to see, that Erasmus looked upon it as a black and odious calumny, to impute to him, that he had taught, that heretics ought not to be put to death. He confesses, indeed, that he has exhorted princes not to hearken rashly to the complaints of all sorts of divines and monks (19), and to distinguish errors; but he denies he ever maintained that heretics ought not to be punished with death, and complains (20), that those, who accuse him of that false doctrine, expose him to the resentment of princes, as if he had designed to take from them the sword, which God has put into their hands (21). — Hoc atrocius est, quod nusquam id doco, non esse sumendum capitis supplicium de hæreticis, nec usquam adimo gladii jus Principibus, quod illis non ademit Christus nec apostoli.

As they are to blame, who drag men to the flames for every kind of error, they are no less, who think the civil magistrate has no power to put any sort of heretics to death. . . . nor could any thing more incense them against me, than to strike the sword out of their hands, and to defend those sects, which they wish to extirpate as execrable, and would do it, did not the unsettled state of affairs call off their attention to other things.

I wonder, that Erasmus, who was so well read in the fathers, did not know, that, during the three first centuries, they did loudly maintain the position, from which he is so solicitous to purge himself. They did not pretend, by that, to take from princes the power of the sword, which they hold from God; but meant only, that that power does not reach the errors of one's conscience, and that sovereigns have no commission from God to persecute religions. This is the true state of the question. All princes in the world own, that they have not the power of the sword against the true servants of God, or against orthodoxy, but only against the enemies of truth. It is upon this foundation that the heathen emperors punished the ancient christians, and that nowadays the inquisition puts Protestants to death. It is therefore altogether needless to prove to persecutors, that they ought not to put the faithful to death; for it is what they do not pretend to, and they are not such fools as to believe, that, by being deprived of that power, they lose any thing of their own.

The only question therefore is to know, whether they may punish those who serve God according to the dictates of their consciences? The fathers of the three first centuries have denied it: why then did not Erasmus dare to imitate them? And, what is still more surprizing (23), what is the reason that, within these few years, a minister of Holland has endeavoured to render those that are for toleration odious, because they rob sovereigns of one of their greatest prerogatives (24)? Does not this argue more malice and injustice than the heathens shewed against the fathers of the primitive church, whom they did not charge with that pretended attempt against the state? But, to shew the illusion of that minister, it is sufficient to ask him, why he takes from Catholic princes the power of the sword, with relation to Protestants? Why does he think that to be lawful in himself, which he condemns in others as high-treason? I speak in behalf of truth, will he answer: But it is what every body pretends to.

[G] Mr Moreri has committed some considerable faults. I. He should not have given to Philip of Burgundy the title of archbishop of Utrecht, but that of bishop; for Utrecht was not yet an archbishopric.

so exact as he should have been [H]. I shall set down the title of some works of Geldenhaur [I]. He understood well poetry and oratory (e).

The emperor Maximilian judged him worthy of the bays, in the year 1517. This was after he had read with attention about twenty Latin verses made in his praise by Geldenhaur (f). Note, that this writer suppressed a truth in one of his histories [K]. The conditions, on which he was made historiographer, may sometimes be an occasion of lying [L].

There is, in the theatrum of Freherus a small contradiction, which I must not pass in silence. I have observed, that we find there, that Geldenhaur was not called to Marpurg till the year 1534; but I have not said, that we find there, in another place, that he taught at Marpurg from the year 1526 [M].

II. Marpurg is not the first town of Germany, where in Geldenhaur taught. III. He never taught at Wittemberg. IV. Nor was he murdered by robbers in 1542. Valerius Andreas has furnished Mr Moreri with half of these falsities. These are his words: 'Turpi Apollasia à Catholicis Belgis ad Germanos Marpurgenses transfugit: ubi postquam annos aliquot historiam explanasset, dum Wittembergam versus iter instituit à latronibus fisco securi capite misere perit, An. salutis c. d. x. l. i. die x. Januarii, ut refert Reinhardus Lorichius Hadamarius, scholius ad Apbthouii Progymnasmata. — By a scandalous apocryphy, he went over from the Catholics of Holland to the Germans at Marpurg; where after he had explained history for some years, as he was journeying towards Wittemberg, he died miserably by the hands of robbers, his head being split with an ax, on the tenth of January 1542; as we learn from Reinhardus Lorichius Hadamarius, in his comment on the Progymnasmata of Apbthouius.' There are several faults in these words: 1. Geldenhaur did not retire to Marpurg, when he abjured the Romish religion; for he did not go thither 'till after he had resided at Worms, Strasburg, and Augsburg; see nevertheless the remark [M]. 2. He did not take a journey to Wittemberg, after he had taught history for some years at Marpurg; for he went upon that journey in the year 1526, whilst he was yet a Roman Catholic, and in the service of Maximilian of Burgundy. 3. He did not die of the wounds he received from assassins, but of the plague, sixteen years after he had been set upon. 4. The author, whom Valerius Andreas quotes, says expressly, that Geldenhaur recovered of his wounds. If the words he has made use of (25) had been known, these falsities had been avoided; which shews how much it imports to consult the authors one has a mind to quote. Swertius (26) relates only this falsity, that Geldenhaur, going from Marpurg to Wittemberg, was killed by highwaymen, the tenth of January 1542.

[H] Freherus has not been so exact as he should have been. He ought not to have said, that Geldenhaur retired from the imperial court, relictâ imperatoria aula, and betook himself to the service of Philip of Burgundy, in the year 1512; for the court of Charles of Austria, which he left, was not yet an imperial court. It is a gross error in reckoning, to say, that a man, who goes to Marpurg in the year 1534, and dies there the tenth of January 1542, taught there history two years, and afterwards divinity nine years. Historiam primum biennium, ac postmodum novennium sacras literas . . . interpretatus est. This would be false, though we should suppose, that he began to teach divinity the first year.

[I] I shall set down the titles of some works of Geldenhaur. I take them from Valerius Andreas. Historia Batavica cum Appendice de vetusta Batavorum nobilitate, Strasburg, 1533. But Vossius mentions an edition of the year 1520 (27). De Batavorum Insula Germaniae inferioris Historia, Strasburg, 1532. Vita Philippi à Burgundia Episcopi Ultrajectini. See the following remark. *Catalogus Episcoporum Ultrajectinorum. Epistola ad Guilielmum Geldria principem gratulatoria de principatum suorum adoptione. Epistola de Zelandia. [K] He suppressed a truth in one of his histories. This he did in the history of Philip of Burgundy, natural son of duke Philip the good. He did not forget to relate, that that bastard was so handsome in his youth, and so capable to fire a woman's heart, that some of that sex were so lustful and shameless as to run after him: but, instead of adding, that some of them found him so kind, as to have had three bastards by him; he represents him as endowed with a maiden modesty, which was like to cost him his life. 'Moribus & conversatione ita compositus ut magis Parthenius quam Philippus appellari potuisset. Quare non tam amabat quam amabatur, lasciviores enim quædam matronæ in tantum eum, seposita omni verecundia, deperibant ut harum causa fere in vitæ periculum incidisset, nisi is qui ei mortem intentatus putabatur, occidit fuisset (29). — He was of so modest a behaviour, that he deserved the name of Parthenius, rather than that of Philip. Wherefore he was not so much a lover, as an object of love; for some lustful matrons, laying aside all modesty, were so fond of him, that upon their account he ran a risk of his life, had not the person, who threatened him with death, been killed.' Here follows the note Mr Matthæus makes thereupon: 'Nec exemplo delitutus, præsertim patris Philippi, suscepi spurius non paucos. Tres etiam ex una Philippum, Joannem, & Oliverium, ut observavi ex adversariis Gisberti Lappii à Waveren (30). — After the example of his father Philip, he had several bastards; three by one woman, Philip, John, and Oliver, as I have learned from the Adversaria of Gisbert Lappii à Waveren.' Let us learn from hence not to trust histories, written by domestics, that have received great favours. They suppress what is injurious to the memory of their masters. Let us confess nevertheless, that Geldenhaur does not pretend, that the chastity of his Philip was of long continuance; for he owns, that that bishop of Utrecht loved the fair sex; and that he treated with greater rigour drunken priests, than those that were lascivious (31). Note, that he was openly a Protestant, when he published that history (32), and that is altogether heretical, if we believe Valerius Andreas (33). Note also, that Suffridus Petri, who has taken from it the life of Philip of Burgundy, which he has inserted in his appendix of Beke, has left out all that was not favourable to the church of Rome. Mr Matthæus (34) makes this observation in the notes he has added to the new edition of that little book of Geldenhaur, inserted in his Veteris ævi Analæta (35).

[L] The conditions on which he was made historiographer, may sometimes be an occasion of lying. Philip of Burgundy charged Geldenhaur to make a collection of all the memorable things, that should happen, either in the diocese of Utrecht, or in the neighbouring countries, and to read both to him, and his counsellors, his collections every month. Geldenhaur obeyed that order, and was warned to alter every thing that was amiss in his narrative; which caution reached not only falsities, but also indifferences: that is, if he happened to mention any thing in such a manner as did not seem discreet to the prince's council, he was ordered to change it. Now how many truths are comprehended in that class of things? it must be owned indeed, that an historian may rectify a great many passages, when statesmen take the trouble to examine his writings; but, at the same time, there are some passages, whose publication they blame, only because they are true. 'Volut illi (Philippus Burgundus) per me notari si quid in sua ditione aut in finitimis regionibus memoratum dignum actum esset, sed ea conditione ut singulis mensibus quæ annotaram, ipsi & à consiliis prælegerem: quod cum facerem, admonebant si quid perperam, si quid parum confiderate scriptum audissent, id mutarem (36).'

[M] Freherus says, that he taught at Marpurg from the year 1526. Freherus relates (37), that the university of Marpurg was opened the first of July 1526, when professor Johannes Ferrarius Montanus was made the first rector, and associated among other colleagues colleagues with Francis Lambert and Gerardus Noviomagus. This Francis Lambert died in the year 1530, as I have said in his article. This circumstance alone would suffice to shew the contradiction of Freherus; for Geldenhaur could not be professor at Marburg at the same time with Lambert, if he begun only to be so in the year 1534. But on what narrative of Freherus can we depend? I believe we ought to say that Geldenhaur was professor at Marburg in the year 1529, that he quitted his post to go to Worms, that he went afterwards to Strasburg, and next to Augsburg, and that lastly, through this professorial inconstancy, of which I have spoken elsewhere (38), he returned to Marburg in the year 1534. On this footing, my first critical note (39) against Valerius Andreas Desellius is not good; but who would not have thought it so, since I founded it on a writer (40), who has cited the manuscript register of the university of Marburg? he has cited them likewise, where he says, that Geldenhaur was professor at Marburg in the year 1526. Is this to know how to make use of a book? note, that Melchior Adam knew nothing of this first professorship of Geldenhaur.

GELENIUS (SIGISMUND), born of a very good family at Prague [A], was one of the learned men of the XVIth century. He began very early to travel in Germany, France, and Italy, and learned easily the languages of those three countries. He confirmed himself, in Italy, in the knowledge of the Latin tongue, and learned Greek there under Marc Musurus. As he returned to Germany, he passed through Basil, and made himself known to Erasmus, who conceived an esteem for him, and advised John Frobenius to make him corrector of his printing-house. Gelenius accepted the place, as troublesome and painful as it was; for he had many Hebrew, Greek, and Latin books to correct, which Frobenius printed. He discharged well that employment till his death, that is, during thirty years; and did not content himself with correcting the work of the Printers, but set up for a translator and a critic. Few learned men have translated so many works out of Greek into Latin as he [B]. He was a tall, bulky man. He had a good memory, a ready and subtle wit; was very seldom

[A] He was of a very good family. Let us see what Curio says about it: 'Gelenia familia antiqua & honesta, à cervis nomen traxit, quos ipsi Gelenos vocant, ita ut Latina lingua cervina dici possit. Patrem habuit summo apud regem loco & honore, hominem minime illiteratum, nam & Moriam Erasmus in patriam linguam convertit, & lepidum salumque opus cum suis communicavit. Matre ejus femina primaria & nobili, propter mulieris prudentiam & probatos mores, regina plurimum & familiariter utebatur. Talibus parentibus ortus Gelenius, parem quoque, hoc est, ingenuam & liberalem habuit educationem (1). — The Gelenian family, an ancient and honourable one, took its name from Stags (Cervi) which they call Geleni; so that in Latin it may be called Cervina. His father had a post of great honour under the king, a man by no means illiterate, for he translated Erasmus's Praise of Folly into his native tongue, and communicated that witty and satirical work to his countrymen. His mother, a lady of high birth, was in great favour with the queen, on account of her prudent conduct. Gelenius, sprung from such parents, had an education answerable to his birth, that is, an ingenuous and liberal one.'

[B] Few learned men have translated so many works out of Greek into Latin as he.] After having published a dictionary in four languages (2), he made notes upon Pliny and Livy, and published them. He translated the Jewish antiquities of Josephus, and corrected the other works of that author, by collating together several manuscripts. Afterwards he turned into Latin some homilies of St Chrysostom, and then the Roman history of Dionysius Halicarnassensis; the ecclesiastical history of Evagrius; Origen's work against Celsus; the works of Philo, and those of Appian. After that he undertook the translation of the works of Justin Martyr, and had translated most of them when he died. This is what I find in the preface of Curio before Appian. I do not find there any mention of what Gelenius had done upon Ammianus Marcellinus, a work, which Henry Valesius has much commended; these are his words (3): 'Erat quidem in utroque horum virorum (4) magna doctrina, ut scripta utriusque testantur. Sed in Gelenio major quidam ingenii vis, & judicium acutus fuit. Quod cum multi præclari labores illius viri testantur, tum maxime interpretationes Latine Dionysii Halicarnassensis, Appiani, Philonis item ac Josephi, Origenis & aliorum. Ex quibus apparet eum excellenti ingenio & singulari doctrina præditi fuisse. Sed & Ammiani Marcellini historie ab eo editæ id ipsum abunde testantur. In quibus plurima acutè & ingeniose emendavit; & insignem paginarum transpositionem, quæ in Mss. omnibus codicibus reperitur, & in Editione exstat Accursii, mira dexteritate restituit. Quamobrem ejus viri nomini libenter hoc laudis testimonium impertimus, neminem adhuc exstitisse, qui de historia Marcellini melius meritis sit. — Both these men were very learned, as appears from their writings. But Gelenius had a greater force of genius, and a more discerning judgment. This appears from many labours of that great man, but particularly from his Latin versions of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Appian, Philo, Josephus, Origen, and others. All these discover his uncommon abilities and learning. As does likewise his edition of Ammianus Marcellinus; in whom he has made several ingenious emendations, and, with wonderful dexterity, restored the remarkable transposition of pages, which is to be found in all the manuscript copies, and is extant in the edition of Accursius. Wherefore I willingly give this testimony of applause to so great a man, that no one has deserved better of Marcellinus's history.' Erasmus does not speak so well of Gelenius's performance upon Pliny; for, on the contrary, he gives a very ill character of it: 'Sigismundus Gelenius tuo nomini (5) dicavit Annotationes in Plinium jam tertio ab ipso castigatum. Sed mire imposuit illi codex manu descriptus, in quo sciolus aliquis è suo capite mutavit quicquid libuit, & quodam modo novum Plinium nobis dedit. Admonui, ne fideret illi exemplari, sed auditus non sum. Hermolaus non ausus est mutare lectionem Plinianam. Gelenius se putavit rem mirificam præstitisse, ego censo crimen esse inexpiabile (6). — Sigismund Gelenius inscribed to you his notes upon Pliny, now a third time corrected by him. But he was strangely imposed upon by a manuscript copy, in which some smatterer had made what alterations he thought proper, and given us as it were a new Pliny. I advised him not to trust to that copy, but he had no regard to my advice. Hermolaus would not venture to alter the text of Pliny. Gelenius thought he had done a wonderful thing; but I think it an unpardonable crime.' Here follows Mr Huët's judgment (7): 'In his quoque numeratur Sigismundus Gelenius Bohemus, quo vix quisquam pluribus hanc artem claris interpretis monumentis ditavit: disertus imprimis habitus est & elegans; audax in confringendis pluribus in unum periodis, vel disjungendis, sensus sibi non semper intellectos ad libitum recoquit. — Among these likewise is reckoned Sigismund Gelenius, a Bohemian, than whom no one has left more monuments of his skill in this science; he is esteemed particularly eloquent and beautiful; bold in connecting several periods into one, or in disuniting them, he makes alterations, where the sense is not clear to him.'

seldom in a passion [C]; and cared neither for honours, nor riches [D]. He preferred, before the employments that were offered him elsewhere, the peaceful place he had at Basil (a), where he died [E] like a good christian, being fifty seven years old. He married in that city, and left behind him two sons and one daughter (b), of whose destiny I am ignorant. Some place his death in the year 1554 (c), others in the year 1555 (d). His edition of Arnobius has been much censured [F].

(3) Curio, ubi supra.

[C] He was very seldom in a passion. Curio expresses this in these words (3): 'Erat in eo animi lenitas mira, naturæque bonitas quædam, ut vix irasci posset etiam irritatus... cum nemine unquam similitatem gessit: rerum alienarum minimè curiosus, minime suspicax: sed antiqua non tamen stulta simplicitate præditus. — He had a wonderful mildness of temper, and a certain good-nature, which scarce suffered him to be angry, even tho' provoked... he had no resentment to any one; was by no means inquisitive into other mens affairs, nor at all suspicious; but endued with an ancient, but not weak, simplicity of manners.' This is the true character of a good man; which will appear yet more by the following remark.

(9) Id. ibid.

[D] He cared neither for honours, nor riches. I use Curio's words (9): 'Quanta vero continentia atque abstinentia fuerit, quarum illa in iis quæ ab sunt non expetendis, altera in iis quæ ad sunt, in nostraque potestate sunt, abstinendo, illa declarant, quod cum per tot annos tantopere in re literaria elaboravit, ex quo magnorum virorum gratiam est consecutus, nullas tamen divitias congessit, nullas reliquit, suppellectile domestica, victuque contentus. Bonis & doctis, si quos egere animadvertibat, largiebatur: felicibus & fortunatis non invadebat: calamitatibus aliorum afflictebatur: neminem contemnebat. Illud verò maximum continentia signum fuit: quod in Regis Bohemiae aulam magnis præmiis, & honoribus, quibusque vel cupidus & ambitiosus aliquis contentus esse potest, allectus renuit, hanc quietam & moderatam vitam ambitionis illis & turbulentis dignitatibus anteponebat. Omitto provincias bonas & literas & artes profitendi oblatas, quas nunquam ut susciperet adduci potuit, adeo tenax propositi, vitæque generis semel honestè suscepti, semper fuit. — How great his continence and abstinence were, the former of which virtues consists in not desiring what we have not, the latter in abstaining from what is in our power, appears in this, that, notwithstanding his many years learned labours, during which he acquired the friendship of great men, he was deeped up no riches, nor left any behind him, being satisfied with his private fortunes. He was bountiful to good and learned men, whom he observed to be in want: he envied not the happy and successful: he sympathized with the calamities of others; he despised no body. But the greatest instance of his continence, was, his refusing the great rewards and honours, such as were sufficient to satisfy avarice and ambition, by which he was invited to the court of Bohemia, preferring this quiet and humble life to ambitious and turbulent dignities. I omit the professorships he refused, so tenacious was he of his purpose, and the kind of life he had once made choice of. Though Erasmus thought Gelenium worthy of a better fortune, yet he durst not wish him riches; being apprehensive lest plenty should cool that zeal, with which he saw him labour for the good of the commonwealth of learning (10) Gelenium, according to Thuanus, struggled with poverty all his life-time (11).

[E] He died at Basil. Mr Moreri has here made a notorious transposition. Sigismund de Ghelen, (thus he makes Thuanus speak) a native of Basil, died in Bohemia. Thuanus had said, that he was born in Bohemia, and died at Basil (12). Mr Moreri is in the wrong to say, that Gelenium has translated some homilies of Origen: he should have said, of St Chrysostom. Mr Teiffier is to blame not to mention it: he has been led into an error by those that have abridged Gesner (13). He has also corrected several homilies of St Chrysostom: these are Mr Teiffier's words (14), which import as if he had translated none: but if you do but look into father Labbe (15), you will find there several homilies of St Chrysostom turned into Latin by Gelenium.

[F] His edition of Arnobius has been much censured. Here is what Barthius says of it (16): 'Ingeniosissimus sed audacissimus, & nil prorsus sibi negans, Arnobii corrector Sigismundus Gelenium in eam editionem quam totam ad suum captum reformavit, aut transformavit potius, testatus neminem sibi unquam auctorem tantum negotii exhibuisse. — A most ingenious, but most bold, man, and who denied himself nothing: I mean Sigismund Gelenium, the corrector of Arnobius, in that edition of his, which he entirely reformed, or rather transformed to his own genius, assuring us, that no author had given him so much trouble.' Add to this passage that of the preface to Arnobius, of the Leyden edition, 1651. 'Arnobium quidem hunc primus Romanæ vulgaverat Franciscus Priscianensis Florentinus, sed una cum veteris manuscripti, quo usus fuerat, fœdis admodum erroribus, Sigismundus postea Gelenium editionem hanc corruptam solo ingenio, uti potuit, restituit. Sed ingenium ille fiducia malo exemplo usus, conjecturas suas textui inseruit, antiquas lectiones quo imperio eiecit, & Arnobium nobis effinxit, qui Arnobii speciem non referret. Hanc audaciam merito reprehendit Canterus. — Franciscus Priscianensis, of Florence, first published Arnobius at Rome, but together with the foul errors of the ancient manuscript he made use of. Afterwards Sigismund Gelenium restored this faulty edition by his own genius, as well as he could. But, depending too much on his own abilities, he inserted his conjectures in the text, rejected the old readings by his sole authority, and dressed up for us an Arnobius, but very unlike Arnobius. Canterus justly censures this rashness.'

GENTILIS DE BECHIS, a native of Urbino, and canon of Florence, was preferred to the bishopric of Arezzo the twenty first of October, 1473. The Florentines were very glad of it, and sent him often upon embassies to the courts of princes; particularly to Charles VIII, king of France, to condole with him upon the death of the king his father, and to congratulate his accession to the crown (a). He got a reputation by his eloquence, which he shewed in the Latin orations he pronounced in several places of Italy. He had a share in the education of Leo X. He applied himself also to poetry. Some critics speak of his productions with contempt, and cannot forgive him the barbarous Latin words that crept into his works, nor bear, that the best of his pieces should contain the phrase præstare obedientiam. We shall see the proof all this in a passage of Alcyonius [A]. The speech, in which that

(a) Taken out of Ugheili, Tom. I, of the Italia sacra, pag. 790.

[A] The proof of all this is in a passage of Alcyonius. I take it out of a dialogue, wherein Julius de Medicis, one of the interlocutors, speaks thus to the legate John de Medicis, who was afterwards Pope Leo X. 'Memini etiam operam te dare Gentili præfule Aretino homini, ut suis temporibus politoris humanitatis laude florentissimo. Sed nihil etiam melior ille fuit quam Politianus, id quod cum ex aliis monimentis ejus perspicere potest, tum ex orationibus quas in diversis Italice locis complures habuit. In illis enim multa verba ex trivio arrepta videntur, multæ quoque elocutiones barbaræ & agrestes occurrunt, sententiæ autem multæ pueriles ac imprudentes sunt. Nonnulli tamen eam in primis orationem honorifica laude prosequuntur, quam habuit apud Alexandrum VI. Pontif. Max. Legatus populi Florentini that phrase is found, is that, which he made to Pope Alexander VI, upon his embassy of obedience. Some pretend, that the great desire he had to harangue upon that occasion, was one of the reasons, which obliged Peter de Medicis to hinder the people of Italy from paying that duty to the new Pope all together, and by a single deputation [B]. Gentilis was sent to Charles VIII (b), at the time of the expedition of Naples, and settled the conditions, which the Florentines were to observe in that nice situation of the affairs of Italy.

* Florentini paulo post quam ille sacris Christianis publice praefectus est. Verum hanc quoque non satis dignam video quae iterum legatur; in ea enim minus eleganter expressit id quod homini exprimendum erat elegantissime, hoc est causam cur Romam venisset, quae erat ut per illum populus Florentinus se conferret ad auctoritatem Pontificis Maximi. Ille autem in hoc sensu reddendo plebeiam elocutionem usurpavit, quae est obedientiam praestare, quam ob rem id genus orationes tempus, ut alias multorum oblivione obruit. Feruntur quoque ejusdem versiculi faciliore quidem musa facti, sed sine cultu & Latinae puritatis nitore (1). — I remember that you study Gentilis, a Florentine, and a bishop, a man of polite learning for his times. But he was nothing better than Politian, as appears both from his other remains, and from the orations, which he pronounced in several parts of Italy; for we find in them many vulgar words, many barbarous and rustic phrases, and many chiblistic and weak sentiments. Some however particularly extol that, which he spoke before Pope Alexander VI, a little after his election. But even that, I think, is hardly worthy a second reading; for in that, he has not elegantly enough expressed what ought to have been expressed with the greatest elegance, to wit, the reason of his coming to Rome, which was to acknowledge, in the name of the people of Florence, the Pope's authority. In expressing this, he made use of the vulgar phrase, obedientiam praestare, for which reason these kind of orations, as well as many others, will perish by time. He was more happy in poetry, but without attaining to the elegance and purity of the Latin tongue. These words contain a prediction, which time has verified; for the orations of that Gentilis are no more talked of, than if they had never been extant.

[B] The great desire he had to harangue, at the time of the embassy of obedience to Alexander VI, was one of the reasons why this duty was not paid . . . by a single deputation.] Lewis Sforza had caused a resolution to be taken, that the states of Italy should send to the Pope only one embassy of obedience, 'where' in the deputies of each prince and republic should be together, march each in his rank, have but one orator, and so well concert measures, that, if the new Pope had purposed to divide them, he might be disappointed in his hopes . . . (2). But Peter de Medicis, who had not dared to oppose that resolution, because he alone was of a contrary opinion, forgot nothing that he thought proper to hinder the execution of it. He had procured himself to be named chief of the deputation of the Florentines; his equipage was almost all completed; and, because none in Italy, except the republic of Venice, had more money than he, of which he was very profuse upon such pompous occasions, he was sure of making a greater figure alone, than all the other ambassadors and deputies together. . . . He conceived, that, if his train marched with that of the other ambassadors, it would be eclipsed by the great number, and that none but critical eyes would distinguish it amidst that confusion: whereas, if he entered Rome, and went to his audience alone, both the good judges, and such as were but indifferently such, would equally do him justice. However it had not been impossible to work him out of that prepossession, if his friends had undertaken to do it. But one of them, that was most intimate with him, confirmed him, by another conceit, in his error, instead of curing him of it. This was one Scipio Gentile, a Florentine gentleman (3), and bishop of Arezzo, who had made himself very famous by polite literature, and his agreeable conversation. His birth and great estate did not make him proud, or less tractable; and his too great passion for eloquence was almost the only fault he had. He was but a mean orator; and yet he had so great a conceit of himself in that particular, that he would scarce yield to the matchless Savanarola. He had obtained, by his interest, from the republic of Florence, that he should harangue the Pope for them; and had afterwards composed his speech with all the application he was capable of. He had communicated it to John Picus Mirandula, Angelus Politianus, Marcellus Ficinus, and other wits of Italy, who, by their approbation, confirmed him in the opinion that it was a master-piece; so that nothing could vex him more, than being hindered from pronouncing it; which however must of necessity happen, if there was but one orator for all Italy, because the king of Naples, as the highest in degree of all the princes, would have the right to name him. That prince, who had in his capital city the most flourishing academy in Europe for the Belles Lettres, and of which the famous Sannazar was director, would not choose a person, that was not of that body to harangue his holiness. Whereupon Gentile, animated by his own interest, stirred up Peter de Medicis to that degree, that he made him solicit the king of Naples, for reviving the custom, that each particular prince and state of Italy should pay their duty by themselves to the Pope (4). This succeeded: the ceremony of obedience was performed by each prince and republic of Italy in particular, and the two Florentines found their account in it. The equipage of Peter de Medicis out-did all the rest in magnificence; and the speech of Scipio Gentile was so much esteemed, that it was prefixed to the collection of such sort of pieces (5).

This quotation may seem too long to some; but I do not doubt that several others will be glad to find here a full account of so curious a thing as this is.

GENTILIS (JOHN VALENTINUS) (a), a native of Cosenza [A] in the kingdom of Naples, left his country for his religion, towards the middle of the XVIth century, and retired to Geneva, where several Italian families had already formed a congregation. There happened to be among those refugees of Italy some wits, who subtilized upon the mystery of the Trinity, on the words Essence, Person, Co-essential &c. George Blandrata, a Physician, and John Paul Alciatus, a Milaneze, were the chief of those innovators, with an advocate called Matthew Gribaud. The thing was treated without noise, and by private writings. Gentilis would have a share in those disputes, and contributed not a little to embolden those new Arians. This gave occasion to the Articles of Faith, which were drawn up in the

[A] He was a native of Cosenza. Some (1) have said, that he was not born in that town; others (2) make him a Neapolitan. Nicodemus confutes them invincibly, by the testimony of several grave authors, and by the subscription of Valentinus Gentilis; but he is mistaken, when he fathers upon Theodore Beza the history of the punishment of that heretic. To be entirely in the right, he should have ascribed that work to Benedicinus Aretius, after having censured Quattronari, who ascribed it to Calvin.

the Italian consistory, the eighteenth of May 1558 [B]. They contained the most pure orthodoxy concerning that mystery, and exacted a promise in express terms, and upon pain of being accounted guilty of perjury, never to do any thing directly, or indirectly, that should oppose it. Gentilis subscribed those articles, and yet continued to spread his errors clandestinely: Whereupon the magistrates took cognizance of the thing, and committed him to prison. He was convicted of having violated his subscription, which he endeavoured to excuse from the suggestions of his conscience. He presented several writings, first to endeavour to palliate and maintain his opinions, and then to pacify Calvin, and to acknowledge and abjure his errors: In consideration of which, the magistrates of Geneva sentenced him only to undergo an Amende honorable, to throw his writings into the fire, and to promise not to go out of the city without leave. This sentence was executed the second of September, 1558. He was set at liberty a few days after; and, upon his petition, shewing his incapacity to give bail, he was excused from it; but they made him swear not to go out of Geneva without the consent of the magistrates. Nevertheless he soon fled away, and retired into the country, to Matthew Gribaud [C], his companion in heresy. He went afterwards to Lyons, and then wandered from place to place in Dauphiné and Savoy; and being safe no where, he returned to the village, whither he retired first, in the territory of the canton of Bern. He was soon known there, and put in prison; but he was set at liberty not many days after, and published a confession of Faith, attended with some proofs and some invectives against St Athanasius. He dedicated it to the bailiff, who had committed him, and made him very uneasy by such a dedication [D]. About the same time, he was imprisoned at Lyons for his doctrine; but, having had the cunning to shew, that he only opposed Calvin, and not the mystery of the Trinity, he was set at liberty. Blandrata and Alciatus, who left no stone unturned, in Poland, to plant their heresies, invited him to come to them, to be their fellow-labourer. They would have done more mischief than they did, if they had not differed among themselves, and if the king of Poland had not published, in 1566, an edict, by which he banished all strangers, who taught their new tenets [E]. Gentilis retired into Moravia, from whence, being gone to Vienna in Austria, he resolved to return into Savoy, where he hoped to find still his friend Gribaud; not to mention, that death had the memoirs they copy? Or is it because they do not take notice of the alterations they make in them?

[B] This gave occasion to the articles of faith which were drawn up in the Italian consistory, the 18th of May 1558.] The author (3) of the book I have quoted, and Calvin against Gentilis, speak only of the articles of faith of the Italian consistory, and name only five persons that signed them. They say, indeed, that Gentilis and five more, refusing to sign at first, signed afterwards, when they were called in private (4); but they do not say, that he was one of the seven, who chose rather to leave Geneva, than to set their hands to the articles, 'till the powerful solicitations of their countrymen had obliged them to return, and subscribe. It is Mr Leti (5), who, without mentioning the articles drawn up by the Italian consistory, mentions others much longer, which, according to him, were proposed to be subscribed before the council. These articles were only the confession of faith, which Calvin had lately drawn up, and which had been approved by the ministers, the syndics, the council of XXV, and that of CC, and the general assembly of the people. He names several that subscribed them; and, among the rest, Galeazzo Caracciolo, Cello Conte Martinengo, Massimiliano suo fratello Ministro della Chiesa. But as to the first, the account of his life informs us, that he was absent from Geneva, from the seventh of March to the fourth of October, 1558, in which interval the articles were subscribed, Gentilis imprisoned, &c. As for the two others, the same account informs us, that we must reduce them to one, that is to the minister. Now this Martinengo was dead before the subscribing of the articles was thought of. See the 262d letter of Calvin. Mr Leti adds, that seven persons refused to subscribe, and went out of the city: Che in fatti si ritirarono dalla città e tra questi Andrea Ostellani, Marco Pizzi, e Valentino Gentile: quali vinti poi in breve dalle persuasive de loro compatrioti, si ridussero a sotto scrivere (6). What he says might be true: but if it be so, are not the authors of other accounts much to blame, for having suppressed things so essential to this history? Dr Spon (7) does but partly agree with them: He says, that the council caused the suspected Italians to subscribe the general confession of the church: he owns that some of them left the city, but not that they returned to subscribe; nor does he put Gentilis among those that went out of Geneva. How comes history to be so full of variations? Is it because people delight to falsify

[C] He retired into the country, to Matthew Gribaud.] Aretius says, that he retired in Pagum Fargiarum; and that that village is in the country of Gex, in præfectura Gajenfi. Which makes me believe, that there is an error in the passage of Lubieniecus (8), where it is said, that Matthæus Gribaldus celeberrimus Jurisconsultus Patavinus was pagi Turgiarum dominus. Instead of Turgiarum, I would say Fargiarum. The country of Gex was then possessed by the canton of Bern.

[D] He dedicated to the bailiff of Gex a Confession of Faith, and made him very uneasy by such a dedication.] That bailiff of Gex had demanded a Confession of Faith of Gentilis, that he might cause it to be examined by some ministers, and sent to Bern: Whereupon Gentilis got it printed, as if by the bailiff's order, and dedicated it to him (9). The Bibliothèque of the Anti-Trinitarians (10) says, that that bailiff, who had set Gentilis at liberty, at the desire of John Paul Alciatus, became suspected of heresy at Bern, because that Confession was dedicated to him; and that therefore he secured Gentilis as soon as he came within his reach: which he did, to remove those suspicions. Whether that be true or no, yet it is most certain, nothing more powerfully influences those, who would preserve or enlarge their dignities, than the desire not to be accounted heretics. If one should write the history of all the unjust proceedings, and hypocritical tricks, which spring from that source, how many strange things would be brought to light? Gentilis's Confession, and the pieces annexed to it, were printed at Lyons, though the title page bore Antwerp; and the bookseller was made to speak, in the preface, under the name of Theophilus ad filios Eclesiæ. In Gentilis's indictment, his lies were mentioned before his cheats (11). They found about him some other works of his own writing, when he was seized; but these were not printed. Aretius (12), and the Bibliothèque of the Anti-Trinitarians (13), mention them.

[E] The king of Poland published, in 1566, an edict of banishment against all strangers, who taught new doctrines.] Moreri has committed some faults in this place: I. He pretends, that Valentinus Gentilis was driven out of Poland towards the year 1562. II. That the edict, then published by king Sigismund Augustus, banished all heretics. All which is false. The had delivered him from the most dreadful adversary he had in those parts, I mean Calvin. But he brought himself into a snare; for the bailiff of the canton of Bern, who before imprisoned him, happened to be still in office, and did not fail to lay hands on him the eleventh of June 1566 [F]. The cause was carried before the magistrates of Bern, where it was under examination from the fifth of August to the ninth of September. Gentilis, being duly convicted of having obstinately, and against his own oath, oppugned the mystery of the Trinity, was sentenced to lose his head. He gloried in suffering for the honour of God the Father [G], and taxed his adversaries with Sabellianism (b). He held a particular opinion; for he believed, that, during the extent of eternity, God had created a most excellent spirit, which was incarnate, when the fulness of the times was come (c). I do not think, that this is the opinion of a Tritheist (d): But, no doubt, he held different opinions at different times.

(b) This article is extracted out of a Latin book, printed at Geneva by Francis Perrio, in 1567, in 4to. It contains, besides diverse dogmatical treatises, the History of Gentilis's condemnation, by Benedictus Aretius, a divine of Bern.

(c) See the remark [G], towards the end.

(d) He is so called in the Moreri, printed in Holland, in the article of John Paul Alciatus.

The edict was published in a diet called the fifth of March 1566 (14), and did not concern the Calvinists. Aretius would not have commended the king of Poland upon it, as he has done, if the reformed had been comprehended in it; and they were so far from being so, that they are accused of having promoted the publishing of that edict: 'Instigantibus adversariis Romano & Lemano spiritu ductis rex Augustus in Comitio Lublinski anno 1566, legem horrendi carminis in Anabaptistas, & Trideitas latam promulgari curavit, quæ intra mensum regni finibus excedere jussit. — At the instigation of their adversaries, actuated by the spirit of Rome and Geneva, king Augustus, in the diet of Lublin, in 1566, published a severe edict against the Anabaptists and Trideists, ordering them to leave the kingdom within a month.' Thus speaks Lubienicius, in the 194th page of his Reformation of Poland. III. There is no exactness in saying, in general terms, that Gentilis, going through Bern, had his head cut off there, about the year 1565. Father Maimbourg (15) has not entirely avoided an anachronism, with respect to Gentilis; for he makes him dispute at the conference of Petricow in 1566; whereas it was held in 1565.

[F] The bailiff, who had formerly imprisoned him, happened to be still in office, and did not fail to lay hands on him, the eleventh of June 1566. It was at Gex, that Gentilis was arrested, and not at Bern. He was gone thither (16), to desire the bailiff to permit a public disputation, of which the scheme and conditions were found among the papers of that fugitive. He proposed, that the bailiff should give notice to the ministers and consistories in the neighbourhood, that if any one had a mind to maintain Calvin's doctrine against Gentilis, he should come to Gex within eight days, to dispute with him; on this condition, that he, who should not be able to prove his own opinion by the pure word of God, should be put to death, as a notorious impostor, and a maintainer of a false religion:

and that, if no body accepted the challenge, the bailiff and all the town-council should proclaim, that Gentilis's sentiments, touching the most high God, and his son Jesus Christ, were orthodox. The answer, that was made to the first overture of this dispute, was the imprisoning of the heretic (17).

[G] He gloried in suffering for the honour of God the Father. Aretius does not mention any other remarkable thing he said on his dying-day; but he relates elsewhere (18) the particulars I am going to set down: 'Gentilis de se ita & scripsit & loquutus est: quod esset patronus summi patris eminentiæ, & assertor gloriæ patris. Nec dubitavit etiam dicere, neminem adhuc (quod ipse quidem sciret) pro gloria & eminentia patris mortuum esse; prophetas, apostolos, pioque martyres pro filii gloria perfectiones, mortem & extrema quæque passos esse; eminentiam autem Dei patris nullos adhuc martyres habere. — Gentilis wrote and spoke of himself as a patron and assertor of the supremacy and glory of the Father. Nor did he scruple saying, that no one yet (as he knew) had died in defence of the glory and supremacy of the Father; that the prophets, apostles, and pious martyrs, had suffered persecutions, death, and extreme tortures for the glory of the Son; but that the superiority of God the Father had as yet produced no martyrs.' Let us mention here the opinion he professed in a synod of Poland: 'Sententia ejus quam in Polonia in Synodo Pincoviz ann. 1562, die 4. Novembris celebrata proposuerat, hæc fuit, Deum creavisse in latitudine æternitatis Spiritum quemdam excellentissimum, qui postea in plenitudine temporis incarnatus est (19). — The opinion, which he professed in Poland, in the Synod of Pincovia, held Novem. 4, 1562, was this: That God, in the extent of eternity, had created a most excellent spirit, which afterwards, in the fulness of time, was incarnate.'

GENTILIS (ALBERIC), professor of the civil-law at Oxford, was the son of Matthew Gentilis, an Italian physician [A], descended from an ancient and noble family of the march of Ancona. That physician, having found some abuses in the church of Rome, and relished the good seed of the reformation, left his country, and retired into Carniola, with Alberic his eldest son, and Scipio the youngest but one of his seven children. Alberic was sent into England, where his great capacity procured him a good settlement, I mean, the place of professor of the civil-law in the University of Oxford, in the year 1582. He had taken his degree of doctor at Perugia, being twenty one years old; and, soon after, he was made a judge in the town of Ascoli; which employment he quitted, to follow his father in his voluntary banishment, and the dictates of his conscience. He composed several works [B], which gained him a great reputation. In some of his writings he does not entirely embrace the hypotheses of the [A] He was son of Matthew Gentilis, an Italian physician. I have found something concerning him in a work of Scipio Gentilis. 'An vero Dæmones morborum causa sint, hæc questionem cum patre meo Matthæo Gentilis optimus & clarissimus, Matth. Durantius, Med. & Philos. præstantissimo proposuisset, edito libro ei respondit (1). — Whether devils are the cause of diseases; which question when my father Matthew Gentilis, a good and great man, had proposed to Matthew Durantius, physician and philosopher, he answered him by publishing a book on that subject.' Note, by the way, that the physician, who answered that question, was misnamed Durantianus by Mr König. He was called Durantianus (2).

[B] He composed several works. He wrote three books de Jure Belli, which have done Grotius no disservice. He wrote also three others de Legationibus. His disputes about the absolute power of kings, the union of the kingdoms of Great-Britain, and the justice inseparable from resistance to kings, De vi civium in Regem semper injusta, shewed yet more clearly, that he was not for republican principles, than the ten disputes, of which he made a present to his son, that he might dedicate them, in the year 1607, to the earl of Pembroke, his patron. They are upon the titles of the Code, Si quis Imperatori maledixerit, ad legem Julianam de majestate. His books, De Juris interpretibus, & De Advocazione Hispanica (3), are not the least the protestants [C]; for his dispute, touching the first book of the Maccabees, comes but little short of an indirect apology for those, who hold it for canonical. The same judgment may almost be made of the treatise he composed against those, who blame the Latin of the vulgar translation of the Bible. See the remark [C]. He died at London, the nineteenth of June, 1608, being fifty eight years old. He loved to that degree to improve in the sciences, that he did not seek less to instruct himself by conversation, than reading; and he has acquainted us in print, that his collections were full of a thousand things he had heard, as he talked familiarly with persons, who did not imagine, that what they said would be so honoured. The passage, wherein he speaks of this, deserves a place in our remarks [D]. See Mr König's Bibliothéque, and the funeral oration of Scipio Gentilis.

[C] He does not entirely embrace the hypotheses of the Protestants.] Voëtius was very sensible of it. He relates, that John Howson, an Oxford divine, maintained, in a public disputation, the opinion of the Roman Catholics about the indissolubleness of marriage; that is, that adultery may indeed be a lawful reason to part with one's wife, but not such a reason as may justify the marrying of another. An English divine, called Thomas Pye, wrote against that tenet of John Howson, who defended himself, and composed an apology, printed at Oxford, in 4to, in 1606, with the disputation, and two letters, one from John Reynolds to Thomas Pye, the other from Alberic Gentilis to John Howson. Note, that Reynolds censured Pye, for having published certain things, which were not exact; but he persisted in the doctrine he had already maintained against Bellarmine, in an English book concerning divorce. Gentilis shuffled, and gave to understand, he knew not what to think about that question: though in his work, de Nuptiis, he had declared himself for the common opinion of the Protestants. Voëtius, having related all this, adds to it a reflexion, which highly deserves to be here inserted: 'Ille (Alb. Gentilis) in hac epistola haut obscure fatetur se fluctuare, quamvis antea in libro de Nuptiis affirmantem sententiam tradidisset. Sed nescio quomodo Albericus Gentilis vastæ eruditionis Reynoldianæ, & theologiæ ipsius tanquam nimis puræ & reformatæ in dogmatibus & in practicis, si non æmulum (de quo quidem ex singularium factorum gnaris, aliquid audisse memini) se ostendere, saltem suspectum se reddidisse videatur diatribis suis de vulgata versione, de actoribus fabularum, de abusu mendacii, &c. In quibus tam longè ac disciplina reformatæ, à moribus antiquis Academicæ Perusinae, ubi antea Jus professus erat, non abibat. Sed hæc in tantâ omnium imperfectione miseriæ humanæ pars non minima (4). — In this letter Gentilis plainly confesses, that he doubts; though before, in his book concerning marriage, he had laid down an affirmative opinion. But, I knew not how, Alberic Gentilis, in his dissertations concerning the Vulgate, the actors of plays, and the abuse of lying, if he does not openly rival, at least gives room to suspect that he emulates the extensive learning of Reynolds, and his divinity, as too pure and reformed both in doctrine and practice; and indeed

I remember to have heard so from persons acquainted with the particular facts. But, in those pieces, he did not depart so much, as the reformed discipline did, from the ancient manners of the university of Altdorf, where he had before professed the civil-law. But this is not the least among so many instances of human weakness.

[D] The passage, wherein he speaks of this, deserves a place in our remarks.] Here is what we read in one of his books (5): 'Quid de Oxoniensibus meis? vel repertoria mea testantur satis quantum ego capiam fructus ex eorum virorum & juvenum colloquiis, nam in illis ego descripsi non pauca, quæ dum minus id ipsi cogitant, disco tamen & asservo ex sermonibus familiaribus. — How much I profited by my acquaintances at Oxford, is plain from my table-books, in which I wrote down many things, which passed in conversation unknown to those, with whom I conversed.' He adds, what he had heard from his father, who had studied the civil-law under the professor Argenterius. That professor never slighted any thing he heard in conversation, but set down all that occurred, even from the meanest persons, in a book for that purpose. Tu non audisti aliquando à Patre de illustri præceptore suo Argenterio, qui ab anis cujusque ore solebat pendere, si forte aliud agendo excidisset homini aliud quod ipse diceret, nam & dicta hominum curabat reponi in sua quædam volumina, si quæ audisset non inepta? Lastly, Gentilis relates, that Alcinius learned, by the action of a peasant, the sense of a passage of Plautus, which he had not understood till then. Refert Alcinius * ex factis sui cujusdam villici se locum Plauti intellexisse quem non potuerat antea. God preserve us from such hearers, who would be detailed by all companies, if they were found out: for there are those, who, freely advancing whatever their memory suggests, would be very uneasy, if they knew, that, at parting, some of the company would go and write down in their collections all they have heard. A man finds a great misreckoning, both as to proper names, and circumstances of times and place, when he compares, with the books in his closet, the conversation of persons that have the largest memory, and speak without a premeditated design (6). Every one may know this by experience, and therefore ought to wish, that what he delivers in familiar discourse may not be writ down. Those, who with the contrary, ought never to speak unprepared.

GENTILIS (SCIPIO), brother to Alberic, and as famous a civilian as he, was born at Castello di Sangenesio, in Italy, in the year 1563. He was yet a child, when his father left his country and his wife to go elsewhere, to make open profession of the protestant religion. He did not go out of the house with his father; but, soon after, means was found to steal him from his mother, and under pretence of a walk, to carry him to his father, who had stopped to wait for him, as soon as he came to a safe place. We have already said, that he retired into Carniola, and sent his eldest son into England. As for Scipio, whom he loved very tenderly, he sent him to study in the university of Tubingen. He had wherewithal to answer those expences; for he had in Carniola the title of physician of that province, with a salary (a). The young man improved very much at Tubingen. He learned the Greek tongue under the famous Martin Crusius; and his wit was so happily turned to poetry, that Melissus, who was one of the best poets of Germany, acknowledged himself his inferior. He went afterwards to study at Wittemberg, and then to Leyden, that he might be nearer his father, who, having been obliged to leave Carniola for his religion, was retired into England to his eldest son. Scipio Gentilis improved much at Leyden under Hugo Donnellus, and Justus Lipsius; after which he went to Basil, and there took his degree of doctor of the civil-law in the year 1589. He went to Heidelberg some time after, where Julius Pacius, an Italian like himself, taught the civil-law. There arose a kind of emulation emulation between them, which made Scipio resolve to go from thence to Altdorf, where, by the care of Donellus, who was there professor of the civil-law, he became his colleague in the year 1590; and when Peter Wenssenbecius was called into Saxony, our Gentilis filled his place of first professor. He was also made counsellor of the city of Nuremberg. All which places he discharged gloriously till his death, which happened in the year 1616. His method of teaching with clearness and brevity, and of mixing, with the thorns of the law, the flowers of polite literature; (for he was a great humanist) that method, I say, having been known, both by his lectures and the books he published, procured him the invitation of several famous universities [A]. But he preferred the post, he had in the university of Altdorf, to all the offers that were made him. He had lived in celibacy till the year 1612; but at last he underwent the conjugal yoke. The beauty and merit of a gentlewoman, originally come from Lucca, and daughter of Cæsar Calandrini, having captivated his liberty, he demanded her in marriage, obtained her, and had by her a son [B] and a daughter [b]. I give the titles of his principal writings [C]. He is mentioned in the letters of Bongars [D].

(b) Taken from his funeral oration, pronounced by Michael Piccart, professor of logic and metaphysics, at Altdorf. It is in the collection of Mr Witte.

[A] His method of teaching procured him the invitation of several famous universities. He was offered a professorship in France, at Heidelberg, and at Leyden; and what is more remarkable and extraordinary, Pope Clement VIII, to incline him to accept of a professor's place at Bologna, promised him liberty of conscience (1).

REFLECTION upon the posterity of learned men.

[B] He had a son. We find in a letter of Vossius (2) to William Laud archbishop of Canterbury, that that boy's mother, not being in a condition to maintain him at the university, because of the losses she had sustained in the wars of Germany, endeavoured to get him a place in a college, either at Oxford or Cambridge. His friends were to present a petition for that purpose, and hoped that the memory of Alberic Gentilis would do his nephew some service. Vossius prepared the way for that petition; but I know not what became of it, or of that only son of Scipio Gentilis. I take notice, that it is the hardest thing in the world to find a lineal succession of most of the heroes of the commonwealth of learning. Generally things go well enough for the first generation. The second begins to grow obscure; the curious want some time to find it out: but the third or fourth are so confounded in the crowd, that they are no more distinguished. Therefore it could not be said of the posterity of those great men, what a Roman satirist has said touching his ancestors, and which he would have several noblemen say of theirs.

Quære ex me quis mihi quartus

Sit pater, haud prompte, dicam tamen: adde etiam unum

(3) Prof. Sat. VI, vs. 57.

Unum etiam, terræ est jam filius (3).

The fourth degree downwards is already in the dark. What shall I say of so many men illustrious by their learning, whose family is as obscure in the first degree downwards, as in the degree just before them? May not we say, that they are fires, which we see shine afar off in the middle of a dark night, without discovering any thing near them, by reason of the obcurity round them? See the remark [B] of the article BENSERADE.

[C] I give the titles of his principal writings. Here they are: De Jure publico populi Romani. De conjugationibus libri duo. De Donationibus inter virum & uxorem libri IV. De Bonis maternis & secundis Nuptiis libri duo. In Apulei Apologiam Commentarius. De Jurisdicatione libri tres. Commentarius in Pauli Epistolam ad Philemonem. De erroribus Testamentorum. His funeral oration, with the catalogue of his works, is in the collection of Mr Witte; but it is to be noted, that some writings are attributed to him in that catalogue, which belong to his brother; as, the treatise De Jure Belli, and that De Legationibus; and that there is no mention made of his book, De antiquis Italiae Linguis, nor of his notes upon Tacitus, nor of his Quæstiones ad Africanum Jurisconsultum. These three works are mentioned in his commentary on Apuleius's apology.

[D] He is mentioned in the letters of Bongars. If I remember well, he is generally denoted there by the terms of Scipio noster, or the like. The Latin tongue allows and approves of that expression; but the French translator is to blame in rendering it by Monsieur Scipion. This is owing to his ignorance; for, if he had known that the person meant was Scipio Gentilis, he had said Monsieur Gentilis, and not Monsieur Scipion (4).

Note, that the custom of naming people, in Latin, as well by their christian name, as by their family-name, occasions many mistakes; and I fancy it has led Mr Konig into an error, touching Gentilis the Arian: for he speaks twice of him, without perceiving, that it is still the same heretic. He speaks of him under the word Gentilis, and under the word Valentinus. In the first place (5), he only gives him the christian-name of Johannes; and supposes, that Valentinus is his country-burname. In the second place (6), he bestows upon him Valentinus as his family-name, and Johannes as his christian-name. The first occasion of this mistake probably proceeded from this, that there are books, wherein Gentilis is simply and barely called Valentinus, which was but one half of his christian-name.

(a) Allard. Biblioth. de Dauphiné, pag. 114.

[A] He published some books of controversy, which made him esteemed by the Protestants. He did for them, what Quadratus, Aristides, Justin Martyr, Melio, Tertullian, and some others, had done for the christians of the primitive ages; I mean he wrote an apology: which he dedicated to the king of Navarre, who was afterwards king of France. The epistle dedicatory is dated the fifteenth of February 1578. The edition, which he published ten years after, was much improved, and well corrected: and it is to be noted, that he published that work both in Latin and French. This is the Latin title: Apologia pro Christianis Gallicis Religionis Evangelicæ seu Reformatæ, Quæ docetur hujus Religionis fundamenta in sacra Scriptura jacta esse, ipsamque tum ratione, tum antiquis Canonibus, comprobari. The edition, which I make use of, is the second, printed at Geneva by James Stoer, 1588, in 8vo. He is there described thus, Autore INNOCENTIO GENTILETO Jurisconsulto clarissimo, & amplissimi Senatus Provinciae Delphinensis præside. The work, which he intitled, Le Bureau du Concile de Trente: auquel est montré qu'en plusieurs points iceluy Concile est contraire aux anciens Conciles & Canons, & à l'autorité du Roy, was printed in the year 1586, in 8vo. He dedicated it to the same king of Navarre, and dated the epistle the twelfth of July 1586. He names himself barely Innocent Gentilet, a civilian of Dauphiné. He published the same book in Latin, the same year, with the title of, Examen Concilii Tridentini: in quo demonstratur, &c. There have been several editions of that work: the last, if I am not mistaken, is that of Gorcum in Holland in 1678. the parliament of Toulouſe (b). I have ſeen in the title of one of his books, that he calls himſelf preſident in the parliament of Grenoble (c). He tells us in a preface (d), that he was in exile, by reaſon of the edicts that had been publiſhed in France againſt thoſe of the reformed religion. Some affirm, that he had been Syndic of the republic of Geneva; and that he diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Joachimus Urſinus Anti-Jefuita [B], in the title of ſeveral books which he publiſhed. I believe Mr Allard is miſtaken, when he affirms (e), that VINCENT GENTILET [C], his ſon, Counſellor, and then Preſident in the Chamber of the Ediſt of Grenoble, wrote the Antimachiavel in 1573, a Remonſtrance to King Henry III, ſeveral Rules about Polity; and that he tranſlated the book of the Republic of Switzerland of Joſias Simlerus. I wonder we have ſo few particulars about the life of a perſon, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf both by his writings and employments; and I cannot ſufficiently admire, how it came to paſs, that thoſe, who these words of the epistle dedicatory (1): Seeing therefore, great SIR, that those, who carp at your declaration, ground altogether their opinion upon that council of Trent; I thought my duty for your service, and for my country, did sufficiently command me to employ the leisure, which the edict, called of Re-union, makes me enjoy in my exile, in shewing that foundation of theirs. The declaration he speaks of, is that, which the king of Navarre had caused to be published every where, that he would stand to the decision of a free council, about the differences in religion that were in France (2). That declaration was published in 1585, the same year, in which the edict of Re-union was made. From whence we may conclude, that Gentillet did not set about that work before that year; and consequently that Voëtius is mistaken, when he says (3), that that book was published in Latin in 1556, under the title of, Historica relatio & nullitas Concilii Tridentini. He adds, that it was published at Amberg in the year 1615. Note, that, in 1556, the council of Trent was not concluded.

[B] Some affirm, that he had been syndic of the republic of Geneva; and that he disguised himself under the name of Joachimus Urſinus Anti-Jefuita.] Pray, consider these words of Mr Placcius (4): ANTIMACHIABELLI nomine vulgo insigniuntur commentario rum de regno . . . libri tres . . . qui citantur sub nomine Innocentii GENTILETI Jcti Delphinatis olim Tolſanæ curiæ Advocati, dein Genevenſis Reip. Syndici. — The three books of the commentaries 'De Regno . . . cited under the name of Innocent GENTILET, of Dauphiné, formerly advocate in the parliament of Toulouſe, and afterwards syndic of the republic of Geneva, bear the title of 'ANTIMACHIABEL.' To prove this, he quotes Draudius, pag. 1169, and 1144, of the Bibliotheca Classica; Voëtius, pag. 124, 209, 211, 218, of the first volume of the Theological Thesaurus; Pellerus, pag. 505, of the Politicus ſcleratus impugnatus; Conringius, in the preface to his edition of the Prince of Machiavel; and Keckerman, in the first chapter to the Conſilium de locis communibus. Of these five authors, I have been able to consult only the three first; and I find nothing in them, that says, that Gentillet ever pleaded in the parliament of Toulouſe, or had any employment in the republic of Geneva. It is even to be noted, that Pellerus calls him, Juriſconſultus Delphinensis; which may make one believe, that Gentillet was a native of Holland, not of Dauphiné. Mr Baillet observes (5), that it is the common opinion, that the author of the Antimachiavel was an Huguenot of Dauphiné, named Innocent Gentillet, who was at first a pleading advocate in the parliament of Toulouſe, and afterwards syndic of the republic of Geneva (§ a).

[§ a] At page 43. of the Citadin de Geneve, we find among the famous civilians, who have delivered their oracles in Geneva, Innocent Gentillet; but it is not said, that he had any post there. REM. CRIT.]

As for Joachimus Urſinus Anti-Jefuita, Mr Placcius (6) mentions five books, which have been published under that false name. The first is intitled, Concilii Tridentini Historica Relatio, & nullitas solidæ & ex fundamento demonstrata, and was printed at Amberg in the year 1615, in 8vo. The second is intitled, Apologia pro Christianis Gallis Religionis Reformatæ, at Geneva, 1598, in 8vo. The third, Stupenda Templi Jeshuitici: divided into three parts, and printed at Francfort, and at Amberg, in the year 1610, in 8vo. The title of the fourth is, Floſculi blaſphemiarum Jeshuitarum, ex tribus Concionibus ſuper beatificatione Ignatii Loyolæ habitis deſcripti, unâ cum Sorbonnæ Pariſienſis Cenſura. Which was printed in 1612, in 4to. The fifth was printed at Amberg in 1611, in 8vo, and is intitled, Hispaniæ Inquisitionis, & carniſcinæ ſecretiora, ubi præter illius originem . . . exemplis illuſtrioribus tum Martyrum, tum articulorum, & regularum inquisitionum in fine adjectis per Joachimum Urſinum Anti-Jefuitam de Jeshuitis qui Inquisitionem Hispanicam in Germaniam & Bobemiam vicinam introducere moliantur, præſentem. Vincent Mollerus, burgomaster of Hamburg, and great-grand-father of Mr Placcius, had marked with his own hand the name of Innocent Gentillet in the first of those five books; which, together with some other reasons, inclined Mr Placcius to believe, that it was the true name of the pretended Joachimus Urſinus (7). Mr Baillet (8) has followed that opinion, and (9) ascribes to the same Gentillet a work, which was printed at Francfort in 1612, under the title of, Antijehinus, hoc est ſolida confutatio errorum quos olim Arriani, &c. I have not a sufficient number of books to clear all this.

[C] I believe that Mr Allard is mistaken, when he affirms, that VINCENT GENTILET [C]. He remarks (10) in the first place, that the examination of the council of Trent is a work of Innocent Gentillet; an author, says he, who lived under Henry III; and then he adds, that Vincent Gentillet, his son . . . wrote the Antimachiavel, in 1573. This clashes with the custom of chronologists, who, when they mark the ages of illustrious men, put some distance between the fathers and the sons, the masters and disciples; tho' it frequently happens, that the time of the reputation of the one concurs with the flourishing state of the other. The writer of the Bibliothèque de Dauphiné has not followed that rule: for he puts the father under Henry III, and places higher, under Charles IX, the writing of the principal book of the son. This error is less than that I am going to mark. It should have been said, according to the general opinion, that the Antimachiavel was the production of Innocent Gentillet, and not the production of his son. I do not find any bibliographer, who has mentioned this Vincent Gentillet, son of Innocent; and it is certain, that la Croix du Maine (11) ascribes to Innocent Gentillet all the works, which Mr Allard specifies as the writings of Vincent. It is true, La Croix du Maine is mistaken pag. 97. in the christian name; for he has put Francis instead of Innocent (12). The office of preſident in the chamber of the edict of Grenoble, which he bestows upon that writer, confirms me in the belief, that he had in view our Innocent Gentillet, who, as we have already seen (13), took the title, at the head of the apology for the reformed, of ampliſſimi Senatus Provinciæ Delphinensis Præſis. I conjecture, that he was made president of the chamber of the edict at Grenoble, when those sort of courts were granted to the Huguenots, in each parliament in 1576 (14); which intitled him to the quality of president in the parliament of his province. We have seen (15), that the edict of Re-union occasioned his exile; and I add here, that Poſſevin (16) has observed, that the Calvinist author, who had writ against Machiavel, had taken sanctuary at Geneva: which is another proof that Mr Allard is mistaken, in ascribing, not to the father, but to the son, the work against Machiavel. The French translator's preface before the book of Joſiah Simler, about the republic of the Swiſſes, says nothing that may incline us to conjecture, that he might be our Gentillet: and yet I could easily believe him to be the author of that version. Some ascribe

GERGENTI, a town of Sicily, formerly Agrigentum, or Acragas. I only mention it, in order to correct Mr Moreri's faults [A]. His omissions would require a long

[A] I mention it only to correct Mr Moreri's faults.

I. It is not true, that that town took its name from mount Agragas. Stephanus Byzantinus, who relates three other etymologies, makes no manner of mention of that. Several towns of Sicily were named from their rivers (1); and this was one of them, according to the first of the three opinions (2) mentioned by that author. It is certain, that it was built upon the river Acragas (3); but, according to the third opinion (4), both that river and the town were so called by reason of the goodness of the soil. I omit the second opinion, according to which the town owed its name to Acragas, son of Jupiter and Altherope. II. It is not true, that Virgil mentions the mountain Acragas; for the two verses, quoted by Moreri, signify visibly no more than a town seated on a hill.

The verses are,

Arduus inde Acragas ostendit maxima longe Mœnia, magnanimum quondam generator equorum (5).

High Acragas at distance thence appears,
With wide extended walls; famed for the breed
(In ancient annals) of the generous steed.

III. It had been necessary to have named the author, who has said, that the Ionians, led by Gellus, or Gelo, laid the first foundation of Agrigentum; for that author must be an apocryphal one, since Cluverius was not acquainted with him, or did not think him worthy to be quoted. It had been better to have let alone that Gellus, or Gelo, and have said, with Thucydides, that the inhabitants of Gela sent a colony to Acragas one hundred and eight years after the foundation of Gela (6). Now, since Gela was built, jointly, by Antiphemus the chief of a company of Rhodians, and by Entimus the leader of a company of Cretans; and since they settled there the laws of the Dorians (7); I had rather take Agrigentum for a Doric colony, than for an Ionian colony. Thucydides, who marks the time and names of the founders, is, in this place, to be a little more credited than Strabo, who contented himself to say, in a loose manner, that Agrigentum belonged to the Ionians (8). I do not think he has said it above once, and I am certain he has seldom mentioned that town: and therefore I reckon for the fourth fault, these words of Moreri: it is for that reason that Strabo commonly calls it the Ionian Agrigentum. Before we go further, I take notice, that Polybius mentions Agrigentum as a colony of the Rhodians (9). A gross fault has crept into Cluverius, which his abridger has not mended. We find in that author (10), that the inhabitants of Gela founded Agrigentum in the XCIXth olympiad. He should have said XLIX, not XCIX. For this is Cluverius's computation: he places the foundation of Syracuse in the second year of the XIth olympiad. Forty five years after, according to Thucydides (11), Gela was founded by the Rhodians and Cretans; and, according to the same author, those of Gela sent a colony to Agrigentum, one hundred and eight years after their town had been founded; therefore they sent it in the XLIXth olympiad. V. He should not have quoted Ælian touching the luxury of the Agrigentines in their houses and meals, without saying that he quotes Plato: for a witty saying from Plato (12) has, without comparison, more weight, than from Ælian. VI. It is not true, that Diodorus Siculus informs us, that Alcæmon ruled at Agrigentum after Phalaris, and that Alcander, Theron, and Thraideus, were the successors of Alcæmon. VII. Nothing clashes more with the rule of an exact narrative, than to join together the time, when the town of Agrigentum was taken by the Carthaginians, and the time, when it became a part of the Roman commonwealth; for the state of the Agrigentines underwent many considerable changes after the Carthaginians had plundered them in the fourth year of the XCIIIrd olympiad, till the Romans got possession of that town. They became masters of it during the second Punic war; but they were not so, when they took Syracuse: for, even after the taking of that city, the Carthaginians, who were masters of Agrigentum, cut out work enough for them (13). VIII. He should not have applied to the time, when it was subdued by the Romans, the magnificent description, which Diodorus Siculus has left us of it: for that description concerns the flourishing state of the Agrigentines, when the Carthaginians attacked them in the XCIIIrd olympiad. The town recovered from the dismal condition, into which that war had reduced it: nay, we find, that its forces were formidable at several times (14), after the sacking it underwent, when it fell into the hands of the Carthaginians in the year that I have marked before; but it is confounding the times, to say with Moreri, that it was one of the most flourishing cities of the Roman empire, being large, fair, and extremely populous, when the Romans drove from thence the Carthaginians, and settled there themselves. IX. Empedocles the philosopher, and Empedocles the poet, are but one and the same man; and therefore Moreri should not have made of them two illustrious Agrigentines. X. Cicero did not mention the temple and statue of Hercules, that were to be seen at Agrigentum, as one of the finest works of antiquity. At most, he only speaks so as to the statue; and as for the temple, he contents himself to say, that the Agrigentines look upon it as a very holy place. Hercules templum est apud Agrigentinos non longe à foro sine sanctum apud illos & religiosum (15). As to the statue, he says, that it was one of the finest he ever saw in his life; but he owns he was no good judge, and that, in that matter, he had much more employed his eyes, than his understanding (16). If Mr Moreri had had any discernment, with respect to things that strike a reader most, he would have added a very singular circumstance concerning that statue; to wit, that it had been so often devoutly kissed, that its lips and chin were somewhat worn out by it. Rictus ejus ad mentum paulo sit attritus, quod in precibus & gratulationibus non solum id venerari, verum etiam osculari solent (17). XI. Pliny has not said, touching the salt of Agrigentum, what Mr Moreri ascribes to him; but only, that it bears the fire, and flies out of the water. Mr Moreri has forgot the latter of these two properties, and has but ill related the first; for he pretends, that Pliny says, that that salt melted in the fire. If he had a mind to mention that, he should have had other vouchers than Pliny; for the words of that writer (18), Agrigentinus (sal) ignium patiens (19) ex aqua exilit, signify only, that that salt crackled in, and flew from the water; but that it bore the fire without crackling in it. If Mr Moreri had quoted either Solinus, or St Augustin, he needed not have feared any censure. These are Solinus's words: 'Salem Agrigentinum si igni junxeris, dissolvitur ustione: cui si liquor aquæ proximaverit, crepitat veluti torreatur (20). — If you apply Agrigentine salt to the fire, it melts by the heat; if to water, it crackles as if in the fire. St Augustin alledges that Phenomenon to the incredulous, who rejected all miracles in religion, as soon

a long discourse; for he has forgot the most curious things that might have been said of Agrigentum [B].

as divines could not explain them. He alleges to those unbelievers several natural things, of which the philosophers could give no reason; and he begins with the singularities of the salt of Agrigentum. 'Agrigentum Siciliae saltem perhibent cum fuerit admotus igni velut in aqua fluere; cum vero aquae velut in igne crepitare (21). - - - It is reported of the Agrigentine salt, that when it is held to fire it melts as if in water, and, when put in water, crackles as if in fire.' Note, against those that would apologize for Mr Moreri, that there is a great difference between melting in the fire, and bearing the fire, without crackling in it. I say nothing of his false quotations (22): I shall only observe, to conclude this remark, that there are a vast number of other articles in Moreri's dictionary, which are no less faulty than this.

[B] He has forgot the most curious things that might have been said of Agrigentum. I have already reproached him with passing over in silence, both those devout kisses, which had thinned the lips of the brazen Hercules of the Agrigentines, and one of the wonderful properties of the salt of Agrigentum. He is no less to blame, for saying nothing of the properties of the lakes, that were near the town, whose water was as salt as that of the sea; but men did not sink in it, and even those, that could not swim, did float upon it like wood. Περὶ Ἀκράγαντα δὲ λίμναι, τὴν μὲν γούσιν ἔχουσι θαλάττης, τὴν δὲ γούσιν διὰ πορὸν ἔδδ' ἡ γὰρ τοῖς ἀκοιμήτοις βαπτίζονται συμβαίνει, εὐλὼν τρόπον ἐπιτολάσσιν. Apud Agrigentum lacus sunt gustu marino, natura plane diversa: nam & natandi inscit in iis lignorum in morem supernatant (23). How many singular things might he not have taken out of the thirteenth book of Diodorus Siculus, concerning the luxury of the Agrigentines, their riches, and the expense one of them was at for the entertainment of strangers? he should not have forgot, that that part of the city, which served for a fortress, was built before the taking of Troy: that it was built, I say, by Dædalus the most able engineer of all antiquity. He fortified the place so well, that three or four men were able to defend it: which made king Cocalus resolve to reside there, and to lodge there all his treasures (24). I would not have omitted the violent zeal of the Agrigentines against those, whom the prætor Verres had sent to the temple of Hercules, with orders to carry away the statue. They forced the guards of the temple, and were a whole hour in removing that Hercules by strength of arms and machines. But, notwithstanding the darkness of the night, the Agrigentines had time to arm themselves, and to drive the satellites of Verres out the temple. As soon as the alarm was given, every body got up; and even old men, and infirm people, found strength enough to go to the rescue of Hercules. 'Ex clamo more fama tota urbe percrebuit, expugnari deos patros, non hostium adventu, neque repentino prædonum impetu: sed ex domo atque cohorte prætoriam manum fugitivorum instructam, armatamque venisse. Nemo Agrigenti neque ætate tam affecta, neque viribus tam infirmis fuit, qui non illa nocte eo nuncio excitatus, surrexerit, telumque, quod cuique fors offerebat, arripuerit (25). This great zeal did not hinder the inhabitants from turning that adventure into a jest: for they said, it ought to be added to the other labours of that God. 'Nunquam tantum mali est Siculis quin aliquid faceret & commo- de dicant, velut in hac re: aiebant in labores Herculis non minus hunc immanissimum Verrem, quam illum aprum Erymanthium inferre oportere (26).

GIFANIUS (OBERTUS), was a learned humanist, and a great civilian. He was a native of Buren in Gelderland. He studied at Louvain and at Paris, and was the first that settled the German library at Orleans. He took, in that city, his degree of doctor of civil-law, in the year 1567, and went into Italy in the retinue of the ambassador of France; after which he removed into Germany, where he taught the civil-law with so much capacity, that he gained a great reputation. He taught it first at Straßburg, where he was first professor of Philosophy: Afterwards in the university of Altdorf, and at last at Ingolstadt. He renounced the Protestant religion to embrace the Romish. He was invited to the Imperial court, and honoured with the office of counsellor, and referendary to the emperor Rodolphus. He died at Prague the twenty sixth of July 1609 [A], being above seventy (a) years old (b), if we may believe some authors; but some others, who are better informed, place his death in the year 1604 (c). He had acquired an estate; for he was a good economist [B]. He is accused of a notorious breach of trust, with respect to Fruterius's manuscripts [C]; and he, placed in the catalogue of plagiarists

[A] He died at Prague the twenty sixth (1) of July, 1609. Swertius (2) and Valerius Andreas (3) say so; but I know not how to reconcile it with the Scaligerana, where Gifanius's death is mentioned. An Italian Jesuit was present at his death; and, having plundered several of his papers, is gone to Rome (4). Now how could Scaliger say this, when he died the twenty first of January, 1609? To remove this difficulty, it may indeed be supposed, that a false report was raised of Gifanius's death, upon which Scaliger went; or that the compilers of the Scaligerana have inserted in it several things, which they never heard Scaliger say; which may be observed in other places of that compilation. But the surest way was to say that Swertius and Valerius Andreas are mistaken, having not followed Thuanus, who has placed Gifanius's death in the year 1604.

[B] He was a good economist. I have no other proof for it than these words of Scaliger (5). 'He was counsellor to the emperor; and, because a married man must keep house, he sent his wife back to Nuremberg. He was worth 25000 ducats, and yet lived in a garret. Liberis utebatur ut servis.' This is beyond good husbandry: it is downright stinginess.

[C] He is accused of a notorious breach of trust, with respect to Fruterius's manuscripts. Fruterius, one of the great wits of his age, was at Paris, in the year 1566, with some other Flemings, Janus

Douza, Obertus Gifanius, Janus Lernutius, &c. and died there the same year, being twenty five years of age (6). He had already collected a good number of critical observations, which, at his death, he recommended to Gifanius: who acted fraudulently, and suppressed them as much as he could; nor did he restore part of that trust till after the complaints of Janus Douza. Read these words of Thuanus (7): 'Is (Fruterius) in puriore literatura cum excelleret, & jam multa commentatus esset, prope morte præpeditus omnia ea Gifanii judicio ac fidei commisit, qui pari fide minime usus creditur, vixque lite à Jano Douza mota exorari potuit, ut pauca quæ ex tanta jactura, velut ex magno naufragio exiguæ tabulæ supererant, sint publicata. Preserve my works, he cried, when I am gone,
And guard these labours, Fannius, as your own.*

Douza was so angry with Gifanius, upon the account of that dishonesty, that he forgot nothing to bring him to reason; and even implored the assistance of Gifelinus, to oblige the thief to restore the manuscripts.

Quid tamen hæc, Gifeline, juvant, si Fannius hæres
Se premere æterna tot bona nocte cupit?
Ille cupit: sed tu genio communis amici
Assertor venias, injiciæque manus.
Tunc ego damnatus voti, de more sacro
Prima quidem Nemesis dona, secunda tibi.
Scis etenim quàm me mendaci læserit ore,
Dum pia pro caris Manibus arma gero (9).

*Yet what avails, my Gifelin, our care,
If Fannius, faithless Fannius, is his heir?
Who vain would bury in eternal night
Works, worthy of the day, and everlasting light.
But thou, prevent so undeserv'd an end,
And from oblivion snatch our common friend.
My solemn vow, perform'd, shall set me free,
And altars rise to Nemesis, and thee.
His slanderous tongue no longer shall prevail,
Nor, in our friend's defence, our pious warfare fail.*

The tamen of the first verse relates to a place, where Douza says, that Gifelinus was the first that had exclaimed against Gifanius's dishonesty.

At quota virtutum pars est tamen ista tuarum?
Majus opus Fanni non tacuisse dolos,
Verbaque Frutericæ prima injectisse favillæ,
Nec dubium factis exhibuisse fidem.
Non mihi Fruterium reddendo plura dedisses:
Hoc quoque Fruterium reddere pæne fuit (10).

*Small credit from such acts to virtue springs;
Fannius expos'd more lasting honour brings.
Scarce had you merited a nobler prize,
(Such glory in detecting falsehood lies) Restoring lost Fruterius to our eyes.*

He relates, in his second satire, what he had done for the memory of the deceased, and against Gifanius.

*Suspected once, I kept him in my eye;
But he nor promise made, nor wou'd deny.*

*What shapes he, Proteus-like, at first put on,
The publication of the work to shun?
He quoted Codes, the comment and the text,
With lofty tone; th' Imperial Edicts next,
And last Agellius; so he wou'd restore
The name, which Aulus Gellius was before.
Shall I neglect my own affairs, he cry'd?
Then, peremptory, our request deny'd.

And, whilst elate with pride he swell'd, I brib'd

[D] He is placed in the catalogue of plagiarists. See the collection of the learned Thomasius about that sort of people. You will find in it (12) Gifanius loaded with all the reproaches you have just now read, and with several others. You will see there also these verses of Douza:

Tu præter omnes alpha legulejorum Burene quem inter bustuarios Verres,
Plumis adornatum & colore furtivo, Autumnitas Pontana nobilem fecit, Notisque Transrhæna inusta frons Gallis (13).

(13) Douza, Ode in Felles Litera-rias, pag. 619.

*You, before all, chief of the gown'd tribe,
Burenus, whom amidst funereal swords-men,
Adorn'd with plumes, and colours not your own,
Fruterius' Autumn render'd eminent,
And the French brand on the Transrhæne front.*

You will see them, I say, accompanied with this note.
• Autumnitas Pontana idem est quod Fruteriana, sumebat enim Fruterius nomen Pontani, ut se Brugis (Pont, Bruke) natum significaret: vide Reliquias ejus pag. 134. Notæ autem Gallæ sunt quas Dionysius Lambinus Gallus Giphanius quamquam suam potius quam Fruterii causam agens, tum initio coram auditoribus suis, tum postea in præfat. ad lectorem • Lucretii tertium editi inussit. — The Autumnitas Pontana is the same as Fruteriana; for Fruterius took the name of Pontanus, to signify, that he was born at Bruges (Pont, Bruke): see his Remains, p. 134. As for the Notæ Gallæ, they signify the brand, which Dionysius Lambinus, a Frenchman, fixed on Gifanius, both at first before his auditors, and afterwards in his preface to the reader of the third edition of his Lucretius; in which he vindicated himself, rather than Fruterius. You will find there likewise, that Gifelinus repented his having lent his Prudentius to Gifanius; who stole from Gifelinus the best things he found in it.

Atque utinam tantum scires mea vulnera, nec te Lusisset plagis improbus ille suis.
Illa dies nocuit, qua te sibi credere primum
Nobile Prudenti nomine suavit opus.

(14) Douza,
Epist. iii, pag.
412.

*O! that my injuries had prevented thine,
And thou escap'd the plagiarist's mine.
That day, when, unsuspecting of a snare,
You trusted your Prudentius to his care;
That fatal day, his practise'd cunning gave My friend the sad experience of a knave.*

When Douza writes in prose, he is more moderate, and even spares the name of his adversary: but however, he says, that Gifanius had adorned his Lucretius with the spoils of Fruterius: • Nec dubium quin de Giphanius intelligendum sit, quod lego apud Valer. Andream, pag. 629. Bibl. Belg. notavisse Janum Douzam ad Triumvires amoris, quæ in Lucretium adfesta Fruterius habuerit, iis non parùm adjutos fuisse, qui post Lambinum auctorem illum Collectaneis illustrarunt. Utique enim in Lucretium habentur collectanea Giphani (15). — Nor do I doubt, that Gifanius is meant in what I read in Valerius Andreas, de Plagio Literar. Bibl. Belg. p. 629. that Janus Douza gave notice to letters [E]. The occasion of his falling out with the formidable Scioppius, was a punishment,

'the triumvirs of love, that they, who, after Lambinus, adorned Lucretius with miscellaneous notes, were not a little assisted by what Fruterius wrote on that author. For we have the collections of Gifanius on Lucretius (15).'

(15) Thomafius, de Plagio Literario, pag. 196.

[E] His quarrels with Lambinus made a noise in the Republic of Letters. Lambinus did not content himself with complaining in his public lectures, that Gifanius had robbed him; but shewed his resentment upon it, in his preface to his Lucretius, when he printed it the third time. Here follow the verses concerning the invectives he made in his reading-desk.

Nec libet antiquam plagii renovare querelam:
Quod te, felicem quondam, Lambine, cerebri,
Et vidi & pleno memini posuisse theatro
Parifis, tunc cum miserandus & hostibus ipsis Fannius introrsum detractâ pelle pateret.
Indignum scelus, & nullo satis igne piandum (16).

(16) Douze, Sat. I, pag. 336.

No more of that: already Fannius stands
Convict, and punish'd, Lambin, by thy bands;
When publicly, at Paris, you expos'd
His plagiarism, and all his frauds discover'd.

Read these verses of the second satire:

- - - Non ut ineptus

When, like the daw, her borrow'd feathers gone,
He stood unmask'd, the laughter of the town.

(18) Ego autem nunquam abducar ut eum nominatim describam. Lambinus, Pref. tertia edit. Lucretii, apud Thomafium, pag. 197.

Gifanius, without being named in the preface (18), is treated there like a dog: the most abusive language is there given him. 'Pag. xxvi. ipsi Gifanius est quidam omnium mortalium, qui unquam fuerunt, qui sunt, qui erunt injulissimus, audacissimus, impudentissimus. p. xxx. audacem vocat, arrogantem, impudentem, ingratum, petulantem, insidiosum, fallacem, infidum, nigrum. pag. seq. unum ex omnibus mortalibus nulla re magis, quam feritate, importunitate, contumacia, superbia, audacia, confidentia & impudentia excellentem (19). — Pag. 26. Gifanius is to him, of all men, that ever were, are, or will be, the most unjust, most daring, and most impudent. pag. 30. he calls him impudent, arrogant, ungrateful, fawcy, treacherous, deceitful, unfaithful, black. page the following, the man of all others excellent in nothing more than in savageness, importunity, contumacy, pride, confidence, and impudence.' The foundation of this abusive language, is, that Gifanius had plundered, in the Lucretius of Dionysius Lambinus, what he thought best in it, and had condemned the rest, without acknowledging from whom he had borrowed what he had. 'Omnia fere, quæ in eo Lucretio recta sunt, mea sunt: quæ tamen iste aut silentio prætermittit, aut maligne laudat, aut sibi impudenter arrogat. Sic unde reprehendendi ansam arripere potest, ibi mihi petulantissimè insultat, in eo me improbius infestatur (20). — Almost every thing in that Lucretius, that is right, is mine; which yet he either takes no notice of, or praises like an enemy, or impudently arrogates to himself. Thus, wherever he can have a handle for reproof, there he most saucily insults me, and most unreasonably inveighs against me.' Nevertheless, it is true, he acknowledged in his preface, that Lambinus's commentary had been very useful to him: 'Dionysio autem Lambino & Adriano Turnebo duobus Franciæ ornamentis quantum debeatur præmi, quippe qui de hoc gravissimo scriptore optime sint meriti, oratione mea quidem nequeam adsequi. Neque sanè viri illi præstantissimi à me id ut faciam expectant aut volunt, satis inclaruit eorum industria & eruditio incredibilis. Hoc tantum vereque testatum relinquere possum ac debeo, illorum maxime laboribus & solertia adjutum esse in his cujusque modi Emendationibus ac Notis comparandis (21).

(21) Gifanius, Pref. in Lucret. fol. m.  2.

I cannot express how much I am indebted to those two ornaments of France, Dionysius Lambinus, and Adrianus Turnebus, who have deserved the best of this most excellent writer. Nor do those worthy men expect or desire it of me; their own industry and incredible learning are too well known. This alone I can and ought to acknowledge, that I was chiefly assisted by their skillful labours in compiling these emendations and notes.' Here are a great many commendations; but they came too late, and could not cure the wound made in the preceding page; wherein it was said, that the public was now presented with a Lucretius much better than that of Lambinus; and that, for all Lambinus's erudition, the public had not yet the true Lucretius. Gild that pill with encomiums as long as you please, and you will never take away its bitterness. It will ever preserve its ill taste, and set choler, and all other bad humours, in motion. Here is the whole passage, which, taken altogether, is disobliging.

Tandem Dionysius Lambinus libros manu descriptos complures felicissimè nactus; adjutus etiam doctiss. virorum, in iis præcipuè Adriani Turnebi, & Joh. etiam Aurati opera, ipse incredibili diligentia & eruditione præditus, à pluribus iisque turpissimis mendis Lucretium liberavit. Sed quia tam sædè effec contaminatus, uti adhuc præstantissimus poeta nomine tantum fuerit notus; illi recusantibus medicinam adhibere eruditus viris, ut si desperatus esset ac depositus: efficere ille quamvis doctus & diligens (quod pace viri doctiss. dictum velim) non potuit, ut purum ac merum haberemus Titum. Nos igitur etiam id quoque præstare non potuimus, spero tamen id nos consecutos, ut multis jam partibus melior & emendatior in hominum manibus esse possit optimus Romani sermonis auctor (22). — At length, Dionysius Lambinus, having luckily met with several manuscripts, and being assisted by some learned men, particularly Adrian Turnebus, and John Auratus, being himself likewise a person of incredible diligence and learning, corrected many shameful errors in Lucretius. But, as that author was so very incorrupt, that he was known to be a most excellent poet only by name, the learned refusing to administer physic to one given over, as it were, and buried, this critic, with all his learning and diligence, could not give us a true and genuine Lucretius. Therefore, though the same was out of my power likewise, yet I hope I have given the world a much better and more correct edition of this best of Latin poets. I know not, any more than Thomafius, whether Gifanius defended himself against Lambinus (23); I only know that he complained of it to Muret (24), and had recourse to recrimination. He pretended, that his corrections upon Cicero and Cornelius Nepos had been pirated by Lambinus, whom he also accused of a shameful lie. Lambinus, says he, boasted of the friendship of all the Flemings, who studied at Paris, except Gifanius, and named a dozen of them, whose very names he had not known, had he not used an artifice. These are Gifanius's words: 'De Lambino, quæ hæc dicitur: in quem ut omnia pulchrè conveniant, accipe & aliud ejus stratagemata. Cum Lutetie thyrsus, non Lucretianum illum, sed suum in me quater instituisset, (ego interim domi virgam tam pueriliter peccanti minitabar,) primâ concione dixit, cum Belgis omnibus familiaritatem sibi esse, me unum sibi malè cuperet: protulitque duodecim ferè Belgarum nomina, qui tunc ibi agerent studiorum causa, (conferenda sunt cum his, quæ scribit Lambin. ad Læt. tertie ed. Lucret. p. xxxi, xxxii.) Multi ex his admirari hanc publicam testationem & citationem. quod illum ne salutassent quidem, me autem uterentur familiarissimè; imo eo ipso tempore epigrammata in illum partim proscriptissent, ad me accurrerunt, & acumen Lambini, arteque ejus oratorias mihi exposuerunt. Mirantibus omnibus, unde eorum nomina collegisset, intervenit mox ejus convictor Bruxellensis, qui scrupulum illum nobis exemit: se namque rogatum & coactum fuisse Lambino petenti domi aliquot Belgarum nomina dicere, causâ ignarum. Atque ita res in risum abiit (25). — To shew you, that Lambinus is consistent with himself, here is another of his stratagemata. Being at Paris, and resolving to shake the Thyrsus, not Lucretius's, but his own, against me; (in the mean time I threatened this childish offender with the rod, at my own house) the first bargain he made, punishment, which he deserved by Lex Talionis [F]. That affair is curious enough. You will find the title of most of his works in Moret's dictionary, where, by a ridiculous mistake, Hubert Giphani, and Obertus Giphanius, are mentioned as two distinct persons.

'made, he said, that all the Dutch, except myself, wished him well; upon which he produced the names of about twelve Hollanders, who then studied there; many of them were surprized at this public appeal, since they had not so much as saluted him, but had been intimately conversant with me; nay, at that very time, they had partly written epigrams against him, and had run to me, and showed me the wit and oratory of Lambinus. While they were all wondering, whence he had their names, comes in one, who had boarded with him at Brussels, and informed us, that Lambinus had pressed him, he knew not why, to dilate to him the names of some Hollanders, and so the whole was turned into laughter.' It is a melancholy consideration, that polite learning cannot keep those, who profess it, from the disorder of passions!

Muret was not the only man, whom Gifanius made the confident of his complaints: for there was lately published a letter, which Gifanius wrote to Theodore Canterus in the year 1567, wherein we find these words (26): 'Præterea nostri quemadmodum me compilarit, meque tractarit Lambinus in Æmilium Probum, cujus rei testes habeo epistolas Mureti, quas & tu jam divulgatas videre potuisti, & Puteani cujus auctoritate Lambinus abutitur inviti, &c. — You know besides, how Lambinus, in his comment on Æmilii Probi, plundered me; for the truth of which I appeal to the letters of Muretus, which you may have seen in print, and those of Puteanus, whose authority Lambinus abuses, against his will.' Gifanius wrote to the same Canterus, in the year 1567, what follows (27): 'Ille qui ea fulmina in me jactat anne ut divini est Ludovici Carrion, quem mihi nomen amicitissimum putavi. Certe eum esse indicavit Dn. Bombergus. Sic Lucretiana mea ubique vapulant, sed tua & tui similitum amicitia fretus vana illa fulmina esse judico. — He, who darts this thunder at me, is he not, as I guessed, Lewis Carrion, whom I looked upon as my friend. Bombergus has plainly shown, that this is he. Thus my labours on Lucretius suffer on all sides; but relying on the friendship of you, and such as yourself, I despise their thunder.'

I shall say, by the way, that Scaliger is not very proper to make us believe, that Gifanius was not a plagiarist. Gifanius, says he (28), was learned; his Lucretius is very good: I sent him since some good remarks upon Lucretius, which he has kept, and says, he has not received them, and designs to publish them as his own. . . . He had stolen from L. Fruterius his Agellius, which was ready for the press.

[F] The occasion of his falling out with the formidable Scioppius, was a punishment, which he deserved by Lex Talionis. Scioppius, having obtained from Conradus Ritterhusius, at whose house he lodged at Altdorf, a letter of recommendation to Obertus Gifanius, professor at Ingolstadt, insinuated himself into the favour of that professor; and, having free access to his house, he found means, upon a certain day, to visit the library, during the absence of it's master, and to take out of it a manuscript of Symmachus. He copied also as much as he pleased out of a work in manuscript of Gifanius, and found in it materials to set up for a critic; and, when Gifanius loudly complained of it, the plagiarist called him a thousand names. This is what Scaliger's friends relate against Scioppius. In ædes primum, mox in animum, postea in Bibliothecam absentes penetravit Giphani, cui MS. Symmachi codicem subduxit: libros vero observationum lingue Latine, invito domino percurrit, & ex iis quæ voluit sartim sublegit. E quibus partim, emendationibus Plautinis, quas & Camerarii membranis descriptas in suo Ritterhusius codice adnotarat, partim etiam reliquis schedarum Modii, quas ab am- plissimo Velfero, summo literarum patrono acceperat; duos illos, quibus primum innotuit, libellos corrasit. . . . Quod quidem plagium cum passim vocæ passim literis testaretur Giphanius, in præceptorem suum & doctissimum hominem erupit hæc vîpera, & quæcunque undique poterat convitia in eum contor-

lit (29). Here is what Scioppius answers: I. He quotes two passages in his works (30), wherein he acknowledges his obligations to Gifanius, for the communication of Symmachus's manuscript. II. He confesses, that those two passages were but a jest (31); for, adds he, Gifanius never let me see but once that manuscript; and when I desired it of him a second time, he answered me: Str; for a man to ask of me my Symmachus, is the same as if he should ask my leave to lie with my wife: Symmachum à me petere perinde est atque uxorem meam utendam postulare (32). III. That Gifanius, who had stolen that manuscript at Venice, out of the library of cardinal Bessarion, would neither publish it himself, nor suffer others to publish it.

Erant autem libri ille Symmachi ex Bessarionis Bibliotheca Venetiis furto Gifanii sublati (velut Wolf gangus Zundelinus indicium Scioppio fecit) quem ille neque ut ederet, neque ut Ritterhusio id perenti edendum daret, ullis precibus aut muneribus induci potuit (33). IV. That Scioppius, least the public should be so long deprived of that treasure, was extremely kind to Gifanius, and invited him often to supper; but that all this was to no purpose, though that professor loved mightily to eat and drink at his friend's house. Scioppius ne literarum studiosis liber ejusmodi diutius deberetur, Giphanium creberrime ad cenam vocando demulcere (vix enim ullam diem toto anno elabi sibi Gifanius sinebat, quin foris cœnaret, ac plerumque Menelai Homerici exemplo in vocatus amicus condiceret) & Symmachi copiam ab eo impetrare studuit, sed frustra (34). V. That, seeing this obliquity, he associated himself with three civilians, to get secretly that manuscript; and that, having made use of it, he put it in it's place again the next day. VI. That the subtilty, with which he guessed where that manuscript lay hid, surpasse all the cunning of the critics that have commented upon Symmachus. Unica illa conjectura sua quo loco Symmachi codex in Gifanii Bibliotheca situs foret, omnium Criticorum quotquot ei scriptori operam navarunt ingenium & acumen longè superavit (35). VII. That it is false that he stole that manuscript, since he kept it but one night, that others might have the benefit of it. Rem quoque malo furto acquisitam possessori suo nequaquam subduxerit (velut tu mentiris) sed usum ejus unius noctis lubricatione cum aliis communicavit (36). VIII. As for the other manuscript, he owns, he had it in his hands, through the means of Gifanius's Amanuensis; and that he took the best things out of it, tho' not with a design to arrogate them to himself, since he suffered several lovers of fine Latin to write out copies of it (37).

IX. He pretends he has publicly acknowledged the benefit he received from that work. De observationibus Grammaticis fateri puta Scioppium cum præfatione disputationis de injuriis ita Giphanium alloquitur: Ego multa ex te quamvis infesto & invito didici. I do not wonder Gifanius fell into such a passion; for who could bear such tricks? Scioppius owns enough to persuade his readers, that he was not an honest man. The worst of all for Gifanius was, that people laughed at his anger. Hoc ut rescivit Giphanius, tantum non in furem redactus est, omnibusque viris doctis etiam amicis suis deridiculo fuit (38).

I have heard the illustrious Mr Grævius say, that he had seen, in the hands of Frederic Gronovius, a letter from Philip Pareus, by which Gronovius was informed, that the manuscript of Gifanius's observations fecit. Ibid.

it would thereby be easy to discover Scioppius's plagiarisms.

[A] He had already published other works. I have said elsewhere (1), that the prior Marco Aurelio Rorencio published, in 1634, an apology for a piece he had written in 1632. Our Peter Gilles refuted this apology by a work, intitled, Considerations on the Apologetical Letters of the Sieurs Marco Aurelio Rorencio, prior of Luferne, and Theodorus Belvedereus, Prefect of the monks (2). The other replied by a Latin work, intitled, Turris contra Damasum, id est Tutela Ecclesie Romanæ contra Calcinislarum incuriones objecta considerationibus cujusdam Ministri P. Gillio subscripti edificata cum propugnaculis à Fr. Theodoro Belvedereensi, &c. This work was printed at Turin, in 1636, and refuted soon after by the Sieur Gilles, who replied likewise to another book, which the same monk had published in Italian, under the title of Lucerna della Cbristiana Verità per consolar la vera Chiesa e la falsa pretesa Reformata; he replied to it, I say, by an Italian work, intitled, Torre Evangelica, divided into forty eight chapters, the contents of which he gives in his History of the Vaudois (3). He does the same with regard to his answer to another Italian book, which Belvedereus dedicated to Mess. de la propaganda, to inform them of the state of the reformed churches of the Vaudois, and of their order, doctrine, and ceremonies, insinuating obliquely at the end, that they ought to be exterminated (4).

GIOACHINO GRECO, known under the name of the CALABRIAN, played at Chefs so skillfully, that it cannot be thought strange, that I consecrate to him a little article. All those, who excel in their profession, to a certain degree, deserve that distinction. This gamester did not find his match any where: He went to all the courts of Europe, and signalized himself there at Chefs in a most surprizing manner. He found famous gamesters at the court of France, such as the duke of Nemours, Mr Arnaud, colonel of the Carabineers, Chaumont, and La Salle; but, though they pretended to know more than others, none of them was able to play with him; nor could they cope with him all together. He was at Chefs a bravo; who fought in all countries some famous knight, with whom he might fight, and break a lance; and he found none whom he did not overcome. A wit made some Verses upon that subject (a) [A]. See above, the article BOI.

GIRAC (PAUL THOMAS SIEUR DE): See THOMAS.

GLAPHYRA, wife to Archelaus, high-priest of Bellona, at Comana in Cappadocia, procured kingdoms for her two sons by her beauty. She flourished at the same time with Marc Antony. There are historians, who do not expressly say, that she was dishonest, but content themselves to give us implicitly to understand it [A] by relating what Marc Antony did for her sake: But Dion, without any softening calls her a leud woman [B]. It is indeed very probable, considering the temper of Marc Antony, that he did not give crowns for the bare satisfaction of obliging a handsome woman; and that he received from Glaphyra all the acknowledgments, which a voluptuous man is capable to wish and exact. The noise of this intrigue spread as far as Rome; and Fulvia, Marc Antony's wife, would fain have engaged Augustus to revenge the infidelity of her husband. Her desires in this matter were so violent, that she threatened Augustus with a declaration of war, if he did not use her, as her husband used Glaphyra: But Augustus slighted that threatening, and chose rather to expose himself to an open war, than to be Fulvia's gallant. This is at least what he would have the world think of him: For he composed upon it an epigram, which Martial has inserted in his poems [C]. I know not by what fatality Glaphyra's husband did not find [A] There are historians, who do not expressly say that she was dishonest; but content themselves to give us implicitly to understand it. Appian is the man I have in view: see how he speaks, when he relates what Marc Antony did in Asia, after the defeat of Brutus and Cassius: Dilectiones quoque civitatum ac regum ex arbitrio suo composuit, Sissinnæ Ariarathique in Cappadocia, prælato Sissinna in Glaphyræ matris formosæ gratiam (1). It was in the 713th year of Rome, that Sissinna was made king of Cappadocia, upon the exclusion of Ariarathes. He did not long enjoy that crown: for we are going to see, that, in 718, Ariarathes reigned in Cappadocia.

[B] Dion . . . calls her a leud woman. It is when he speaks of the change of government, which was made by Marc Antony in several provinces of Asia, in the year 718. Amyntas, who had been secretary to find in Cæsar the same support, which her sons had in Marc Antony. I have already said, that he was high-priest of Bellona, which was a considerable dignity. Cæsar bestowed it upon a great lord, named Lycomedes [D], who founded his pretensions upon good titles. Where was Glaphyra at that time? If she had pleaded her husband's cause before Cæsar, she had made it appear, that Lycomedes's pretensions were ill grounded: And the judge, I suppose, had been too well bred, not to declare himself for a priest, who had so handsome a wife. I should be glad to know, what reason a wit had for saying (a), that the Glaphyra of Augustus's epigram was the player Cytheris. We shall see, in the following article, that Glaphyra pretended to be descended from the kings of Persia.

Dejotarus, was put in possession of Galatia, and of some parts of Lycaonia and Pamphylia. Ariarathes was turned out of Cappadocia, and Archelaus put in his place: Archelaus, I say, who was descended from the Archelai, who had made war against the Romans, and son to the courtizan Glaphyra. Ὁ δ' Ἀρχέλαος ἔτι τῶν πατρὸς μὲν πατρὸς, ἐκ τῶν Ἀρχελαῶν ἐκείνων τῶν τοῖς Ῥωμαίοις ἀντιστοιχοῦντων ἦν, ἐκ δὲ μητρὸς ἑταίρας Γλαφύρας ἐγγεγέννητο. Archelai vero hujus genus paternum deducebatur ab Archela's qui contra Romanos belligeraverant, mater autem ei erat scortum Glaphyra (2).

Father Noris imagined that Augustus made that epigram against Marc Antony, and with an intent to reproach him with that unlawful commerce (4): but the blow is not at all levelled against Marc Antony, but against his wife Fulvia; and, indeed, it is the cruellest blow that satire can strike against a woman. I make the less scruple of taking the liberty to mark that small mistake of the learned library-keeper of the Vatican, because he would be glad to say, that he has not examined that sort of verses, and takes a pride in mistaking them. His error is infinitely less, than that of Farnaby, who has found, in those verses, a protestation of Augustus, that he preferred chastity before life. We shall see, in the article LYCORIS, that some people pretend, that the courtesan Cytheris is meant in Augustus's epigram.

great lord, named Lycomedes. I have already said, in another place (5), that Hirtius calls him Nicomedes:

let us quote his words: 'Id (Bellona templum) homini

nobilissimo Nicomedi Bithynio adjudicavit, qui regio

Cappadocum genere ortus propter adversam fortunam

majorum suorum mutationemque generis jure minime

dubio, vetustate tamen intermisso, Sacerdotium id

repetebat (6). — He adjudged the temple of Bel-lona to Nicomedes, a noble Bithynian, who, being descended from the kings of Cappadocia, claimed that priesthood, by an undoubted right, which, thro' the misfortunes of his ancestors, had lain long dormant. These words intimate, that there were some disputes, before Cæsar, touching the possession of that benefice. Now since Strabo asserts, that Lycomedes enjoyed it after Archelaus, it may seem, that the dispute was between them two. This is the opinion, of Father Noris, who made no difficulty to affirm (7), that Archelaus enjoyed the pontificate of Bellona, till

Cæsar took it from him, in the year 707, to bestow

it upon Lycomedes. According to this supposition, it may be asked, where were, then, Glaphyra's charms;

and why did she not make use of them against Ly-comedes's demands? her beauty was undoubtedly more powerful at that time, than in 713: for that is not a fruit, that grows better by coming to maturity.

Did her husband hide her, and rather chuse to lose his priesthood, than expose his wife to the dangerous courtship of Cæsar? it is what I know nothing of.

GLAPHYRA, grand-child to the former, was the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. Her first husband was Alexander, the son of Herod and Mariamne; and being proud and infatuated with her nobility, she no way contributed to maintain an union in the family, into which she was married: A family, whose divisions rendered Herod the most unhappy and most criminal of all fathers. Glaphyra boasted at every turn, that her father traced his origin to Temenus (a); that her mother descended from Darius, the son of Hyftaspes; and that therefore her noble birth set her above the rest of the ladies at court. She looked down with contempt upon the sisters and wives of Herod; and reproached these, that their beauty, not their birth, had raised them to the rank they held. Nothing was more apt, than such discourses, to set Herod's family in a flame: And it is certain that this pride of Glaphyra was one of the first causes of her husband's death. She rendered him odious, and increased the desire they had to destroy him by calumnies and artifices (b). When Herod caused Alexander to be tried for his life, Glaphyra was examined as an evidence: Her answer deserves to be related [A]. After Alexander's execution, Herod sent back Glaphyra to her father Archelaus, and kept with him the two sons Alexander had by that woman (c). Josephus pretends, that she was married again to Juba king of Libya; and that, after the death of this second husband, she returned to her father; but it is easy to prove that to be false [B], if it be meant of Juba king of Mauritania. It is certain, that Archelaus,

[A] Her answer deserves to be related. She underwent the interrogatory before her husband, who was fast bound, like a son, who had conspired against his father's life. That spectacle grieved her extremely, and made her fetch most lamentable groans. Her husband being pressed to confess, whether his wife was an accomplice in the attempt, answered, that he was not the man, that would keep any thing secret from a wife, by whom he had children, and who was dearer to him than his own life. Thereupon she protested her innocence, and declared, she would not scruple to tell a lie, if thereby she could contribute to save her husband's life though with the loss of her own; but that otherwise she would confess all. The husband made then his confession, and said, they had both no other design, than to go to Archelaus's court, and from thence to Rome (1).

[B] It is easy to prove that to be false. Josephus mentions that marriage of Glaphyra with Juba king of Libya, as a thing certain (2); adding, that Juba was dead, when Glaphyra was married to Archelaus. Here is a demonstration, that this cannot be understood of the king of Mauritania. Juba, king of Mauritania, was not dead (3), when Strabo composed his sixth book. Now Strabo composed it in the reign of Tiberius (4); therefore Juba was not dead, when Archelaus, Herod's son, married Glaphyra, since he married her during his prosperity, and consequently before the year of Rome 759, which was that of his disgrace: for it was then, that Augustus confined him to Vienna. Augustus lived seven or eight years after that. It may be proved, that Strabo wrote his sixth book about the fifth year of Tiberius? for in the fourth book (5), he takes notice, that Tiberius and Drusus laus, the son of Herod, fell so passionately in love with her, that in order to marry her, he put away his own wife (d). It is said, that, Glaphyra lived not long after her return into Judæa, by reason of a marriage so opposite to the Jewish laws; and history mentions a dream, which presaged her death [C]. The two sons she had by Alexander, her first husband, renounced betimes the Jewish religion (e); because, I suppose, Archelaus, their grand-father by their mother's side, sent for, and took care of them. One of them was called Alexander, and the other Tigranes: I shall say something of their adventures in the remarks [D]. If we may trust the chronology of some modern authors [E], we must rank the two Glaphyra's amongst the women, who preserved their beauty to old age.

Drusus had subdued the Norici thirty three years before (6). It would be needless to remark after this, that Dion (7) mentions king Juba as a prince, that was alive the same year, in which he places Archelaus's banishment. It may be gathered from the fourth book of Tacitus's Annals, that Juba died about the tenth year of Tiberius; for that historian mentions him (8) as a man who was living in the 776th year of Rome; but, in the following year, he speaks of the reign of Ptolemy, son of Juba (9). The seventeenth book of Strabo was composed soon after the death of the same Juba (10); and therefore it is plain, that Josephus would be grossly mistaken, if by the king of Libya, whom he mentions as second husband of Glaphyra, he had meant the king of Mauritania. Father Noris (11) would clear Josephus but from part of his mistake, supposing he had reason to conjecture, that Glaphyra was put away by Juba. What Josephus declares concerning the death of the second husband, as antecedent to the marriage of Archelaus and Glaphyra, would still be false: but after all, this divorce is nothing but a meer supposition. Noldius (12) supposes a thing, which is, perhaps, less uncertain, to wit, that Josephus meant, by Juba king of Libya, a king, who had nothing to do with the Romans, and whose widow Glaphyra was, when Archelaus fell in love with her. That author maintains (13), that Libya is taken for all Africa in general, or for certain parts of Africa in particular; but that, in this last signification, it never comprehends Mauritania: from whence he takes occasion to censure (14) Sigismundus Gelenius, who has translated Regem Mauritanie, the words used by Josephus in speaking of Juba king of Libya, Ἰὺβῆς Διόγουρος. He censures yet more strongly father Salian, who thought that Juba was killed in the fight, mentioned by Dion (15) in his fifty fifth book. It is the battle, in which the Getuli, who had revolted, and refused obedience to Juba, gained the victory. That Jesuit observes, in order to support his opinion, that Juba was then dead; that his widow was returned to her father's house, and that she had married a third husband, viz. Archelaus, ethnarch of Judæa. He quotes Josephus, but he should have remembered, that the same year, wherein the Getuli gained the victory, mentioned by Dion, Archelaus was banished by Augustus. It is therefore true, that Juba was still alive, the year, wherein Archelaus was banished beyond the Alps; and consequently it is false, that his widow was Archelaus's wife: for it would be absurd to suppose, that he married her but a few days before his disgrace, which happened in the ninth or tenth year of his ethnarchy: So that the very passage, which father Salian has quoted out of Dion, suffices to convince him of a blunder.

[C] Mention is made of a dream which presaged her death. I mention it with the moral reflexions, which the historian has added to it (16). 'As she was with her last husband Archelaus, she dreamed, that Alexander came to her, and that she embraced him for joy. But Alexander reproached her, saying; Glaphyra, thou hast made good the common proverb, that women are not to be trusted. I married thee a virgin; I have made thee a mother to our common children: and now, having quite forgot our love, thou hast been taken with the desire to marry a second husband. Nor hast thou been contented with putting such an affront upon me, but hast dared to lie with a third husband, creeping basely and impudently into my family: and canst thou now bear my brother Archelaus to be thy husband? As for me, I shall never forget thy former love; and I shall free thee from such a reproach, by making thee mine, as thou wast before. Having declared this dream to some women her familiar acquaintance, she died soon after. I thought this story deserved to be recited, and that it was not impertinent in this place, wherein I speak of those kings: and, besides, this example is particularly remarkable, since it contains a most certain proof of the immortality of the soul, and of divine providence. If these things seem incredible to any man, let him enjoy his own opinion: but at the same time, let him not endeavour to make those disbelieve it, who, by such examples, are incited to the study and practice of virtue.'

[D] I shall say something of the adventures of her two sons in the remarks. Tigranes was king of Armenia, and died without issue (17). Josephus says only, that the Romans accused him: he should have added, that Tiberius caused him to be put to death (18). Alexander, Tigranes's brother, had a son called Tigranes, on whom Tiberius bestowed the kingdom of Armenia. This Tigranes had a son, named Alexander, who married Jotapa, daughter of Antiochus, king of Comagene, and who obtained from Vespasian a kingdom in Cilicia. Let us add, to this narrative of Josephus, the supplement which Tacitus furnishes us with. 'Advenit Tigranes à Nerone ad capessendum imperium decessus, Cappadocum ex nobilitate, regis Archelai nepos, sed quod diu obses apud urbem fuerat usque ad servilem patientiam demissus (19). - - - Tigranes arrived, being pitched upon by Nero to assume the crown: he was of the Cappadocian nobility, grand-son of king Archelaus, but, through his long continuance at Rome as an hostage, sunk to the patience of a slave.' There is reason to believe, that the Romans did not support Tigranes against the Parthians, who demanded Armenia for Tiridates. Tacitus does not mark precisely the degree of consanguinity of that Tigranes, with respect to Archelaus, king of Cappadocia (20). This Archelaus was not his grand-father, but his great grand-father, since that Tigranes was son to one Alexander, whose father was another Alexander, and his mother Glaphyra daughter of Archelaus.

[E] If we may trust the chronology of some modern authors. Noldius proves against Tacitus, that Archelaus was not the grand-father, but the great grand-father of that Tigranes on whom Nero bestowed Armenia: He proves it (21), I say, first, by the testimony of Josephus; and secondly, by the decrepitude, wherein that Tigranes must have been, if he had been Archelaus's son; for, in such a case, he had been son of Alexander. Now Herod put to death his son Alexander soon after the battle of Actium, and consequently Tigranes must have been born towards the 724th year of Rome, and must have been near ninety years old, when he was sent into Armenia. This is the consequence Noldius ought to have drawn from his hypothesis, which however he has not done, choosing rather to reason thus: since Tigranes's father was put to death soon after the battle of Actium, Tigranes must have been born towards the middle of the age of Augustus, and so he could not have been fit for business in the reign of Nero. The first consequence is not according to the rules of exact chronology. Augustus died in the 766th year of Rome, being seventy six years old; the middle of his age was, therefore, the year 728. Now can an exact chronologist say, that a man, born about the year 728, is the son of a father, that was put to death soon after the battle of Actium? The other consequence is much better: Armenia was given to Tigranes by Nero, in the year 813. Therefore, if Tigranes was born in the year 728, he must have been eighty five years old when he went to Armenia. But let us shew Noldius, that he has built upon a false supposition. The death of Alexander, son of Herod, could not happen soon after the battle of Actium; for that unfortunate prince left two sons. It may therefore be supposed, that his wife was twenty years old, when he died: she must then have been born about the 704th year of Rome, and Archelaus her father's birth must fall towards the year year 684; and so he would have been eighty five years old when he died. Now this is not at all likely, because the historians, that have mentioned his death, have designed, thereby, to cast an odium upon Tiberius; and yet they have not mentioned the circumstance of Archelaus's old age, which circumstance was very proper to render the emperor's cruelty yet more horrid. Add, that, if Archelaus was born in the year 684, his mother must have been near fifty years old, when she raised such a violent passion in Marc Antony. The proof of this is easy: Archelaus was not her eldest son, and therefore we may reasonably suppose, that she was about twenty years old, when he was born. Now it was in the year 713, that Marc Antony gave the kingdom of Cappadocia to Sisinna son of Glaphyra. It would have been an uncommon sight indeed to see a grand-mother, whose grand-daughter was already nine or ten years old, hold in her chains, by the charms of her beauty, the sovereign disposer of crowns and sceptres (22). Augustus would have had here a fair occasion to write satirical epigrams upon Marc Antony, and to turn him into ridicule. On the other hand, since Glaphyra, Archelaus's daughter, was not married to Archelaus, Herod's son, till after Herod was dead, she might have been able to kindle a violent love, when she was fifty years old. Let us therefore rectify Noldius's chronology, by saying, with father Noris (23), that Alexander, husband to the last Glaphyra, was not put to death till after the 742d year of Rome.

GLEICHEN. A very singular adventure is related concerning a German count of this name. He was taken in a fight against the Turks, and carried into Turkey, where he suffered a hard and long captivity, being put upon ploughing the ground, &c. But thus happened his deliverance: Upon a certain day, the daughter of the king (a) his master came up to him, and asked him several questions, whilst she was a walking. His good mien and dexterity so pleased that princess, that she promised to set him free, and to follow him, provided he would marry her. He answered, I have a Wife and Children. That is no Argument, replied she, the Custom of the Turks allow one Man several Wives. The count was not stubborn, but acquiesced to these reasons, and gave his word. The princess employed herself so industriously to get him out of bondage, that they were soon in a readiness to go on board a vessel. They arrived happily at Venice. The count found there one of his men, who travelled every where to hear of him. He told him, that his wife and children were in good health: Whereupon he presently went to Rome; and, after he had ingenuously related what he had done, the Pope granted him a solemn dispensation to keep his two wives (b). If the court of Rome shewed itself so easy on this occasion, the count's wife was not less so; for she received very kindly the Turkish lady, by whose means she recovered her dear husband, and had for this concubine a particular kindness (c). The Turkish princess answered very handsomely those civilities; and though she proved barren, yet she loved tenderly the children, which the other wife bore in abundance. There is still at Erford a monument of this story to be seen (d) [A]. A very worthy gentleman (e), who told me this story in the year 1697, seemed very much surprized, that the Protestant writers, when they are obliged to answer the reproaches touching the permission the reformers gave to a Landgrave of Hesse, do not instance in the dispensation granted by the Pope to count de Gleichen, and desired to know my thoughts thereupon [B]. He told me, That du Val has mentioned this adventure in his description of Germany (f). In the year 1227, says du Val, a count of Gleichen obtained leave from the Pope to have two wives at once. If this story be true, we have in it a great instance of the triumph and power of love [C]. An abbot, who kept a correspondence by letters with count

[A] There is still at Erford a monument of this story to be seen. These are Hendorf's words: 'Hujus rei monumentum Erphordie etiamnum existat: in quo ex utroque latere Comit uxores adsunt. Regina marmorea coronâ ornata: Comitissa sculpta est: nuda & infantes ad ejus pedes reptantes (1). - - There is still at Erford a monument of this story; in which the count is placed between two wives. The queen is adorned with a marble crown: the countess is engraved naked, with children at her feet.'

[B] And desired to know my thoughts thereupon. If my memory fails me not, my answer amounted to this: first, that this passage was somewhat obscure, and uncertain; and secondly, that it would signify nothing to alledge it, unless either the Pope's brief, or the testimony of some cotemporary author, or the consent of the Romish writers, could be produced. Hendorf is almost the only author that vouches for this story (2): now he quoting no body, and being but a compiler, whom the learned never much esteemed, and also a Protestant, the Roman Catholics would not fail to reject his testimony. They would ask, out of what records or annals he has taken that passage? and since he quotes nothing, they would pretend, that he has no other ground for it but an hearsay, or uncertain and even fabulous traditions; such as many illustrious families industriously propagate, concerning the manner how their ancestors were freed from bondage in the times of the crusades. In short if they denied the fact, what could one answer to them? the monument at Erford can prove nothing: for after all, does the figure of a man between two figures of women clearly signify polygamy? May it not as well signify, among other things, two successive marriages, or two marriages contracted between a husband and two living wives, but the latter of which marriages was declared void? are there not abundance of ridiculous stories, which people endeavour to prove by monuments of stone? thus some pretend to prove, that a certain countess of Holland was delivered of 365 children at once: a thing, which all good historians make a jest of, and evince to be a fallacy.

[C] We have here a great instance of the triumph and power of love. That is, the daughter of a king, ready not only to renounce the sublime advantages of her condition, to follow a slave to the world's end, but actually a fugitive, after having overlooked dangers, to which her design exposed both her own life, and that of the prisoner, with whom she was in love. She did not engage her self by degrees in a slight so surrounded with dangers, so disadvantageous, so scandalous; no, she fully resolves upon it the very first time she sees the slave. Ut vidi ut perii, ut me malus abstulit error (3), might she have said, like many others. How true is what is said in an opera;

Bacchus revient vainqueur des climats de l'Aurore,
Il traine apres font char mille peuples vaincus;
Il meprisoit l'amour, mais l'amour est encore
Un vainqueur mille fois plus puissant que Bacchus.

Bacchus returns victorious from the East.

Buffy, had heard something of this story, but was ignorant of the true state of the case [D]. For the rest, the author of the fifteen comforts of matrimony seems to suppose, that it happens pretty often, that a woman marries again, upon the false supposition of her husband's death [E]. The Journal of Hamburg will furnish me with a good supplement to this article [F].

*Which makes him slight the power of Cupid's darts:
But soon he feels the greater force of love.*

I know not whether the lady de Ville-Dieu has romanized the story of our count de Gleichen. This had been a fine subject for her pen; and as dry as Hondorf's narrative may seem to be, she would have made something very pretty of it. Note, that the triumph of love, in this particular, regards only the fair sex; for certainly the count did not marry another wife upon the score of love, but because, being a gentleman, he was weary of being a slave, and of tilling the ground. But let us observe also, that the action of that Ottoman princess is not by much so black as that of Nisus's daughter, or that of the daughter of Pterelaus (4). Nay, perhaps, it is somewhat more excusable, than that of Minos's daughter. And indeed it was much more prosperous than the treason of these three princesses, and of several other like victims of love, ornaments of Venus's triumphant chariot. Nevertheless, do not allow the advantage to the male sex; for certainly there are a great many more men, that marry their maids, than women that marry their footmen.

[D] An abbot had heard something of this story, but was ignorant of the true state of the case. This is what he wrote to the count de Buffy Rabutin, the twelfth of June, 1674 (5). 'I was the other day with Madam de —, and as they talked of Mr de — who presented a petition to the Pope, praying he might be allowed to marry another wife; they said that the holy see had once done that favour to a German count, who, not having enough of one wife, was permitted, for the salvation of his soul, to marry a second. Madam de —, who was before nodding and falling asleep, awaked at the hearing of this, and said, sighing, that there were no such husbands now-a-days.' It manifestly appears that he confounds things, and that of two adventures he makes but one: he blends together what concerns the count of Gleichen, and what regards a landgrave of Hesse, and knows not the circumstances of either. The permission, which he pretends was granted by the holy see to a German count, was not grounded on the insufficiency of the wife; nor was that, granted to a landgrave of Hesse, founded on the same reason (6), tho' Thuanus says so. I would not warrant that the abbot has better observed the rules of history, as to the jest and sighing of Madam de —, than the rest. He invented, perhaps, that reflexion himself, and wrote it nevertheless as an historical passage to count Rabutin, to end his letter with a diverting stroke. However it be, I happened the other day to be in company with a gentleman, who has been married these five or six years, and I took notice, that, after he had been told that part of the abbot's letter, he said, almost sighing, that if there were no such husbands now-a-days, there were yet fewer wives like that of the count. I wish he had made another reflexion, viz. that that lady supposed without reason, that our age falls short of the former times: which is false. Husbands of that stamp were always very scarce, and as scarce in preceding ages as in the present.

[E] The author of the fifteen comforts of matrimony seems to suppose, that it happens pretty often, that a woman marries again on the false supposition of the death of her husband. For this is the thirteenth comfort of matrimony. 'A gentleman, says he (7), who has lived with his wife in great delight and sports five, or six, or eight years, more or less, has now a mind to acquire honour, by feats of arms . . . it happens that he goes beyond sea to follow chivalry . . . having first, with deep regret, taken leave of his wife, who expresses all the sorrow imaginable; but he is a man that loves honour, and so nothing can detain him . . . Away he goes, and recommends his wife and children, (whom, next to honour, he loves beyond any thing in the world) to his intimate friends. Now it happens, that, as he crosses the sea, he is taken by the enemy, where, by ill fortune, or otherwise, he continues three or four years, or more, so that he cannot return home. His lady, all the while, is in great affliction; and now she happens to hear, that he is dead, whereupon she is wondrous sorrowful: but she cannot always weep; and, by God's blessings, her grief is so allayed, that she marries again to another, with whom she takes her delight, and has soon forgot her husband, whom she loved so well, and her dear children. The dalliances, kisses, and embraces, she had with her husband, are passed and forgotten; and who should see her sport with this last husband, would say, that she loves him more than she ever did the other, who is a prisoner, or in some other strait, for his prowess. Her children, which the good man loved, are discarded, and their estate spoiled and wasted; and so they dally and sport together. But fortune so orders it, that the good gentleman her husband returns, being grown old and decayed; for he was not at ease, for two, or three, or four years, that he was a prisoner; and, when he comes near his country, he enquires after his wife and children: for he is greatly afraid lest they be dead, or in any other great strait. And you may well imagine how many times the good man has thought of them amidst the anguish of his confinement; and has often been uneasy about them, whilst his wife made herself merry; and perhaps, at that very time that the good man was thinking of her, and praying God to preserve her, he, whom she had lately married, held her in his arms, out of harm's reach. Now he is told that she is married, and so you may imagine how concerned he is at such a piece of news. . . . And, being come into his own country, and finding the thing to be true, if he be a man of honour, he will never take his wife again; and the other, who had married her, and has sported with her, will leave her. And so she has lost her honour, and perchance will lose her senses to boot. The good man shall ever live in sorrow; his children shall in some measure be disgraced for the fault of their mother: It shall not be lawful for either of them to marry again, as long as the other is alive.

[F] The journal of Hamburg will furnish me with a good supplement to this article. Mr Dartis, speaking (8) of a novel of Mr le Noble, intitled, Zulima, or, Pure Love, observes, that the first notion of this romance was taken from a memoir among the archives of the house of Gleichen, which descends from a prince of Westphalia, the chief hero of this historical novel. He was called Eberard, and, having been taken in the battle of Joppa, which the Sultan Noradin gained over the Christians of the crusade, he was so happy as to inspire with love the daughter of that Sultan. She helped him to break the chains of his slavery, went with him into Europe, and was his second wife after the death of her, whom he had married some time before the crusade. Mr le Noble cites, as an indisputable witness of the truth of this story, the tomb, where lie the ashes of this prince, and his two wives. It is still to be seen, says he, at Herford in Westphalia, where he resided. On this foundation it is that he has built a pious love-intrigue, which aimed first at the conversion of a Sultane's, and afterwards ended in her marriage with the Westphalian prince. He says in another place (9), that the writers of romances are obliged to follow history, when they tell in a preface the foundation of their fictions. Yet this, adds he, is what Mr le Noble has not done, in the advertisement, which he has prefixed to his Zulima, as will appear by the extract of a letter, which I have received from a good hand on this subject. It is this. 'It appears evidently from what you have said of Mr le Noble's little book, that he has confounded all. Eberard, duke of Westphalia, is a personage absolutely unknown to history; and, if he lived in the time of Noradin, a Saracen prince of the XIIIth century, how could he be author of the counts of Gleichen, who pretend to have received their earldom from Charlemagne, and who at least are older than the wars beyond sea? The family of the counts of Gleichen is extinct, and I believe, what they pretend to fetch from their archives is as fabulous as the rest of the little romance. It is true, however, there is a tradition, confirmed by some modern chronicles, which imports, that a count of Gleichen, bringing with him from beyond sea the lady that freed him, and meeting again his first wife, found the means of keeping them both in good understanding with each other, and with the consent (they say) of the church; which is not very probable. We may hold it for certain, that there is no monument of a duke Eberhard of Westphalia, neither at Erford, nor at Herforder. The counts of Gleichen were neighbours of Erford in Thuringia, and had nothing common with Herforder in Westphalia.

GOLDAST (a) (MELCHIOR HAIMINSFELD), a native of Bischoff-zell (b) in Switzerland, and a Protestant according to the confession of faith of Geneva, was a very learned man in the XVIIth century. His family was not rich [A], and he never raised himself; so that he made himself more known by the great number of books he either composed, or of which he was the editor, than by his public employments. A collection of letters, printed in the year 1688 [B], shews that, in the year 1598, he lived at Bischoff-zell. That, the following year, he lodged at St Gall, in an honest man's house, named Schobingerus, who declared himself his patron. That the same year he went to Geneva, and lodged in Lectius's house [C], with the sons of Vassan, whose preceptor he was. That he was still at Geneva in the year 1602, where he complained of his miserable condition. That the same year he went to Laufanne, because he could live cheaper there than at Geneva. That he returned soon after to Geneva. That, upon Lectius's recommendation, he was preferred to be secretary to the duke of Bouillon. That he was not long in that place; for he was at Franckfort in February 1603. That he was tutor in a private family, at Forteg, in the year 1604; That, in the year 1605, he lived at Bischoff-zell; where he complained he was not safe [D] by reason of his religion, which rendered him very odious, even to his relations. That he was at Franckfort in the year 1606.

That

[A] His family was not rich. This appears by some letters of Conradus Ritterhusius, at whose house Goldast had boarded. Goldast was gone from thence without paying his landlord; and, after his return into his own country, a long time passed before he discharged that debt. Ritterhusius complained of it (1), and represented, that the butchers, bakers, and brewers, had pressed him so hard, that he had been forced to take up money at interest, to be rid of their persecutions. He added, he hoped that Goldast would remit to him both the principal and interest; and that Taurillus, and some others, did the same by such of their boarders as went upon trust. His letter is dated the twenty fourth of August, 1598. The following year, Stuckius (2) wrote to Goldast, that Ritterhusius complained that he had not received the fifty two florins of gold, which were due to him; wherefore he exhorted the debtor to discharge that debt speedily; which if he failed to do, his mother should be acquainted with it. A letter of Ritterhusius (3), dated the eighth of September, 1599, informs us, that he was paid, and did forgive the interest; but that Goldast having left several debts unpaid at Altdorf, several scandalous stories were handed about concerning him. However, this is not an argument that Goldast was not nobly born; which, as Scaliger tells us, he pretended to be (4): for a man may be a gentleman, and yet not have wherewithal to pay for his board. Scioppius observes, that Goldast put before his name a particule, which was peculiar to the nobility: 'Fratribus quidem certe hoc uno nomine nobilior, quod illi se tantum Heiminsfeld, hic autem Heros noster pro consuetudine pleræque nobilitatis ab Heiminsfeld cognominat (5) — In this alone more noble than his brothers, that, whereas they called themselves barely Heiminsfeld, this our hero, after the manner of the nobility, assumes the stile of ab Heiminsfeld.' But here is a pregnant proof of Goldast's poverty. When he printed any books, he sent copies of them to the magistrates of cities, and to the consistories, who commonly sent him a present somewhat above the value of the book; and his friends thought they did him no small service, when they procured him such sorry rewards; however, that mean commerce helped him to subsist. A minister, called David Lange, wrote to him from Memmingen, that the magistrates of the place sent him, in the enclosed, unum nummum aureum, and the consistory another, for his book (6).

[C] He lodged in Lectius's house at Geneva. He was one of the professors of the academy. The collection of letters, I have mentioned, contains one (7) very sharp against him. Lectius complained, that when Goldast and his pupils left his house, they had not made him a handsome present: but Goldast complained on the other hand, that they had been obliged to pay for a hundred things without any manner of justice; such as stoves, benches, locks, keys, &c. It must be owned, that those, who keep boarders in universities, are too often guilty of fordid avarice. When they are not professors, there is no great harm; but what a disgrace to learning, what a shame for the character of professors, when they are so fond of filthy lucre!

[D] In 1605, he resided at Bischoff-zell, where he complained (8) he was not safe. Scioppius says, that Jodocus Mezlerus, vicar to the abbot of St Gall, had told him, that Goldast was committed to prison at St Gall, upon account of theft. He added, that Goldast had asked leave to buy a small estate near St Gall, where the Lutheran gentlewoman he designed to marry might have liberty of conscience; and that, as for himself, he would not stick to be a Roman Catholic. 'Commodum eas literas legeram cum officii causa visum ad me venit D. Jodocus Mezlerus illustrissimi Principis & Abbatis S. Galli vicarius, istumque Melchiorum adhuc vivum probeque sibi notum esse affirmavit. Idque ut credibilis faceret præter alia hoc quoque de eodem narravit, exposuisse cum sibi in sermone, in quanto apud Sangallenses periculo semel versatus fuerit cum illi furti nomine in carcerem se compesissent: petiisse etiam ut prædiali cuiusdam in Sangallensi territorio emendi ab Abbate potestas sibi fieret, ita tamen ut uxori, quam ducere in animo haberet, Lutherane religionis libertas salva esset: nam seipsum quidem Catholicum fore futurum. His ego auditis cæpi de ipso non desperare futurum ut sato aliquando fratris utatur, & sublimè potius quàm bumi patiscat, cum præsertim nemo, qui faciem ejus viderit, non confestim patibulo dignum judicet. Interim nos velut Ciceronem Vatini morte nuntiata, cuius parum certus dicebatur auctor, respondisse legimus, usura fruemur (9). — I had just read those letters, when Jodocus Mezlerus, vicar of the most illustrious prince and abbot of St Gall, came to pay me a visit, and affirmed, that that Melchior was still alive, and well known to him. And to convince me farther of it, he gave me this account of him, that he had heard him say in conversation, in what great danger he once was at St Gall, being imprisoned there for theft; that he had petitioned the abbot for leave to purchase a small seat in the territory of St Gall, yet so as that the wife, he intended to marry, might have

That he married, and staid there till the year 1610, in miserable circumstances [E], being disappointed in the hopes his friends gave him of a good settlement [F]. The collection, I speak of, ends there. Goldast had already published many books, which he continued to do till his death [G], which happened on the eleventh of August, 1635 (C). Scioppius had ordered, that they should publish, in his Scaliger Hypobolimus, that Goldast had been broke upon the wheel; but, finding that to be false, he caused it to be left out. We shall see, in the remarks, how he gets off [H], though

* have liberty to profess Lutheranism, but that himself should make no difficulty of being a Catholic. When I heard this, I began not to be out of hopes, that he might, one time or other, meet with his brother's fate, and not on high rather than on the ground; especially since every one that sees him must presently judge him worthy of a gibbet. In the mean time, let us, as Cicero is said to have replied, upon the uncertain news of the death of Vatinius, enjoy the usury.' Scioppius is exceptionable in this particular; both because he was a very slanderous, abusive, man, and because he looked upon Goldast as one, who had furnished Scaliger with materials to write the satire, intitled, Munsterus Hypobolimus (10). Apply this to the remark [H].

[E] He continued till 1610, at Francfort, in miserable circumstances. This appears by a letter (11), which was written by Quirinus Reuterus, director of the college of Wisdom at Heidelberg; wherein he exhorts him to come and board in that college.

[F] . . . disappointed in the hopes his friends gave him of some good settlement. They negotiated at the court of the elector Palatine, to procure him the office of counsellor to his electoral highness in the year 1608. The 191st letter mentions this as concluded, but, in the 194th letter, Lingelheim says, that that business went backwards; and, in the 209th, he informs us, that it had absolutely miscarried. The elector of Mentz offered, then, an employment to our Goldast. The latter asked Lingelheim's advice (12), who, knowing him to be in great necessity, and having nothing to offer to him, did not absolutely dissuade him from accepting those offers; but only represented to him in what slavery he would infallibly be, in a place, where the Jesuits were masters.

[G] He continued to publish books 'till his death.' Let us give here a catalogue of his principal works. Alamannicarum Rerum Scriptores vetusti, three volumes in folio. Monarchia Imperii Romani, seu de Jurisdictione & Potestate Imperatoris & Papæ per varios Auctores, three volumes in folio. Constitutionum Imperialium tomus quatuor, in folio. Suevicarum Rerum Scriptores veteres, at Francfort 1605 in 4to. De Juri-bus ac Privilegiis Regni Bohemæ, & hæreditaria Regiæ familie successione, libri 6. cum appendice, in folio. Consultatio de officio & jure Electoris Bohemæ in conventibus Electorum Romani Imperii. Rationale Constitutionum Imperialium. Statuta & Rescripta Imperialia. Politica Imperialia. Catholicon rei monetariæ seu Leges monarchicæ generales de rebus nummariis & pecuniariis. Digesta regia seu Constitutiones Imperiales de SS. Eucharistia. Apologia Principum Germaniæ pro Henrico IV Imperatore contra criminationes Gregorii VII. Replicatio pro Cæsarea & Regia Francorum Majestate & Ordinibus Imperii contra Gretserum (13). Imperialia Decreta de cultu Imaginum. Paradoxon de honore Medicorum, & obiter de honore Theologorum & Jurconsultorum. Sibylla Francica, seu de admirabili Puella Joanna Lotbaringa exercitus Francorum ductrice sub Carolo VII. Dialogi duo de querelis Franciæ & Angliæ, & de jure successionis utrorumque Regum in regno Franciæ. Centuria Epistoliarum Philologicarum diversorum hominum, at Francfort 1610 in 8vo. Emendationes in Petronium. Notæ ad paræneticos Scriptores veteres.

This last work was not much esteemed by Scaliger. He quotes old authors in his Pereneticæ, says he, speaking of Goldast (14). He has trifled too long with these old words. There is nothing that is good for any thing in these Parænetici Melchioris. It were well, indeed, if he had published these old records; for thereby one might learn something relating to gentlemen's houses. Melchior has some manuscripts, sed infimi ævi. I did prostitute my self by writing to Melchior, since he is such a man (15). It is not necessary to advertise the reader, that most of the works, which Goldast published, are productions, of which he was not the author; for the titles of them sufficiently shew, that he did but reduce them into one body, or took them from the libraries, where they were only in manuscript: wherein he shewed himself the most indefatigable man in the world. Conringius gives him great commendations. 'Vir, says he (16), editis antiquis Germaniæ monumentis tam bene de patria meritis, ut absque dubio Athenienses illum in Prytanæo aluissent, si quidem illud in ævum incidisset. Cum (17) primis in Germania certius meliusque hoc studiorum genus (de jure publico Imp. Germ. agit) incensum fuit initio hujus sæculi auctore MELCHIORE GOLDASTO, cui nemo Germaniæ rebus illustrandis par fuit, nec forte erit quispiam, & vero illius ductu paulatim cepit apud nos solito exquisitor Reip. cognitio. . . . A man, who deserved so well of his country by publishing the antiquities of Germany, that the Athenians would certainly have maintained him at the public expence, if he had lived at that time. This kind of study (viz. of the public law of Germany) was chiefly encouraged in the beginning of this century, from the example of MELCHIOR GOLDAST, who exceeded every body in illustrating the affairs of Germany, and who taught us a more accurate knowledge of the constitution.' However, he charges him with unfair dealing, in certain respects (18): 'Sunt hæc omnia (examinat nonnulla ex libro III. Constitutionum Imperialium) illaudabili facinore perquam tamen GOLDASTO familiari effecta, quo nomine eum ex merito acerrime increpavit Wendelinus, c. 2. de l. Salica. . . . All these (some things in the third book of the Imperial Constitutions) are counterfeited, by an uncommendable fraud, but very much practised by Goldast; for which Wendelinus, in his second chapter of the Salic law, censures him as he deserves. He is not the only man, that complains of Goldast on that account. 'Qui noverit quam multas suspectæ fidei merces pro veris erudito orbi obtulerit GOLDASTUS, cui cæteroquin diligentæ laudem non negamus, in re cui aliunde fides fieri non potest, vix ejus solius auctoritate sibi aliquid plane persuaderi patietur (19). . . . Whoever is acquainted with the many pieces, of doubtful credit, which GOLDAST has imposed upon the learned world (a man, who otherwise deserves the praise of diligence), will scarce depend upon his single authority in a matter which is capable of no other confirmation.'

[H] We shall see . . . how Scioppius gets off.] Two gentlemen of Franconia, who had boarded with him at Altorf, at Conradus Ritterhusius's house, payed him a visit during their stay at Rome. He enquired after their common friends, and, among the rest, after Goldast, one of their fellow-boarders at Altorf: whereupon they told him, that that wretch had been broke upon the wheel, and afterwards burned, for having committed a horrid murder. 'Eum videlicet superiori anno cum Bullionio Duce, cui interpretis operam dederit, Geneva in Germaniam profectum, cum Argentiniæ in familiaritatem Centurionis cujusdam pervenisset, qui in contubernio suo puellam nobilem, domo paterna abductam pro secutuleia muliere & concubina circumducebat, audito eum jam satietate illius captum mille aureos ei, qui ab illa se liberaret, polliceri, avidè conditionem quod pretio inhieret, arripuisse, & ita digressio Centurione non procul ab urbe in ipsa via regia . . . miscellam obrunasse (20).' He had contracted a friendship, said they, with a certain captain, who began to be weary of a gentlewoman he had carried away from her relations, and who promised a thousand crowns to any one that should rid him of her. Goldast accepted the offer; and, soon after, he murdered that woman in the middle of the high-way near Strasburg, and, having stripped her, returned into the city. He was seized in the inn where he lodged, as he was unripping the cloaths of that woman, and clapped in Goal; and, within seven days, he was sentenced to be broke alive upon the wheel, and burnt.

not without speaking very ill of Goldast. The conduct of the latter, with respect to Justus Lipsius, cannot be approved [1]; for he published under his name an oration, burnt. 'Septimo tandem post die capitis condemnatum & summo supplicio, tanquam parricidam affectum, hoc est membratim pæne rota contusum & comminutum, & inde lignis infelicibus ustulatum' (21). Scioppius immediately wrote down this story, that it might be inserted in the work, which he was then printing in Germany against Scaliger; and he thought he wanted no other apology of revenge against Goldast (22), with respect to the ill office he thought he had received from him: for he pretended, that Goldast had published, under the name of Scioppius, a commentary upon the Priapeia, of which he, Scioppius, was not the author. The letter he wrote, touching that pretended tragical end of Goldast, was followed by another five months after (23), wherein he acquainted his friend, that the story, which the two german gentlemen had told him, concerned a brother of Melchior Goldast. The Sieur Charles Fugger, president of the imperial chamber at Spire, had sent to Scioppius an account of the barbarous action and punishment of that brother of Goldast. This is what he wrote to him: 'Sebastianus Heiminsfeld, dictus Guldenast, natus Cellæ Episcopi in Turgovia die sexta Junii anno 1603, propterea in carcerem conjectus fuit, quod pridie feminam quandam, Dorotheam de Gries, Bambergæ aut Herbipoli, quemadmodum ipse retulit, natam, quam diebus aliquot hac illac circumduxerat, bene mane non longe ab hac civitate priusquam patefacta essent portæ, Satanæ instinctu cultro immaniter obrunxisset, & omni vestitu usque ad lineam intertalam spolasset, ac postquam aliquantum de via regia eam provolverat, in civitatem portis commodum apertis ingressus in hospitium publicum diverteret, ubi & captus mox, factumque quæstioni subiectus, & sponte etiam sua confessus die 10. ejusdem mensis Rotæ supplicio affectus fuit. (24). — Sebastian Heiminsfeld, called Guldenast, born at Bischoffzell in Turgovia the sixth day of June in the year 1603, was imprisoned for the murder of one Dorothea de Gries, born, as he himself said, at Baimberg or Wurtzburg, whom he had carried up and down with him for some days; whose throat he cut, early in the morning, not far from the city before the gates were opened, and stripping her to her shift, and throwing her a little out of the road, returned into the city, and went to an inn, where he was taken, and, having confessed the fact, was broke on the wheel, the tenth day of the same month.' Scioppius learned, not long after, from Jodocus Mezler, vicar to the abbot of St Gall (25), that Melchior Goldast was alive; whereupon he wrote to his friend, that he must not print what he had sent him, concerning the punishment of that man: 'Hoc à te pro amicitia nostra peto, ut si adhuc est integrum illa supplicii de monstro illo sumpti mentio ex Scaligero meo Hypobolymæo circumscribatur. Sin autem, quod veretur, hac ipsa mea epistola ad calcem libri illius adjuncta totius gestæ rei ordinem palam omnibus declarari cupio (26). — I beg of you, by our friendship, if the mention of the punishment of that monster be not yet put to the press, that you would strike it out of my Scaliger Hypobolymæus: but if it be, as I fear it is, I desire that this letter of mine, added at the end of the book, may clear up the whole matter to every body.' This second letter is dated the third of March, 1607, and thereby we may convict the two gentlemen of having mistaken the time: for in the beginning of November 1606 (27), Scioppius wrote to his friend that they had told him, that Goldast had been executed the year before, superiori anno. Now Goldast's brother was broke upon the wheel the tenth of June 1603 (28). They reported also, that, when Goldast murdered the gentlewoman near Strasburg, he travelled through Germany with the duke of Bouillon, whose secretary he was. This does not agree with a letter, which Goldast wrote to Mr Schobinger, his patron, in February 1603 (29). He was no longer with the duke of Bouillon; and yet the murderer of the gentlewoman, being interrogated by his judges in the month of June, 1603, said that Melchior Goldast, his brother, was in the duke of Bouillon's service (30).

[1] Goldast's conduct, with respect to Justus Lipsius, cannot be approved.] Scioppius, who was a great amplifier, was not ashamed to say, at the time he thought that Goldast had been broke upon the wheel, that the principal crime, which had brought that horrid punishment upon him, was his having fathered upon Justus Lipsius a speech, of which he was not the author. 'Hujus ego non minus facti, quam supplicii atrocitatem cum animo meo recogitans, nullius magis sceleris, quam quod orationem illam, de qua Lipsius Cent. IV. Epist. LXVIII. ad consules ac senatum Imperialis oppidi Francofurtensis scribit, ejusdem Lipsii nomine præscriptam minime Helvetica simplicitate, sed actu plusquam Punico & vere Genevensi malitia Turguri edendam curasset, penas ab eo expeditas & sumptas esse judicavi (31). That speech was intitled, De duplici concordia Literarum & Religionis, and was published in 1600. It was pretended, that Justus Lipsius had pronounced it at Lena, the thirty first of July, 1574. It was not printed at Leyden, as the title has it, but at Zurich, by John James Frisius (32). A hundred printed copies of it, being sent to the fair of Francfort, were all bought up by Plantin, who denied that piece to be of Lipsius, and threatened, that both the printer and the true author should repent it (33). The bookseller of Zurich sent an account of these things to Goldast, and desired him to prove, that the speech was made by him, whose name it bore. A professor of Zurich gave Goldast notice of Justus Lipsius's threats, and told him, that the contexture and thread of the speech shewed Lipsius to be the author of it: Nos quidem ex filo orationis conjicimus omnino ejus esse (34). This was the judgment of the learned of Zurich: the taste of those of Paris was quite different; for they did not find in it Lipsius's style. Lipsii oratio nova nobis visa fuit, nec in ea Lipsii stylum sine monitione tua unquam agnovissemus (35). Justus Lipsius's threats were not vain; for he applied himself to the magistrates of Francfort, who ordered that speech to be struck out of the catalogue of their Fair (36). He thanked them for it, and shewed them, by many reasons, the imposture of those who had fathered it upon him. He maintained, among other things, that he was not at Lena the thirty first of July, 1574, and that he was gone from thence the first of March (37). Goldast was covered with shame; for there were few equitable men, who were not persuaded of Lipsius's innocence in that respect.

Inulsum illam, & vix latiale orationem de duplici concordia literarum & religionis Jenæ, ut valunt, habitam, jam olim falsimoniam esse meram, edita epistola ipse ostendit, & nuper supposititii ipsius factus parens Melchior Haiminsfeldus, Goldastus se prodidit (38). In a late letter, he plainly shewed, that the imposture, and scarce Latin, oration on the double agreement of learning and religion, said to be delivered at Lena, was a mere cheat; and not long ago Melchior Haiminsfeld Goldast discovered himself to be the true father of the foundling. But there are men so obstinate, that they will never own themselves to be in an error, and are proof against the most pregnant reasons. Some men of that temper did obstinately maintain, that Lipsius had pronounced the oration, which Goldast ascribed to him. Read what follows: 'Justi Lipsii nomine (39), de duplici concordia literarum & religionis, editas Orationes (40), non esse ipsius, sed Melchioris Goldasti, Miræus in vita Lipsii pag. m. 67. refert. in his Lipsius Proteus, Frankfurt, 1614. I do not pretend to deny Justus Lipsius's inconsistency in point of religion.

GOLIIUS (JAMES), Mathematic and Arabic professor in the university of Leyden, was born at the Hague in the year 1596, of an ancient and considerable family [A]. He had a strong inclination for learning, and a vast genius; for he not only studied the languages, philosophy, the Greek and Roman antiquities, divinity and physics, but he also studied the mathematics with great application. When he was twenty years of age, he left the university of Leyden, where he had made a great proficiency, and retired to a country-house (a), being resolved to spend two years there, without minding any thing but his studies; but, following them too hard, he soon fell sick, and was obliged to desist. He was so taken with the works and lectures of the learned Erpenius (b), that he followed him entirely. He took a journey into France with the dukes de la Trimouille, which occasioned his being called to Rochelle to teach Greek. He did not long enjoy (c) that employment; for the civil-wars, which ended in the taking of that town, made Golius desirous to return to Holland. Not long after (d) he followed the ambassador, whom the States sent to the king of Morocco; and made a good use of the advice given him by Erpenius [B], to get an entire knowledge of the Arabic tongue. He seemed so curious and well-informed of the sciences and customs of the Arabians, that he rendered himself very acceptable to the learned and courtiers. He also received several marks of favour from Muley Zidas, king of Morocco [C]. He furnished himself with several books unknown to the Europeans; and, amongst others, with the annals of the kingdom of Fez and Morocco, which he resolved to translate. He also made a great many collections concerning the history of the Serifs. By these means he brought to Erpenius a thousand valuable things, which had been of great use to that learned professor, had not a contagious disease swept him away a short time after. Golius, not considering the danger to which he exposed himself, did his dear master all the good offices imaginable during his sickness, and attended him till he expired. He was chosen his successor in the professorship of the Arabic (e), according to the advice, which the deceased had given some time before his death; and he so learnedly discharged his employment, that the incomparable Erpenius was not missed (f). But, whilst he so well satisfied others, he was not satisfied with himself; for he thought many things were wanting in him, which he could never acquire but in visiting such places as were near the fountain-head. He therefore asked his superiours

[A] He was of an ancient and considerable family. It came originally from Leyden, where FRANCIS GOLIIUS, great-grandfather of him we now speak of, was an alderman, about the year 1458. CORNELIUS and GILBERT GOLIIUS, his grandsons, were senators of the same city. They were sons of THEODORIC GOLIIUS, who, having married two or three wives, procured to his descendants several degrees of relation with a great many good families. Another THEODORIC GOLIIUS, son to the former, was father of our James. He enjoyed a considerable employment (1), and was one of the burghers of Leyden, who contributed most to preserve the city, during the siege so famous in history. His wife, the mother of our professor, was called Anne Hemelar (2), and had a brother, for whom I design an article (3), wherein I shall speak of PETER GOLIIUS, brother of James.

[B] He made good use of the advice given him by Erpenius. He charged him, amongst other things, to enquire into the origin of certain proverbs, and upon what custom, or inclination of the people, were grounded several Arabic words or expressions, which he understood only by conjectures; and which he thought he might have got well explained, if he had been in the country, where that language is spoken. But let us make use of the description, which we find of all this, in the book I quote: 'Intellexerat (Erpenius) unum sibi deesse quod terras, in quibus viget atque in usu habetur Arabismus, non incoluisset, non accessisset. Quam enim multa in promptu haberet verba, proverbia, vocabula, quæ quid significarent, divinabat magis & suspicabatur quam noverat, quod de rerum formis, hominum actionibus, locorum ha-

[C] He received several marks of favour from Muley Zidan, king of Morocco. He had brought to him a letter from Erpenius, very well written, and had very luckily recommended himself by his agreeable carriage. Nec privata tantum humanitate, sed & Imperatoris ipsius Mulei Zidani, (quam & literis Erpenii purissimo sermone scriptis, & suo lepore atque honestate promeruerat) clementia, cumulatissime præstitit (5). This is all we find thereupon in his funeral oration. We may add to it a very curious supplement, taken out of a relation in manuscript, which Colomies had perused, and of which he has published something that concerns Golius. I transcribe the whole passage, tho' thereby I fall into the troublesome necessity of repeating something of what is to be seen in Moreri's dictionary. 'Mr Golius, whom I saw at Leyden, where he was an Arabic professor in the room of Mr Erpenius, was very learned in the languages, and in the mathematics; but his wit was superiour to his learning. He got great credit by the voyage he made into the Levant in the year 1622, and particularly to Morocco, with an ambassador from the States, and a gentleman of the horse belonging to the prince of Orange. Being come to that city, they went to pay their respects to the king, who was called Mouly Zidan, and who received them, with their presents, very graciously.

leave to make a voyage into the Levant (g). He stayed a year and a half at Aleppo; after which he travelled into Arabia and Mesopotamia, and came by land to Constantinople. His learning and prudence procured him, every where, both friends, and what was necessary to make his travels amongst those barbarous nations turn to account. He met with Turks, who gave him leave to search into fine libraries (D). In a word, he left so good a name behind him, that it was very useful to his brother (b), who some time after undertook the same voyage. Our Golius returned four years after to Leyden, with a fine collection of manuscripts, and the remembrance of many curious things (i). Having re-assumed the thread of his former lectures, he soon saw himself called to make some of another nature [E]; for he was made professor of the mathematics, in the room of Willibrord Snellius. He very worthily filled these two employments during forty years. And, although they might take up the whole time of a laborious man, yet he found leisure to compose some valuable works, which have been published [F]; and to undertake others, which would not have come short of graciously. He shewed himself particularly well pleased with the present, which Mr Erpenius had sent him, and which was a great Atlas, and a New Testament in Arabic, in which he read often afterwards. The ambassador of the States happening to be uneasy, because he was not dispatched, was advised to present a petition to the king, which Mr Golius drew up in the Arabic character and language, but in the style of the Christians; a thing extraordinary in that country. The king was much surprised at the beauty of that petition, both as to the character, the language, and the style; and having sent for the Talips or writers, he shewed them that petition, which they admired. He called immediately for the ambassador, whom he asked who had drawn up that petition. The ambassador having told him, that it was Mr Golius, disciple and envoy of Mr Erpenius, he had a desire to see him, and spoke to him in Arabic. Mr Golius answered him in Spanish, that he understood very well what he said to him, but that he could not answer him in Arabic, because he could not pronounce the gutturals. The king, who understood Spanish, received his excuse, and having granted the ambassador's petition, caused him to be speedily dispatched. I owe all these particulars to the Relation of the late Mr le Gendre, a merchant of Roan, who happened to be then at Morocco. Mr Briot keeps a copy of it, which he did me the favour to communicate to me at Paris. Let us add one word more concerning Mr Golius. He was brother to Peter Golius, who was also very learned in the oriental languages; who translated from Latin into Arabic the treatise of The Imitation of Jesus Christ of Thomas à Kempis; and who, being turned friar of the order of the bare footed Carmelites, took the name of father Celestine of St Lidwine. These two worthy brothers were nephews to a canon of Antwerp, named Hemelar, who has published a fine book of medals, which is very scarce (6). I with the Mélanges Historiques of Colomies were a volume in Folio.

(D) He met with Turks, who gave him leave to search into fine libraries. The Turks are not so destitute of books as people imagine. See what Dr Spon has related (7), and add to it this passage of Gronovius: Simul cum Legato (8) in Asiam transit (Golius) Præfeto orae propontidos amantissimos hortos cum amplissima Bibliotheca eis cedente: in quo secessu in Historicorum & Geographorum Arabum scripta aut ignorata adhuc, aut involuta se ingurgitavit. Ut rediit, & memoriam lectorum per occasiones in sermonibus apud Megitanas ostendit, ita obfuscescit audientes, ut purpuratorum principis dignatione proximus cum eo egerit, Imperatoris diplomate ornatus ac tutus omne Imperium obiret, ac situs locorum rectius quam vulgo sit in tabulis depingeret: ille gratiam fecit prætexto Sacramento quod Ordinis dixerat, sed & periculi magnitudinem cogitans (9). — He passed over with the ambassador into Asia, the governor of the Propontic coast, giving them the liberty of very fine gardens, and a well-furnished library: in which retirement he buried himself in the study of the Arabian geography and histories, hitherto unheard of, or never perused. Upon his return, recollecting what he had read, occasionally in conversation with the great men, he so astonished his hearers, that he was offered the emperor's commission and safe-guard to travel over the whole empire, and take a more exact, geographical survey of it than had hitherto been done. He declined the offer on the pretence of the oath he had taken to the States, but, in reality, in consideration of the dangers he must have run. This passage deserves to be quoted, since it may acquaint my readers with the particular esteem the Turks had for Golius at Constantinople, and the offers they made him of an authentic commission, whereby he should have been created geographer to the Grand Seigneur. The skill Golius had in physic, and the remedies he gave, without taking any money for them, procured him many presents and friends. They offered him great advantages, to engage him to settle in the Levant. Philarchi & reguli Arabum admiserunt eum familiariter, & ob Medicinæ experimenta suspexerunt, quodque mercedes reculeret donis plurimis & pretiosis affecerunt: majoribus, ut secum maneret, sollicitatum (10). — The princes and governors of the Arabians conversed freely with him, and greatly respected him for his skill in physic; and, as he refused all rewards, they loaded him with many valuable presents, and tempted him with greater to stay among them. These are very glorious things for a Christian.

[E] He soon saw himself called to make some lectures of another nature. I have purposely followed Gronovius's narrative, to convince my readers by an instance how nicely a man ought to examine things, if he would be thoroughly acquainted with what is necessary to clear a fact. This is related in such a manner in the funeral oration, that there is no body but will conclude, that Snellius died after Golius's return; and that Golius was not made professor of mathematics, till after he had discharged for some time the functions of his other employment after his return to Leyden. But whoever believes that, will be in an error. Snellius died in the year 1626, and Golius returned from the Levant in the year 1629, and during his voyage was chosen to succeed Snellius; of which he received the news at Constantinople.

[F] He composed some valuable works, which have been published. He published the History of the Saracens, written by Elmaceus: a work which is partly owing to Erpenius, who had begun the translation of it. That history, Golius completed what was wanting. He published the life of Tamerlane, composed in Arabic by a famous author; as also the Astronomical Elements of Alferganus, to which he added a new version, and learned commentaries. His Lexicon Arabicum is a most exact work (11). He illustrated with notes and additions the Arabic grammar of Erpenius, and added to it several pieces of poetry, taken out of Arabic poets, and chiefly out of Tograi and Ababolla. Tho' he was 54 years old when he began to study the Persian language in good earnest, yet he got such a mastery of it, that he composed a very ample dictionary of it, which was printed at London (12). He could have composed another of the Turkish language. He had such a genius for languages, that, having begun late to learn that of the Chinese, he made such a progress in it, as to be able to read and understand their books. It is no small matter even to know the figures they make use of in writing; for they have near eight thousand of them (13). The Chinese Atlas, to which he made some additions, shews the progress he had made in that language.

of those, if he had lived to put the last hand to them [G]. What is most commendable in his works, is the zeal, with which he applied himself to make his knowledge of the tongues subservient to the propagation of the faith among the infidels [H], and to the comfort of the Christians, who groan under the tyranny of the Mahometans. He had an intercourse of letters with the most learned men of Europe (k); and was very much esteemed by his sovereigns (l). His constitution was so very strong [I], that he always enjoyed a perfect health. He died the twenty eighth of September 1667, after having gone through all the degrees of the university, and being as much esteemed for his virtue and piety, as for his learning. He made a right judgment of things; for he deplored the method, with which disputes about religion are commonly managed [K]. He left two sons, of whom I shall say something in the remarks [L].

[G]... and undertook others, which would not have come short of the former if he had put the last hand to them.] He designed to have published a second edition of the life of Tamerlane, the text of which would have been printed with the vowels; and he would have added to it a translation, and a commentary, full of illustrations on several intricate passages of the oriental history. This work wanted but little of being delivered to the printer. He had begun a geographical and historical dictionary, relating to the countries in the Levant, in quo omnia locorum & hominum per Orientem nomina explicarentur. He had promised a long time a new edition of the Alcoran, with a translation, and a confutation of it. He designed to give a catalogue of all the Persian books, that are in Europe, and a treatise of the dialects of the Persian language. He would chiefly have examined the dialect, which is accounted the best, and which has obtained that title by the most authentic sentence that can be required in that kind of privileges. See the margin (14), where you will find a remarkable passage. Never did the Greeks or Romans, or any of the nations, that have most cultivated learning and eloquence, do so much for their languages, as the kings of Persia: neither the academy della Crusca, and such like it, nor that, of which cardinal Richelieu was the founder, come near that assembly of sages, whom the kings of Persia called together, for the admission or exclusion of words.

[H] He applied himself to make his knowledge of the tongues subservient to the propagation of the faith among the infidels.] We may reckon, for a proof of his zeal, the particular care he took to cause the New Testament to be printed both in literal and and vulgar Greek. The States were pleased to be at that expence in favour of the Grecians. Nemo tanto studio, labore, gratia ob consulas & præturas & imperia contendit omnemque lapidem movit, quam ille ut Novi Fœderis sacratissimæ tabulæ, simul uti scriptæ sunt, simul ut in ἑλληνιστῶν (ut appellant) seu Græcæ linguæ vulgarem tradidit, formis vulgarentur: atque id magnificum atque divinum munus Potentissimorum Liberi Belgii Ordinum beneficio, gemens sub barbaricæ intolerabili iugo genti libertatis & elegantie inventrix acquireret (15). He took care to disperse, among the Christians of the Levant, an Arabic translation of the confession of faith of the reformed, and of their Catechism and Liturgy; for there are Christians in those countries, who make use of the Arabic tongue in divine service. He employed in this translation an Armenian, who understood vulgar Arabic, and such phrases as are consecrated to religion, and who knew how to adapt Golius's style to the capacity of every body: for if Golius alone had made that translation, his expressions might have been too sublime and learned. He entertained that Armenian at his house two years and a half, and promised him the same pension, which the States had granted to the Archimandrite, who turned the New Testament into vulgar Greek. However he did not know whether the States would be at that expence, neither did he propose the thing to them till the work was completed: and then they not only made good his promise, but likewise made him a fine present (16). I shall not defer mentioning what I have to say concerning another present. He was their interpreter in ordinary for the Arabic, Turkish, Persian, &c. tongues; which was worth an annual pension to him. I suppose the functions of that employment gave no great interruption to his other labours; but, as often as they had occasion for him in that capacity, they treated him with great civility, and upon a time presented him with a gold chain, and a very fine medal (17).

[I] His constitution was very strong.] He had preserved himself sound by a constant temperance, and forbearance of voluptuousness (18). At the age of seventy years, he walked on foot all the space of ground, which is between the Maë and the Wahal, at a place, where he was forced to march fourteen hours (19).

[K] He deplored the method, with which disputes about religion are commonly managed.] These are the expressions of the author of his funeral oration: 'Religionem, perinde ut rempublicam, factionibus geri dolebat. Speciem quandam externam sibi circumdedit multis sufficere, quam vita & actiones confutarent. Inter dissentientes, de mediis quoque rebus atque indifferentibus, nullam turpem rationem vincendi: calumnias, artes malas, pias fraudes vigere. Nusquam moderata consilia, zelum, qui furor sit, vocari. Partim Scripturam S. tractare potius ut ingenium inde quam salutis curam nutriant. Theologice præferre, ut nomen scientiæ atque auctoritatis. Ergo missa in discrimen veritate, quamvis satis & excellenter doctos esse consilet, tam secure de illa transigere. Hos in Theologia philosophari, ad disputandum modo, atque ut magni & conspecti sint, Theologos (20) — He was grieved, that religion, no less than the state, was carried on by factions, that many were satisfied with an outward show, which their lives and actions confuted; that, among disputants, even about indifferent matters, no way of obtaining the victory was thought scandalous; that calumny, base arts, and pious frauds flourished; that moderate counsels were no where to be found, and that what is rage was called zeal; that the scripture was handled more to exercise the wit, than to provide for salvation; that divinity was professed only as carrying the name of science and authority; that truth was in danger whilst its advocates, however learned, were careless of its interests; and that they philosophized in religion chiefly for the sake of disputation, and acquiring the reputation of eminent divines. This is one of the five or six reflexions, that Gronovius has selected, among many others, which Golius was heard to make during his last sickness (21). All men of sense will agree, that his choice is judicious; for, of all things in the world, the abuses here in question deserve most to be deplored: yet, nevertheless, people are so hardened, and so little affected with that disorder, that we ought to conclude, that none but persons of an exquisite judgment can think, in that matter, as our professor did. The church is divided into factions and cabals, just like commonwealths: into factions, I say, which either triumph, or are oppressed, just as in commonwealths: not in proportion to the goodness or badness of the cause, but in proportion to the great or little use people can make of all manner of devices (22). Such a church is certainly an object of compassion, and a matter of affliction. Another thing, which Gronovius has collected, is, in my opinion, very judicious. Golius, who had lived so long, seen so much, travelled so far, had found nothing more scarce than a Christian worthy of that name. He had seen mankind every where plunged in vice, every where in disguise (23). Travellers observe an infinite variety amongst men: in a day they are transported into another country, where they find another language, other habits, other customs; but notwithstanding those infinite variations, all nations are alike, and agree in this, that there are but few honest men every where, and that forbidden pleasures are commonly practised.

[L] He left two sons, of whom I shall say something in the remarks.] They both studied the civil-law, and were admitted advocates. The elder was called Theodore,

He was also deputed to the college of the admiralty at Amsterdam. He died in the year 1679, being then burgomaster. His brother MATTHEW GOLIUS, a very honest and most learned gentleman, dean of the court of Holland, died at the Hague in Sept. 1702. Their mother was of a very good family (24). She lived twenty four years very lovingly with her husband (25).

GOLIUS (THEOPHILUS) professor of Ethics at Strasburg, where he was born in the year 1528 (a), and died in the year 1600 (b). He composed in Latin an Abridgment of Ethics, taken from the ten books of Aristotle ad Nichomachum, and an Abridgment of Politics, taken from the same Aristotle. He dedicated the first of these two works to Baron de Tanberg, the first of September 1592. My edition of them both is of Strasburg, typis Josiæ Ribellii hæredum 1621 in 8°. I have not seen his Greek Grammar. Mr König mentions it (c).

GOMARUS (FRANCIS), professor of divinity, was born at Bruges the thirtieth of January, 1563. His father and mother, who had embraced the Protestant religion, retired into the Palatinate, in the year 1578, in order to profess it quietly, and caused him to study at Strasburg under the famous John Sturmius. He was under the discipline of that good old man about three years; after which, he went to pursue his studies at Newshad, whither the professors of Heidelberg were retired (a). He took a journey into England towards the end of the year 1582, and heard, at Oxford, the lectures in divinity of John Raynolds, and, at Cambridge, those of William Whitaker. He took his bachelor's degree in the month of June 1584. He spent the two following years at Heidelberg (b), where the university had been restored. The Dutch congregation at Francfort called him to be their pastor in the year 1587, and enjoyed his ministry from that time till 1593, when they were entirely dispersed by persecution. He was called to Leyden, to be professor of divinity, in the year 1594. He accepted that offer; but before he went to take possession of his place, he went to Heidelberg, to take his doctor's degree. He exercised quietly that professorship, till he had for his colleague James Arminius, in the year 1603, a man, who soon broached his Pelagian tenets [A], and made himself the head of a party in the university. Gomarus stood up against him with great zeal, not only in the schools of Leyden, but also in the presence of the states of the province. They two disputed twice in the assembly of the states of Holland, in the year 1608, which was continued by five against five the following year. The success of these disputes was not such as the churches wished (c); but nevertheless it served for something, to wit, to discover Arminius's Pelagianism. That professor, who was sick, made use of that excuse to break off the conferences, and died some time after. His adversaries employed all their industry to hinder Vorstius from succeeding him; but not being able to effect it, it happened that Gomarus, to avoid having such a colleague, resigned his post, and retired to Middleburg, in the year 1611. He was minister there, and made public lectures, till the year 1614, when he was called by the academy of Saumur to be professor of divinity. He exercised that employment four years; after which he retired to Groningen, to be, there, first divinity and Hebrew professor. Here he found a fixed station, to which he firmly stuck till his death, that is, till the eleventh of January 1641. If he absented himself twice, it was not to allow himself any relaxation, but to be one of the judges of Arminius's cause in the synod of Dort (d), and to revise the translation of the Old Testament (e). He married three wives, and had children only by the second [B]. He was a very learned man, particularly in the oriental languages. His works were printed at Amsterdam, in folio, in the year 1645 (f) [C]. If it be true, that he answered Barnevelt,

(a) The elector Palatine had driven them away, because they were not Lutherans.

(b) The elector Lewis, persecutor of the Reformed, being dead, in 1583, prince Casimir his brother had the administration of the electorate, and restored the Reformed.

[A] It was not long before Arminius spread his Pelagian tenets. I advance this, as a translator of him, who composed Gomarus's life (1); though, for the rest, I do not pretend to warrant he is in the right: for I know, that Arminius did not own his opinions to be like those of Pelagius, nor even like those of the Semi-Pelagians. See Grotius's treatise, intitled, Disquisitio an Pelagiana sint ea dogmata quæ nunc sub eo nomine traduntur. It is in the third volume of his theological works. See also one of his letters (2). When therefore you read, in Gomarus's life, that this advantage, at least, resulted from the conferences held with the Arminians, that they were manifestly convicted of teaching Pelagius's tenets (3), do not presently believe, that they were forced to own that, and that the judges of the conference pronounced, that they had been sufficiently convicted of it. The terms of that author ought to signify no more, than that Gomarus pretended he had produced good proofs for his charge against Arminius.

[B] He had children only by his second wife. She was called Mary Leremite, and was a gentlewoman both by her father's and mother's side. He married her at Francfort (4), and had by her one son, and two daughters. The son died before his father, and left children behind him. The younger daughter was married to David de la Haie, minister of a Walloon church. This remark, and several others of this nature, which will be found in this dictionary, are made in favour of many good souls, which are known to be very inquisitive about the relations of pastors and learned men. If there be readers, that care little for these things, as undoubtedly there are but too many, they are desired to remember, that an author is not obliged to say nothing but what they like; for, in a work like this, a man is obliged to please, sometimes one sort of people, sometimes another. Let this be said once for all.

[C] His works were printed at Amsterdam, in folio, in the year 1645. That is, several treatises, which had been published at divers times, were collected into one volume. His Anti-Costerus was printed in the year 1599, and in 1600. His Lyra Davidis was published a long while before his death. Lewis Capel wrote against that work. * Non ita pridem vir Cl. & Doctiss. thus Rivet speaks (5), Franciscus Gomarus Psalmos,

(4) He had also married his first wife in the same city. He married the third at Middleburg; wherefore it should not have been said, in the first Tome of the Anti, pag. 125, that he married at Leyden, before he went to Middleburg.

‘edidit Lyram Davidis, in qua putavit se ad metra Horatiana & similia Davidis Plalmorum versus ita exegisse, ut veram poetices Hebraice rationem inveniret. Sed Ludovicus Capellus animadversionum libello totum illud D. Gomari opus obelo transfigere conatus est, ut inde lector discat vix inter doctos de eo posse convenire, neque labore parum utili se ultra figat. — Not long ago, Francis Gomarus published his Lyra Davidis, in which he had so reduced the verses of David's Psalms to the metres of Horace and others, that he thought he had found out the true measure of the Hebrew poetry. But Lewis Capel, in a book of remarks, endeavoured to overthrow that whole work of Gomarus; whence the reader may see, that even learned men cannot agree among themselves in that point, and may learn not to tire himself with a fruitless labour.’

[D] If it be true that be answered Barneveldt, as Grotius relates, one cannot excuse his great prepossession. Barneveldt made a short speech to those two antagonists before the states of Holland, wherein he declared, he thanked God, that those controversies did not concern the fundamental articles of the Christian religion. Whereupon Gomarus, having obtained leave to speak, protested, that be would not appear before the throne of GOD with Arminius's errors. We find this particular in Grotius's letters (6). It is also to be found in the preface, that was printed before the acts of the synod of Dort. I question whether there be, now-a-days, any sticklers for Gomarus, so passionate, as to maintain, that he had reason to answer Barneveld as he did. The heat of dispute, and the untoward influence of professorial emulation, made him strain things too high, and confounded his judgment. For now-a-days the most rigid Calvinists do not scruple to own, that the five articles of the Remonstrants are no fundamental heresies; and they give sufficiently to understand, that the schism might soon be made up, if the conduct of Arminius was not fallen into new errors, a thousand times more pernicious than those, which set Gomarus and Arminius against one another. Therefore those, whose heads have not been heated by the personal quarrels, which exasperated Gomarus, do not believe, like him, that a man shall eternally be damned for believing the five articles of the Arminians. It is therefore to a personal animosity that we must impute the untoward opinion of that adversary of Arminius

The untoward opinion of that adversary of Arminians, that No body may contradict what I advance, I am going to produce a proof, which, though founded only on a single witness, has yet all the force of a good confutation; since that witness is no other than Mr Irenæus, the most intractable man in the world, with respect to the Arminians. Mr Arnauld thought he wrote an unanswerable book against the Protestant dissenters, when he published his Remercement de la sainte Église. He grounded all his proofs on the tenets of the Synod of Dort, and supposed, that so great an assembly would not have enforced the profession of those upon whom excommunication, if they had not done upon them as fundamental. Mr Jurieu answered him a hundred good things, and confounded him by maintaining to him, that that synod had looked upon, as articles necessary to salvation, which were in question in the disputes of the Remonstrants. He said, in particular, touching that of the Luthers, one of the chief points of the dispute, since the decision of the synod, the Lutherans any other communion, are free, either to de-not to admit that tenet. I say, they are free not but that men always sin, when they reject sacred, important, and clearly established by as that is. But we do not hold it to be such excludes from grace, and destroys faith (8).
 Irenæus, that those, who live in the communion of the Remonstrants, are at liberty not to submit to the decision of the synod of Dort in that to have particular sentiments about that do not take upon them to dogmatize and
 : and that, though such ministers, as go the perseverance of true saints, are not send the pulpit, and are even driven from the Calvinists, yet the latter do not therebanish them from the body of JESUS

For the rest, if we may credit the English author of some letters published by the Arminians, Gomarus was a very passionate man. See the letters of those gentlemen, in the pages 548, 565, &c. This emboldens me the more to reject the temerity and malicious conjecture of those, who would pretend, that he did not believe, that Arminius's tenets did lead to hell; tho' he affirmed it, to justify the opposition he made against those tenets: for he had reason to fear, that the states of Holland would tell him, that it was not worth the while to make such a noise, if Arminius's opinions did not hinder people from being saved. The best answer, that could be made to that objection, was, to say, that one could not stir too much, nor implore with too much ardour the authority of the magistrates, against those doctrines, since they were sufficient to cast into hell all such, as should suffer themselves to be infected with them. Grotius observes, that Gomarus, in a conversation they had together about the Arminian controversies, called Arminius's opinions profane and impious, and inveighed against him, but without saying any thing about predestination. 'Cum multa acriter in Arminium deceret, impiaque & profanas vocaret ipsius opiniones, tamen de predestinatione vix quicquam locutus est. Sed primum in illam maxime sententiam invecsus est, quæ justificationis obiectum aut materiam statuit fidem, iustitiam autem Christi causam meritorum justificationis ejus quæ est ex fide

(10). He principally insisted on the matter of justification; though most members of the states of Holland had determined, that, as to that point, the dispute of Gomarus and Arminius was almost nothing but a dispute of words (11). If there was artifice in not insisting much upon predestination, it was also an artifice to insist upon it; which second artifice was that of Arminius. He took notice, that the tenet of absolute reprobation might easily bear an odious construction; and that his doctrine, as to that point, was more plausible and popular; wherefore he shewed himself on that fair side (12). It is the general custom of pleaders; they always show the fair side of the cause. Mark well what Grotius relates, at the end of that letter. Uytenbogaard had foreseen, even from the year 1608, the success of those disputes, (viz.) that Calvin's doctrine should triumph in Holland, as it triumphed at Geneva in the time of Calasio, a man who was so severely persecuted, and reduced to such straits, as to be obliged to turn wood-cleaver to get a livelihood. 'Cum tantis præjudiciis res agatur, & singulares Doctorum opiniones, in mentes discipulorum semel irreperentes, atque auditu temporis, & alius tunc inquirendi negligentia ac specie, tacito Ecclesiæ consensu receptæ, liberam magnorum ingeniorum sedulitatem auctoritate sua jugulent, neque minus in Ecclesiis, quam in aliis confessions vincat majorem pars meliorem, non alium fæ eventum rerum Arminianarum sperare, quam Castellionis fuerit, qui pressus impotentia adversariorum eo redactus sit, ut vir non in doctus & perpetuæ famæ ligando sibi victum quæret (13). — When parties run so high, and the particular opinions of doctors, insensibly creeping into the minds of the scholars, and, through length of time, and a neglect of inquiring further, being received with a tacit consent of the church, baffle, by their authority, the free enquiries of learned men; and when, no less in the church, than in other assemblies, the greater part conquers the better, the Arminians can expect no other event of things, than was Cassiodorus's, who, through the persecution of his adversaries, was reduced, though a learned man, and desirous of perpetual fame, to get his living by cleaving wood.

E] Meurhus has led Moreri into some mistakes, who has placed (14) Gomarus's birth in the year 1562, and, said, he went into England before he went to Germany. These two faults are easily perceived. One reads the narrative I have given, which is, without comparison, better than that, which Mr. Moreri has followed; since it is taken out of a book, written at Groningen, where Gomarus was a professor twenty two years: out of a book, I say, composed of Gomarus's death, and with the help of more memoirs, than those, which John Meurhusius has used.

shameful [F]. They have most of them been marked in the edition of Holland. I forgot to say, that Scaliger had no great esteem for our Gomarus [G].

[F] The faults Moreri has committed of himself are shameful. He says, that Gomarus's father carried him into England. Meursius says no such thing; and the author of the lives of the professors of Groningen says expressly the contrary: to wit, that Gomarus's father retired into the Palatinate, and sent his son to Strasbourg. Moreri pretends, that Arminius taught a particular doctrine at Leyden, when Gomarus was called thither; which is a great anachronism: for Gomarus had been ten years a professor at Leyden, when Arminius began to teach there. But the most strange mistake of our author, and the most inexcusable in a French priest, who ought to think himself called to the conversion of the Huguenots, is, the having believed, that the tenet of Irresistible and Inamissible Grace, was an error, into which Gomarus fell, by being carried somewhat too far by his passion. What a profound ignorance is this! Is it not a doctrine, which has ever obtained in the communion of Geneva, from Calvin to this present time? If Gomarus differed from the rest, it was in his explaining himself harshly, according to the hypothesis of the Supralapsarians. See the advice that Vossius gave him (16).

[G] Scaliger had no great esteem for our Gomarus. Read this passage of the Scaligerana. 'If any body should ask Gomarus and Snellius, whether this age will produce greater men than the preceding, they will undoubtedly answer, yes; because they think themselves to be the most learned. Gomarus is of Bruges: that is the reason he is learned. He has a fine library, and a great many Ramists: for he is a great analytic, which is the mark of a Ramist. He thinks himself the most learned divine. He has no more skill in chronology, than I in coining false money (17).'

GOMBAULD (JOHN OGIER DE), one of the best French Poets of the XVIIth century, was born in Xaintonge, at St Just de Lussac, near Broüage (a). One may see in Moreri's Dictionary, that he not only was admitted into the French academy, from the beginning of the institution of that society, but likewise that he was one of the little assembly of wits, which preceded that institution, and occasioned the foundation of that illustrious academy. One may see, in the same dictionary, some other curious things concerning Mr Gombauld, which I shall not repeat, contenting myself to mention such passages as are not to be found there. Therefore I shall say, that he was a Protestant [A], a gentleman, and a younger son by a fourth marriage, as he used to say in jest, to excuse himself for not being rich. That he was tall, well shaped, and looked like a man of quality. That his piety was sincere, his probity above slander, and his life unblameable. That he had a noble and upright soul, a lofty mind, less fruitful than judicious; a quick, fiery, and passionate temper, tho' he seemed to be grave and composed. That, after he had studied most sciences at Bourdeaux, under the best masters, he came to Paris, about the latter end of the reign of Henry the great, where he was soon known and esteemed (b). He was none of the last, nor the meanest of those, who made verses on the death of that great monarch (c). He was very much esteemed by Mary de Medicis, and no man of his condition had a freer access to, or was more kindly received by her. She allowed him a pension of twelve hundred Crowns. And, being as great an enemy to needless expences, as he loved to live handsomely, and to spend what was necessary, he raised a pretty considerable stock out of what he saved, whilst he was in plenty; which proved very beneficial to him, when the civil and foreign wars lessened, and at last dried up, the springs,

[A] He was a Protestant. This is what the continuators of Moreri have not mentioned: perhaps they were ignorant of it: but perhaps also they would not have mentioned it, though they had known it. However it be, such an omission is a fault; for, unless we see in an historical dictionary, printed in France, and composed by Roman Catholics, that an author did not profess the established religion, we are apt to suppose, that he did profess it, especially if we find (1), that he was in honourable posts, such as to be a member of an academy of wits, founded by a cardinal, who was first minister of state: that he was appointed to examine and settle the statutes of that new society; and that he furnished memoirs concerning them. Therefore, to prevent the reader's imagining, that Gombauld was a Roman Catholic, it should have been expressly said, that he was not so, but a Huguenot; though, if they pleased, they might have added their reflexions as to his misfortune in that respect. The books, that author published, were little proper to let the world know, that he was a good Protestant; but this has sufficiently appeared by some posthumous treatises, printed in Holland, in the year 1678. They are, Discourses about religion; and these Gombauld esteemed more than any of his other works. He had composed them out of a mere motive of charity, with a design to make the truth known to those, that were in an error, and to confirm, in the sound belief, those that were born in it, or had embraced it. He commonly complained of two things: first, that the generality of those, that wrote about these matters, made too voluminous books, wherein they heap'd proofs upon proofs, and authorities upon authorities, without much minding either order or clearness. And secondly, that they persuaded themselves, that learning and elegance were incompatible. To shew, that they were mistaken in that, he composed his considerations on the Christian religion, when he was yet in the vigour of his age; and shewed indeed, that a man may be at once nervous and clear, concise and full, solid and elegant: Having communicated that piece to several of his friends, and even to some of the Romish communion, it was approved and valued by all, which encouraged him to write afterwards the treatise of the Eucharist; and another, which he addresses to one of his friends, under the name of Aristander. As for the letters, he wrote them when he was more advanced in years, except that to a student of divinity, which bears almost the same date with the considerations on the Christian religion. His greatest passion was to publish these writings, because he was persuaded, that they would be useful; and perhaps few lay-men expressed so much zeal for the glory of GOD, and so much love for their neighbours, as he did. The serenity of his zeal appears by his books; but, if it be considered that he had scarce any thing to live upon but what he received from the court, it will be no wonder, if he did not publish them in his life-time. In order to prevent the loss of them after his death, if they should fall into the hands of persons of a different religion from his, he put them, in his latter years, into the hands of one of his old friends, whose faithfulness and affection were well known to him, and made him promise not to part with them, and to get them printed as soon as he should find an occasion for it (2). One may easily perceive,

' springs, which afforded him a plentiful maintenance. At first, his pension was brought ' down from twelve hundred crowns to eight hundred, and from eight hundred to four ' hundred, where it rested till his death; nor was he paid, ever since the war of Paris,
' but by the good offices of some potent and generous persons [B], to whom he had ' the honour to be known, and by whom he was protected, among whom the duke and ' dukes of Montausier ought to be first named. He was also for some years gratified ' with a pension by Mr Seguier, chancellor of France. He always enjoyed a good ' health, to which his frugality and oeconomy did very much contribute. But, one day,
' as he was walking in his chamber, which he used to do, he fell, and got such a hurt
' in his hip, that, ever after this accident, he was forced to keep his bed the greatest ' part of the time, till he died, being almost an hundred years old, if a date, written
' with his own hand in one of the books of his closet, was the true time of his birth; as zealous. Gombauld had nothing to maintain himself, but the pension he received from the court of France; nor could he be paid, but by using the interest of a great man to overcome a thousand difficulties. That great man's credit would have been ineffectual, if Gombauld had published books of controversy; and consequently the publishing of them would have reduced the author to great straits. Were it not therefore too rigid a thing, to condemn his cautious prudence, and to think it strange, that he should put off the impression of those books till after his death? How many people would have laughed at him, if he had lost his pension for having published his controversial treatises? They would have said, that he strained charity; and that, since he wanted his pension more than his brethren wanted his books, he should have moderated his zeal, and contented himself with being a posthumous author. This ingenious epigram of the poet Gombauld is very judicious.

Plaise au Roi me donner cent Livres,
Pour acheter Livres & vivres:
De Livres je m'en passerois,
Mais de vivres je ne scaurois (3).

(3) See Gueret, pag. m. 171, of La Guerre des Auteurs.

Give me, great monarch, pounds five score,
For meat and books . . . I ask no more.
Or . . . keep the books, and give me meat . . .
For some folks read, but all folks eat.

[B] His pension was brought down . . . to eight hundred crowns, and then to four hundred . . . nor was he paid . . . but by the good offices of some generous persons.] There were two inconveniencies in it; for such a successive decrease of a pension must needs very much distress and vex a wit: besides, Gombauld was obliged to make many visits, and to be troublesome to others, and fatigue himself to get that small part he was reduced to. How often was he obliged to have recourse to the intercession of the Muses, and to extort some verses from them, in order to soften the intendants of the Finances, or to beg recommendations, or to thank those, who had been moved at last with the pathetic description of his necessity? If you read the best poets, you will find in them many such verses. But, though Gombauld was in very sad circumstances, his condition was still less deplorable than that of many other wits, who were always sent away with empty hands. No man was ever more liberal to them, than cardinal Richelieu; his ministry was a golden age for the French Muses: but his death was like a dreadful storm of hail, that falls upon a plentiful crop; which is rather to be ascribed to the confusions, in which the kingdom happened to be involved, than to the different genius and inclinations of those, who succeeded him. The pensions were suppressed, lessened, or ill paid; which made many people murmur and sigh. I shall only mention Scudery's complaints, which are to be found in the verses he composed upon Scarron's Virgil Travesty.

Quand tu souffres qu'on te voye,
Tu ressuscites ma joye;
Tu rétablis ma raison:
De l'humeur qui m'assassine,
Ton livre est la medecine,
Et le seul contre-poison.

Je te jure par Hercule, (Serment de l'antiquité) Que ton Heros ridicule
M'a presque effuscié.
Aussi pour ses assistances, J'appends comme des potences,
Et mes chagrins, & mes soins:
Et tout ce qu'un miserable
De l'Esperance inexorable, Endure & souffre le moins.
J'appends (dis-je) dans le Temple
De VIRGILE TRAVESTY, Mille chagrins sans exemple,
Dont je me trouve investy:
Oüy, par ce grotesque Énée, J'incague la Destinée
Qui me met à l'abandon:
Et j'offre mon Ordonnance, Et mes Brevets sans finance
A la burlesque Didon (4).

When you appear, again I live, Reason returns, my joys revive:
Thy book's my humour's sole relief,
The counter poison of my grief.

By Hercules, renown'd in war, (Oath of antiquity) I swear, Thy hero travesty'd has stole
The secret anguish of my soul.
For this I'll hang up all my cares,
My disappointed hopes, and fears,
All that I feel of grief and misery
From an inexorable treasury.

I to temple I will hang 'em high,
Offerings to VIRGIL TRAVESTY.
Be but grotesque Æneas by,
My destiny I dare defy.
My unpaid pension freely I do
Here dedicate to burlesque Dido.

We may therefore conclude, that Gombauld was none of those, who were in the worst circumstances: he only lost two thirds of his pension, and he received the third part for a great many years, by taking care to implore the assistance of his patrons. He died a Jubilant pensioner, and more than a Jubilant one (5); for the yearly gratifications he received lasted about fifty years. A very remarkable circumstance: for if the court of France does readily grant pensions, and pays them punctually during the first years; it is as ready to take them off, and to convert the funds, upon which they are assigned, into more pressing uses. New-comers crowd in daily, and the court is willing to satisfy them without new expences; that is, by applying to them what has already served for others, who are supposed to have enjoyed it long enough. The old pensioners are the most odious; they are obliged to ask with the greatest and most submissive patience, and are denied with the least scruple.

[C] He died, being almost an hundred years old . . . he had imparted his age to a friend as a secret.] What an odd thing is this! A man of good morals, and drawing-room of Mary de Medicis, and Anne of Austria, during the regency of those two princesses. But he was still more careful to go to Rambouillet-house (d) [D], and he did it with more pleasure. He died in the year 1666. I shall put in one single remark what I have to say concerning his writings, and what the best judges have thought of them [E].

zealous for his religion, makes a mystery of the year of his birth: he reveals, with much ado, this great secret to a friend; but, at the same time, he so earnestly in-treats him to say nothing of it, that his friend thinks himself obliged to be silent about it, till after the death of his confidant. One could scarce bear this in a maid or a widow, though no body takes it ill, that they should be desirous to conceal their age (6). But this, and a thousand other instances shew, that what seems to be a meer oddness, an extravagant weakness, and an old woman's childishness, is nevertheless grounded upon a reason, that is specious, and has a kind of solidity. Gombauld was not a sorry rhimer, or a meer versifier: he was an excellent poet, and had been very much esteemed by persons of the greatest quality (7). He had constantly attended the assemblies of the ladies, and consequently he had got the habit of gallant conversation. When he happened to be among women, he still remembered the stile he used in his youth; he praised them, he flattered them. He could still act the part of a wit, and of a gallant; but, to perform that part with a greater decorum, it was necessary, that they should know nothing of his great age. He printed a large collection of epigrams in 1657; and therefore he might have feared, that, if people should come to know that he was ninety years old, they would think it strange, that he should desire a licence for such a book, and present his friends with it. He might have feared, that Mr Daillé, and the other ministers of Paris, would censure him for minding still such trifling things at an age so far advanced. However, he is not the only man, who has been guilty of such a weakness: we shall see hereafter (8) another instance of it in a grammarian, stuffed with Greek, who should have been more free from it than a court-poet.

[D] He went carefully to Rambouillet-house. The author of the preface calls it, The charming place, whither all the persons of quality and merit of that time used to resort (9). It was, says he, a kind of a contracted and choice court, less numerous, but, if I dare say so, more exquisite than that of the Louvre; because none was allowed to come near that temple of honour, where virtue was revered under the name of the incomparable Arctice, but such as deserved her approbation and esteem.

[E] I shall put in one remark what I have to say concerning his writings, and what the best judges have thought of them. The history of the French Academy (10) informs us, that, in 1652, Gombauld had not yet published the tragedy; intitled, The Danaides, nor the tragi-comedy, intitled, Cydippe, nor three books of epigrams, nor many other poems, and letters and discourses in prose; but that his Endymion, and his Amarante a pastoral, and a volume of poems, and a volume of letters, were printed. The abbot de Marolles observes, in a book he published in the year 1657, that Mr Gombauld had lately put out an excellent collection of epigrams (11); and (12) that his A-conce (13), and his immortal Danaides, wherein there are such fine verses, were not as yet printed. We find, in the preface to the posthumous treatises, that the tragedy of the Danaides has been printed, and that the author left not only a tragi-comedy of Cydippe, but also wherewithal to make a new collection of verses, especially of sonnets and epigrams, which have not yet seen the light, because they are in the hands of some persons, who have little knowledge of these sorts of things. Note, that the Endymion is written in prose:

It was printed in 1624, and reprinted in 1626. It is a kind of a romance.

The critics are divided in their opinions about his poetry. Some pretend, that he excelled in the making of sonnets; and that it was his lot and the share of Parnassus which fell to him. Let us mind such things as we have a natural genius for (they are Gue-re's words (14); let us keep to that kind of work, for which we have a talent: we must not envy the glory of those, whom we cannot imitate. Let Desportes write elegies, Theophile stanzas, Gombauld sonnets, and Maynard epigrams: others extend Gombauld's dominion farther: they will have it, not only that he reigned over the sonnets, but also that he conquered the empire of the epigrams over Maynard. 'Gombauld, the great Casuist, and law-giver of the country, caused very pretty sonnets to come from the island of the same name. He drew also from the Epigram-matic Mountains three troops of light-horfe of a small size; but which fought with a wonderful quickness, and had very dangerous darts, which they shot with an admirable dexterity. He had made use of them to dismember the principality, which pre-sident Menard had usurped before (15).' The abbot de Marolles is contented to place Menard, Bautre, and Gombauld, among the French poets, with whom our Neighbours cannot dispute the pre-eminence, as to epigrams, and who are little inferior to the ancients (16). Mr Boileau does not at all value the sonnets of our poet.

Here follows the judgment of another critic, which I shall set down in M. Baillet's own words (18).

'M. Rousseau says *, that few poets have, in their latter days, applied themselves to epigrams, which are commonly made up of such turns and flashes of wit, as become rather a young man than a poet worn out, and far advanced in years. But he adds, that Mr Gombauld may be excused for having done it in the latter part of his life, because most of his epigrams are rather a censure upon the lives and corrupt manners of his time, than gallant verses made for the ladies.' Mr Rousseau supposes what is very uncertain, that Gombauld's epigrams were the last work that he applied himself to. It is a very doubtful thing, to say no worse; for, though they are the last book of poetry published by Gombauld (19), he might have composed them in his youth (20).

GONTAUT (ARMAND DE) baron de Biron (§ a), was made a marshal of France in the year 1577. He had been great master of the ordonnance from the fifth of November 1569; and, before that, he had gone through all the military offices (a). Of all the noble actions, that made him so illustrious, there is none, for which he deserves so many praises, as his constant fidelity to king Henry III, who did not love him [A], and to Henry IV, who had openly separated from the Romish communion. After the death of Henry III, none did so much contribute to secure the crown for Henry IV [B], and therefore he was very much lamented by that prince, when he was killed at the siege of a town in Champagne (b), before the League had been subdued. He dissuaded the

[§ a] Mr Bayle might have added, that Biron, the father, followed the duke of Anjou into the Low-Countries; that he was at Antwerp, when that prince endeavoured to take the town, and that he was presently suspected to be one of the chief authors of the design; but that afterwards, after the retreat of the duke of Anjou, a letter from Biron to the duke, in which he dissuaded and even detested the enterprize, being found in the cloaths of that duke, brought the citizens of Antwerp, from hating Biron, to esteem and love him. This is what Busbequius tells us, in the nineteenth letter of his French Embassy. REM. CRIT.]

[A] Henry III, who did not love him.] He incurred his indignation (1) because he opposed the peace that was made before Rochelle in the year 1573. Henry III, who was then but duke of Anjou, had besieged that place several months, and found no better expedient to retire with honour, than to make a treaty of peace; for the continuation of the siege was dangerous, and contrary both to the queen-mother's desire to see again the duke of Anjou, and to the design he himself had to go and take possession of the kingdom of Poland: and therefore his mother, and he, were very willing, that the besieged should be brought to an accommodation. 'Biron did what ever he could to dissuade the king and queen from hearkening to any composition, and engaged upon his life to take the town within a month, or five weeks at farthest, without losing or venturing any thing but making a good blockade: but his advices and letters proved ineffectual at that time. . . . When Biron saw, that he could not prevail with the king and queen, and the king of Poland, he took another course: He wrote to the cardinal of Lorraine, and to some of the chief members of the council, and desired them to prevent the raising of the siege, and the making of a peace; assuring them that, if they would but let him act, the city of Rochelle would be more subject to the king in six weeks time, than ever it had been. The cardinal, who was a shuffling man, began to carry on secret practices, and to tamper with the council, in order to dissuade the king and queen from such a capitulation and peace. They importuned their majesties, and particularly the queen, to such a degree, that she found no other way to put an end to their solicitations but to write to the king of Poland by the abbot de Gadagne, whom she trusted entirely, and to inform him of the secret practices of Biron, advising him to talk big to him. The king of Poland, being informed of this, wrote some haughty and threatening letters to the cardinal, and other members of the council, who advised such a thing. Those letters, written with his own hand, were so severe, that they were all amazed at it, and proceeded no farther. As for Biron, one morning, as he attended the king in his wardrobe, where the council met that day, the king of Poland took him to task, and said him as soon as he saw him, come hither, spark, I am informed of your doings: you take upon you to carry on secret practices against me, and to write to the court: I have almost a mind to run you through the body, and to kill you upon the spot; or rather to appoint some commissioners to enquire into your life, and examine what you have done against me, the king, and his dominions, in order to have your head cut off. How dare you oppose my will? I know who you are. Were it not for the king, and for me, you would be a very inconsiderable man. How come you to forget your self? you set up for a pretending man. You will take Rochelle, say you, within a month or six weeks, and are resolved to have the glory of it, to my prejudice. You have already too much exposed my honour. . . . You made me stay five months here; and now that I may retire with honour, you oppose me; and you are for staying longer, to triumph over me. I will teach you to set up for a great captain at my cost (2). Biron excused himself in a submissive manner (3), and 'ever after the king of Poland carried himself very coldly towards him, even at his return from Poland (4). But he gave him a kind reception (5) when Biron waited upon him in August, 1575, being sent for by the queen-mother, at the request of the duke of Guise, who would have no other captain with him but Biron, and Strozza, to maul Thore (6), and all his reiters. Biron behaved himself very well in that war; and though it has been said, that he would have sided with the league, if the thirty thousand crowns that 'were offered to him, had been put into his hands, it is more probable, that he rejected all those proposals (7). However it be, the king had no better and more faithful servant than he, during that war. . . . The duke of Guise, being dead, he waited upon the king very seasonably, who was very glad to see him. He assisted his master in a very critical time; for the greatest part of the kingdom was bent against him, by reason of the duke of Guise's murder (8).'

[B] None did so much contribute to secure the crown for Henry IV.] Let us hear Brantome again (9). After the king's death, having had a long time a great interest with the soldiers, both French and foreigners, who all loved and respected him, he drew them over in such a manner, that the king of Navarre succeeded the late king with an unanimous consent, which was the noblest exploit that ever he did. . . . So that every body believes, that the marshal made him king, as he told him once in a reproachful manner: for the Catholics would have forsaken him, because he was a Huguenot, and the Huguenots were not strong enough to set him on the throne. But by the industry of the said marshal, they were brought to obey the new king, though a Huguenot, if not out of a good will, at least to revenge the death of the late king, who had been unjustly murdered. But this was not all; for there was a necessity to maintain him, and to conquer the towns, wherein he was king from following the opinion of those, who advised him to retire to a safe place by sea [C]; and had he done nothing else, he would deserve very great praises. He was a man of little religion; but he was rather a Protestant than a Catholic [D]. He was so much suspected by the inquisitors, that he was put in the list of those that were to be massacred on St Bartholomew's day [E]; but as he lodged in the Bastille, being but half a king; which the marshal did so effectually, that he helped him to recover some good and strong towns, to win the battle of Yvry, and to get out of Arques and Dieppe, as I shall shew in the king's life. Afterwards, as he was taking a view of the town of Espernay, his head was shot off by a cannon-ball. There was a blot in his fidelity to Henry IV; but it was of no long continuance. He looked upon himself as the most necessary man, and was really so after the death of Henry III, and thinking, that, in such a confusion, the kingdom would be torn to pieces, he came to fancy, that he might get one of them; and, entering into the cabinet, and hearing several people murmur, he took Sancy aside, and told him, that he desired to be made sovereign of the county of Perigord, as a reward for his services. Sancy, being unwilling to discourage him, went immediately to the king, and acquainted him with it. The king charged him to give Biron all the encouragement imaginable; and Sancy managed him with so much address and dexterity, that, working upon his generosity, he obliged him not only to desist from his pretension, but also to profess never to suffer, that any part of the kingdom should be dismembered for any body whatsoever (10).

[C] He dissuaded the king from following the advice of those who persuaded him to retire to a safe place by sea.

The duke of Mayenne, having obliged that prince to raise the siege of Rouen, and to retire towards Dieppe, endeavoured to follow him so close, that he might have no way to escape but by sea.

The king's captains, and even the Protestants (11), . . . knew not well how to get out of the danger they were in, and were very much concerned for the king's safety, on which the welfare of the kingdom depended: so that in a council held the fifth of September (12), most of them were of opinion, that he should leave his troops intrenched in good posts, . . . and take shipping immediately, in order to retire into England, or to Rochelle, lest he should be invested both by sea and land. . . .

Their opinion was supported by so many strong reasons, that the king himself began to waver, when marshal de Biron, who had heard this discourse with contempt, being sorry that it made a greater impression, than it should have done, spoke with an angry tone, and told the king, &c. I do not set down his speech, which may be found in

Mezerai: It is so well turned, and so full of strong arguments, that it is no wonder it had the desired effect. Henry IV, having heard it, resolved to hold out in his post. He was attacked in it, and the enemies were gloriously repulsed. Biron was in the right to say, 'that as things stood then, to go out of France, only for twenty four hours, was to leave it for ever.' A prince must not expect to succeed in such a concurrence, if he tells his generals, 'take care of my crown, and I will take care of my self.'

[D] He was rather a Protestant than a Catholic.

His being suspected of being a Protestant was the reason why he was not made a knight of the order, in the beginning of the civil-wars. 'It is to be observed, says Brantome (13), that the chief reason why that honour was not conferred upon him, and why they made no great account of him, was, that he was looked upon as a great Huguenot: nay, it was said at court, that he had got two of his children baptized by Protestant ministers, which was then abhorred by the great captains, such as the king of Navarre, messieurs de Guise, the constable, and the marshal de Saint Andre, and by every body. For this reason Biron was looked upon with an evil eye; so that he resolved to quit the court, and to retire to his house. He would have done it, had not du Perron, afterwards marshal de Retz, spoke for him to the queen. They made him stay and he went to the army without any employment; but, they having quickly discovered his merit, he was made an assistant to the great marshals de camp. The duke of Guise began to like him, though he dropt now and then some words that favoured of a Huguenot. He had much ado to forbear it; but he took care not to discover openly his affection to that party. He acquired at last so great a capacity in his post, that there was a necessity to make use of him (14). He was twice unfortunate in the third civil-war, and very much blamed by the king's brother, who was the general; and it was said in the army,

(they are Brantome's words) (15), that he had threatened to run him through with his dagger. Biron was obliged to excuse himself as modestly as he could; for if he had raised his voice never so little, the king's brother would have run him through, so great was his passion against him. He reproached him with being a Huguenot, and a favourer of that party; and told him, that he had been wanting to his duty, on purpose to bring a disreputation upon him, and to have him and his whole army destroyed. Tavannes, who was a very haughty man, spoke also to him, and told him, that he was a pretending man, who would meddle with every thing, and a Huguenot; and that he seldom went to mass and when he did, it was only for a shew. Biron was upbraided with all these things in council, and obliged to buckle to, and hold his tongue. After the Paris massacre, the king sent him into Xaintonge (16), to bring Rochelle to his obedience either willingly or by force. The town was besieged. Biron was (17) 'unfortunate in that siege; for, though he performed the duty of a great captain, and of an excellent master of the artillery, and received a musket-shot, yet the greatest part of the besiegers were of opinion, that he kept correspondence with the besieged, and that he, and his creatures, acquainted them with every thing that passed out of the town. This is a great mistake; for, if he had taken that town, he would have been made governor of it, and put in possession of the most important place of France. He was an ambitious man; and therefore I leave you to judge whether he would have missed the opportunity of taking such a town. Besides, it is certain, that, if his advice and that of Strozza, had been followed, that town would have been taken gradually, as we have done at last (18). He was, doubtless, suspected of keeping intelligence with the Rochellers, because, they looked upon him as a Huguenot; and therefore I have added this passage of Brantome to those, which you have seen before. I shall confirm all those passages by these words of Mezerai taken from the elogy of our Biron (19). As for his religion, he was a little inclined to the new reformation. [A], citat. (2).

A tutor, whom he had in his younger years, imbued him with those principles; and his wife, who made an open profession of the Protestant religion, France, Tom.

kept him up in those opinions (20): so that he favoured the Protestants underhand, except when the king's service required the contrary; and, his heart speaking through his mouth, he often dropt some satirical jests against the ceremonies of the church of Rome: which made several people suspect, that he kept off the king's conversion; for the king, by reason of the great services he had done him, after the death of Henry III, relied entirely on him, and was wholly directed by his councils, though sometimes he was offended at his haughtiness.

[E] He was put in the list of those, that were to be massacred on St Bartholomew's day. Biron had been made use of, to bring the queen of Navarre to the court of France, with the prince her son, who was to be married to Charles the ninth's sister. Biron brought that prince, attended with the flower of the Huguenots, who, thinking to domineer and govern the world, met there with a tragical end.

Those, who escaped, blamed Biron, and laid the whole fault on him, saying, that he had wheedled and amused them, to bring them to the slaughter. . .

But, notwithstanding all those suspicions and calumnies, it is certain, that he was in great trouble, during that massacre; and it was well for him, that he great master of the ordonnance, he knew how to defeat the ill designs of the murderers. The reason, why he was suspected to favour the Huguenots, is very glorious to him [F]. There never was a man of his quality, who had a more universal knowledge [G]. He was well qualified, not only for all sorts of military offices, but also for negotiation. He loved books, and the conversation of learned men; and used to write down in his table-book whatever he thought worthy the taking notice of. He was too passionate, and too much given to drinking [H]. He had another fault greater than those two, and which often proves very prejudicial to princes; for he neglected the opportunities to give the enemy a decisive blow [I]. He was afraid, that the war would be too soon ended, and that the court would send him home without any employment. It is said, that, after he had laughed at the predictions of those who calculate nativities, a thing, with which the court of France was then infatuated, he became so credulous, as to believe, what those men told him, concerning the kind of death had a great deal of courage and bravery; for he immediately retired into his arsenal, and planted several guns at the gate and other avenues, and was ready to make a brave defence; so that, some troops of Parisians, who never had any thing to do with such a warlike man, coming near the gate, he spoke to them boldly, and threatened to fire at them, if they did not retire. They immediately went away, and durst no more come near him, nor do any thing against him. He was certainly put in the black list, as well as the rest; and he told me so himself, at his return from Brouage; for he was my friend, and related to me, and we had a long talk about the massacre. It was said, that Tavannes, and the count de Retz, who did not love him, had him put in the list of those, that were to be massacred (21). Mezerei informs us, that Biron sheltered some of his friends in the Bastille. These are his words (22): 'The Montmorency's, Cossé, and Biron, had been put in the list; but the absence of the marshal de Montmorency, who was at Chantilly, saved the life of his three brothers. The intreaties of the fair Chateau-neuf, mistress to the king's brother, saved Cossé, who was her relation; and Biron, great master of the artillery, having planted some culverins over the gate of the arsenal, stopt the fury of the murderers, and sheltered some of his friends; amongst others James, second son of the lord de la Force, who being then but 10 or 12 years of age, had cunningly hid himself betwixt the bodies of his father and his eldest brother, who had been killed in bed, where they three lay.'

[F] The reason, why he was suspected to favour the Huguenots, is very glorious to him. I shall use the words of one of our best historians (23). 'Biron seemed to have been inclined to the new opinions, ever since he had been in esteem with the late king of Navarre. Nevertheless he shewed himself a good Catholic all the rest of his life; and whenever the war broke out against the Huguenots, he behaved himself with as much courage and fidelity as any body else. But the reason why they thought he did not hate the Huguenots, was because he could not approve, that they should break the faith that was given them; and because, when the last Edict of Pacification was patched up, he gave the queen to understand at several times, that it had been more becoming the king's majesty to carry things to the last extremity (24), than to make a treaty, which he knew was not to be observed. For this reason, and because he was a man of a sincere probity, the queen-mother, and the Guises, put him in the black list: at least he believed it, and always kept a lively remembrance of it.'

[G] There never was a man of his quality who had more universal knowledge. 'He had an universal knowledge of the art of war, and of state-affairs: he understood and managed them as well as any lord in France; and therefore the queen-mother, upon any important occasion, never failed to send for him, whether he was at home, or elsewhere, and intirely depended upon him. He himself used to say, in a drolling way, that he was a clever fellow, consulted upon all occasions. He said nothing but what was true; and the queen and he agreed very well in all things relating to war or peace. He had been a great lover of books, and continued to love them ever since his younger years. He was very curious and inquisitive, and had always a table-book about him, in which he writ down whatever he saw, or heard, that deserved to be taken notice of: which occasioned a kind of a proverb at court; for when any body said any thing, he was told, you have found that in Biron's table-book. Nay, king Henry's jester would sometimes swear by the divine table-book of Biron And I have seen several people wonder, that, tho' he had never been employed in great affairs with any foreign state, or sent upon an embassy, as Lanfac, Rambouillet, the marshal de Retz, and others, had been; yet he knew more than they, and might have taught them many things relating both to foreign and domestic affairs (25). Let us add to this passage some lines out of the encomium, which Mezerei bestows upon him. 'He had a quick and penetrating wit, a ready Elocution, a persuasive discourse, and a noble and warlike soul. He was quick, laborious, and bold, desirous to learn, very exact, and no less skilled in the intrigues of the court and among the ladies, than brave and valiant in war He gloried in having an universal knowledge, and to understand negotiations as well as the art of war. He meddled with every thing, and kept himself busy, when they gave him nothing to do. He pretended to be a perfect master of geography and history, and delineated plans and maps with his own hand; saying, that it was one of the things that belong to a great captain, to shew upon paper what he can do in the field (26).

[H] He was too much given to drinking. Mezerei says only (27), 'that he loved jesting and good cheer; that he slept but little; and ate a long time at table, drinking till he was merry.' But there is a repartee, ascribed to Henry IV, which carries the thing further. 'One day the duke of Savoy was praising the noble actions and great services, which the two Birones, father and son, had done him. The king answered, that, indeed, they had served him well; but that he had much ado to moderate the drunkenness of the father, and to restrain the mad fits of the son (28).'

[I] He neglected . . . to give the enemy a decisive blow. Brantome relates (29), that it was said, that, if Biron 'had been willing to push on,' he would have done more mischief to the king of Navarre. This belongs to the time, when Biron commanded in Guienne under Henry III. Upon another occasion, that is, when the duke of Parma was at Candebec, Biron reproved his son for representing to the king, that, if his majesty would give him four thousand arquebusers, and two thousand horse, he would hinder the enemy from passing. 'Hereupon (they are Brantome's words) the marshal gave a severe reprimand to his son in the king's presence, and told him, that he was a fine spark to do such a thing, and found so many difficulties in it, that the design was broke off. Afterwards he told his son in the evening, that he knew very well he would have succeeded, or have been killed in it; but that such an enemy of the French nation must not be routed all at once. For, said he, when they are overcome and undone, kings make no account of their captains and military men; and therefore the war ought to be kept up, and cultivated like a piece of ground; otherwise those who have ploughed it will starve, if they let it lie waste (30). Mezerei expresses this in a stile more nervous and polite. 'Marshal Biron was looked up, on as a man, who raised factions, to shew his ability, death with which they threatened him [K]. Notwithstanding his fatigues, his wounds, and his great age, he was still a very vigorous man; and we are told a remarkable thing of the strength of his stomach [L]. He left many children; the eldest of which shall be the subject of the following article.

[K] He became so credulous as to believe the kind of death, which the Calculators of Nativities threatened him with. The following passage is to be found in the large history of Mezeraï. 'A certain person, who was very well acquainted with Biron, told me a remarkable thing of him. That marshal had all along laughed at the predictions of the astrologers, whom the great curiosity of queen Catherine de Medicis had brought in great request at court; but, some time before he died, some of those predictions having had their accomplishment, he gave as much credit to them, and became as superstitious in that respect, as he had been incredulous before, so far as consult the fortune-tellers. One of those men having foretold him, half a year before that siege, that he should be killed by a cannon-ball, it made such an impression upon him, that he confessed to his friends, whenever he heard a gun go off, he could not forbear trembling for fear, and bending his head. At that time (33), hearing a bullet whistle, he slept aside to avoid it; but it fell out unluckily that he went to meet it, and so he fulfilled a prediction, which perhaps had not come to pass, if he had laughed at it (34). This historian is more exact, than I thought, in relating such things.

[L] They tell a remarkable thing of the strength of his stomach. Let us hear Mezeraï once more (35). 'He had been in many sieges and bloody actions, and commanded as general in seven battles, wherein he received as many wounds: and though he was broken with fatigue and wounds, and above sixty eight years old (36), yet he enjoyed such a vigorous health, that the surgeons, who opened his body, to embalm it, found no meat in his stomach, though he had been killed but an hour after supper; which shews, that he had a great deal of natural heat, since the digestion was so quickly made (37).

(33) That is, when he was killed by a cannon ball at the siege of Epemai.

GONTAUT (CHARLES DE) duke of Biron, the son of the foregoing, was one of the greatest captains of his time; but he had the fault to speak of his own exploits with an intolerable pride. He learned the art of war early, under marshal de Biron his father, who omitted nothing to raise him, or make him appear worthy of preferment [A]. He was made admiral of France in the year 1592, and, having resigned that office in 1594, he was made marshal of France, and governor of Burgundy. The king erected the barony of Biron into a duchy and peerdom in the year 1598, and immediately sent the new duke to Brussels upon a magnificent embassy, to make the archduke swear to the peace of Vervins. He was sent into Switzerland in January 1602 [B], to renew the alliance with the cantons. He had been in England the year before, to compliment queen Elizabeth in the king's name; and he received extraordinary honours from that great queen. What she did upon this occasion has not been faithfully related [C]. Every body knows the tragical end of the marshal and duke of Biron.

rel with Dampierre, marshal de camp, made him quit his post, and procured it for his son, who enjoyed it in the quality of marshal de camp general: and, because the young man knew not how to discharge the duties of that post, his father laboured for him day and night, and gave him all the glory of it; which brought the said baron into such a credit and reputation in the army, that the marshal his father having been killed with a cannon-ball at the siege of Epemai, the king made him admiral. When Mr de Villars came into the king's service, he resigned his place of admiral, and was made marshal of France (10). I shall conclude this remark with a passage of Mezeraï (11). 'The Catholics were not so sorry for the death of marshal de Biron, as the king was, who expressed more grief for it, than for any other loss, that he had sustained; and his grief would have lasted longer, had he not believed, that the baron's son, being bred up by him, would be able to do him as great services; so much the more, because he had all the experience of his father; but he had not yet his cunning and his ill maxims.'

[B] He was sent into Switzerland . . . in 1602. De Vic and Silleri had much ado to renew the alliance; and, when they thought they had overcome all obstacles, they perceived, that all was spoiled by the emissaries of Spain and Savoy: but marshal de Biron, who arrived at Soleure, 'with a great retinue and a magnificent equipage, brought the treaty to a happy conclusion. His sumptuousity, his martial discourse, and the glory of his noble exploits, which the Swiss had been often witnesses of, made no small impression upon such a warlike people; and the great sums that came after him made an end of the work. . . . That solemnity was concluded with a noble entertainment, wherein he preached up the king's grandeur, and the power of France. This was not the least of his services (12).'

He was beheaded the thirty first of July, 1602, for joining with the duke of Savoy in a horrid conspiracy against the state [D]. He behaved like a madman upon the scaffold [E]. head of the earl of Essex, to have an opportunity to tell him by what motive she had been induced to punish so severely the rebellion of that ungrateful man. They add, that she told him, the king of France would do well to punish traitors in the same manner (13). Some say, that she shewed him the earl's head from the windows of her palace; others will have it, that she did it, going over London-bridge. But this cannot be true, since the queen was at a country-house all the time marshal de Biron was in England. Duplex (14) made use of this observation to confute what has been said by so many other historians; and Leti has done it likewise (15): but he is mistaken, when he says, that Henry IV did not send Biron to London, till after his return to Paris (16); for he sent him thither from Calais.

I do not pretend to deny, that the queen discoursed in such a manner about the earl of Essex; but, instead of saying that she did it, shewing the earl's head to the duke of Biron, those historians should have said, as le Grain does (17), that she spoke those words in her closet, shewing him the picture of that lord. It is a shameful thing, that the French relations, and even those that were written by the best historians of those times, should be stuffed with so many fables. Camden has all the reason in the world to laugh at them for saying, that the queen shewed the head of the earl of Essex to the marshal de Biron; for it was buried with the body. Quod quidam Gallici scriptores prodiderunt eam cranium Essexii inter plura damnatorum, in intimo Larario, vel (ut alii scribunt) palo affixum, Bironio & Gallis ostentasse, ridicule vanum est. Illud enim una cum corpore consepultum (18). He says the queen was then at a country-house, which he calls Basingum. Bassompierre (19), who accompanied marshal de Biron, calls it Basing; correct therefore Duplex, who calls it Vignes. He has committed many other faults, for which Bassompierre takes him up. Here is one of them. The queen gave the French a royal entertainment, sung along with it. Bassompierre refutes this in these words (20): 'She gave no royal entertainment to the French; only she defrayed the expences of marshal de Biron and his company, all the time he was at Laning (21); and one day, marshal de Biron being at Basing, my lord Corbain brought him, with four or five of us, into her chamber through a back-door, to surprise her when she was singing.'

[D] He was beheaded for joining with the duke of Savoy in a horrid conspiracy against the state.] This was none of those petty conspiracies designed only to keep a king busy, that he may not disturb his neighbours. It is affirmed, that the duke of Savoy and Biron had agreed to dismember the kingdom, to erect as many sovereignties in it, as there were provinces, and to put all those petty princes under the protection of Spain. The duke of Savoy was to have for his share the Lyonnais, Dauphiné, and Provence, and Biron the duchy of Burgundy, to which the Spaniards were to add Franche Comté, as a portion for a daughter of their king, or for a daughter of the duke of Savoy, whom they promised to marry to him (22). I shall take occasion from hence to observe a great difference between the passions of sovereign princes and those of private men. Any gentleman would certainly take it as a great affront, if one of his neighbours should offer to corrupt his servants, and engage them to betray their master. He would quickly send him a challenge, or at least seek an opportunity to end the difference sword in hand. But princes are contented to punish the traitors, and continue to keep correspondence with the seducer. Henry IV bore very patiently this hostility of the duke of Savoy; no rupture ensued upon it, and they remained, in all outward appearance, as good friends as they were before. See hereafter (23) a passage of Brantôme concerning the quarrels of great men (24).

[E] He behaved like a madman upon the scaffold.] All the historians of that time tell us at large what he did and what he said, during his trial, till he was executed. I shall only set down what I find in a letter of Mr Gillot to Scaliger (25). 'You have heard of the marshal's death, who has been executed in the court of the Bastille, by the king's favour, and not in the Greve. He has all along refused to discover his accomplices, and has said nothing but what is in his process. He is dead, very ill affected to the king and his country; which he shewed, by praying to God, that he would have mercy upon his soul, and the king's: and then he said, quick, quick, make haste, and would not suffer himself to be bound, swearing, that he would strangle the executioner with his teeth. The executioner did not come near him: he himself tied his handkerchief about his head, and then untied it, swearing most horribly, that they should take care not to put him into a fury, and that he would spoil one half of those that were there; and desiring the musqueteers, that were in the court, to shoot him. Is there no honest fellow among you, said he, that will shoot marshal de Biron, that he may not die by the hands of these rascals? He complained to the chancellor himself of the severity of that sentence. You may well believe, that his death was necessary to France. I can assure you, that he is dead, like the man spoken of by an Italian poet:

Biafremando se ne fuge l'alma con grand cordoglio,
Come nel mondo vifle pieno d'ira & d'orgoglio.

The soul, where rage and madnes wont to dwell,
Furious, breaks loose, and seeks the shades of bell.

These two verses are very like those, that are to be found at the end of Orlando furioso:

Beflemmiando fuggi l'alma sdegnosa,
Che fu si altera al mondo, e si orgogliosa (26).

See the proud soul, which boild with vengeful ire,
Indignant quit the limbs, and to the shades retire.

When he was told, that he could expect no pardon, he did so furiously inveigh against the king, that the historians durst not mention the words that he made use of. 'The duke of Biron . . . having given up himself to grief and fury, spoke first, and said what ever a man, overcome with grief, can utter, telling the chancellor in a reproachful manner, that he had been all along more inclined to condemn him, than to save him: and, upon this occasion, he added some words, the memory whereof is forbidden, and which cannot be mentioned with impunity. But princes are little concerned for the satirical strokes of their subjects, who seldom fail to suffer for it (27).'

[F] Though he had no religion.] I will quote hereupon this passage of Victor Cayet (28). 'He often laughed at all religion. One day, the baron de Lux, his trusty friend, told him, that a capuchin, attending his uncle, archbishop of Paris, when he was dying, had made use these words: When God sees, that a sinner will not repent, and rejects his grace, he brings him into prosperity; every thing falls out according to his wishes; he fills him with the joys of this world. To which the marshal answered, I should be glad to be thus forsaken. There are a great many such sayings related of him, which shew that he had little religion; but I omit them, not to cast a blot upon his memory.' This historian had said a thing in the foregoing page, which deserves so much the more to be mentioned in this place, because we learn from it, that Biron was brought up in the reformed religion. The passage runs thus: 'He often laughed at the mals, and at those of the pretended reformed religion, with whom he had been bred up from his younger years. For when he was eight years of age, Madam de Brisambourg (29), his aunt by the father's side, who was of the pretended reformed religion, conceived such an affection for him, by reason of his briskness and pleasant humour, that she begged him of his mother, who granted her request, for they were both of the said religion.'

vive the league [G]. He did not forget what his father told him, that a general ought to keep up the war as long as he can, because in time of peace he is no necessary man, and must live in his country-house (b). This was the reason why he did not give the necessary orders, during the siege of Amiens, to hinder the arch-duke from throwing succours into that place. He would not have been sorry it had been relieved, because it would have retarded the peace. He could hardly bear, that Henry IV should have a share in the glory of good success; and he threatened the historians who did not indulge his vanity [H]. I can scarce believe what is said of his learning [I]. What is reported of religion. His mother gave him willingly to his aunt, to have him brought up in that religion, which was done accordingly: and from that time his aunt Brisambourg made him her only heir. She had a vast estate; for she had been married thrice, and had no children by any of her husbands; and they left her great jointures and legacies, which were all adjudged to her, so far as to dispose of them as she should think fit. Camden says, that marshal de Biron laughed at the earl of Essex for suffering death with a Christian disposition: as if such a resignation became only a parson, and not a soldier (30).

[G] He appeared superstitious (§a), in order to revive the league. Mezerai observes (31), 'that, after the loss of Douvrens and Cambray, the nobility and the army looked upon him as the only deliverer of the state. At his return from the siege of Amiens, he grew fond of the love of the inhabitants of Paris; and, when he went into Flanders, to make the arch-duke swear to the peace, the Spaniards, knowing his vanity and ill disposition, bestowed such great encomiums upon him, that they filled his head with wind, and his mind with ill designs. From that time, and even before, he endeavoured to ingratiate himself with the people, and affected to appear zealous for the Catholic religion, so far as to use beads, and to be admitted into fraternities, as if he had designed to revive the league, which he had destroyed with the sword.' He had not forgot how far the city of Paris had supported the duke of Guise in his ambition; and he was not ignorant, that the chief reason of their great fondness for that duke, was, because he made it his business to extirpate the Protestants. He thought therefore, that there was a necessity for him to make a show of bigotry, in order to strengthen the impressions his valour had made upon the inhabitants of that populous city. It was with this prospect that he affected to hate the Huguenots. Here is the sequel of the passage which I have quoted out of Mr Gillot's letter (32). 'I must tell you, that his whole conduct favoured of the spirit of the league. He had promised and sworn not to speak with any Huguenot, and to shun their conversation; and that he might keep his oath, he would not see his mother, when he went into his province; and he turned out his old servants, and those of his father, Sacramento illo obligatus, (to keep his oath), to the count de Fuentes.'

[§a] The facetious narrative concerning Monsieur Saint Biron. B. ii. ch. 8. of the Confession of Sancy, might have been brought in here. REM. CRIT.]

[H] He could scarce suffer that Henry IV should have a share in the glory of good success, and be threatened the historians who did not flatter his vanity. The king and the marshal were jealous of one another. The king was not always willing to acknowledge, that the marshal deserved the glory, which he ascribed to himself, and spoke freely about it to the duke of Savoy (33), who, through a very malicious craft, put him upon that subject, to report some things to the marshal that might exasperate him (34). When the marshal was told of them, he uttered the most abusive words, that his resentment would afford him, against the respect he owed to the king. . . . He made very blunt and inconsiderate repartees; for he could not bear the least reflexion upon his valour, which he valued above all things. And, when he happened to give an account of his life, he mixed with it malicious stories of every body, without so much as sparing the king (35). He told him sometimes (36), that he would not have any French historian to say, that any body had done such or such a thing but he (37). Having seen a discourse of Peter Matthieu, about the causes and consequences of the long wars between the house of France and the house of Austria; and, fancying that the author did not speak of him so often, nor so gloriously, as he wished, he complained of it to chancellor de Believre; and discovered his resentment more openly to de Vic, ambassador in Switzerland, with hard words and great threatenings against the author (38).

Note, that he had a kind of ambition like that of Achilles. This hero would not suffer, that any other Greek should kill Hector; he would have all the glory of it.

(39) Homeri Iliad. lib. xxii, ver. 205.

Notwithstanding the great authority of Homer, the ancients did not approve this character of Achilles. This we learn from Plutarch (40): 'Achilles himself is blamed with great reason, as not behaving himself like a wise man, but like a hardy young fool, transported with an eager desire of glory; for in the heat of the battle he made signs to the Greeks not to meddle with Hector, as Homer says:

Left that their darts his glory should abate,
And, when the blow was given, himself should come too late.

[I] I can scarce believe what is said of his learning. Balzac tells us a very curious thing (41). Besides the two Frenchmen, says he, whom I have alleged (42), I must mention a third, whom I had forgot, and you will never think of; I mean the late marshal de Biron, a man, who breathed nothing but fire and slaughter, and of whom Torquato Tasso said, in the person of Argante,

(41) Balzac, Entretien IV, towards the end, pag. m. 72, 73.

(42) He had been speaking, pag. 71, of Mr de Givry and Mr d'Urfe, who were two eloquent and learned men, and knew how to write in prose and verse.

Impatiente, inefforabil, fiero,
Ne l'arme insatiable & invitto, &c,

Impatient, fierce, inexorable, Untired in arms, unconquerable.

One of our friends, who knew him, gives us the following account of him. The king sent marshal de Biron to queen Elizabeth, calling him in his credential letters, The most cutting instrument of his victories. The marshal acquitted himself worthily of that employment; for his parts answered his great courage. It has been said elsewhere, that he had a mind to be accounted a brutish man, in order to comply with the foolishness of the age; but it is certain, that, besides his natural endowments, he had a great deal of knowledge. He gave an instance of it at Frefne; where the king walking in a gallery, and asking of some masters of the requests the meaning of a Greek verse engraved upon a piece of marble, he explained it immediately, and then went away, being ashamed to be a more knowing man than the masters of the requests of that time. I am apt to believe, that this passage does not belong to the son, but to the father; for the father loved learning, and learned conversations, and used to write down in his table-book whatever he heard that deserved to be taken notice of; and therefore it is likely, that he found the explication of that Greek verse in his pocket-book. However, I will not be positive: You will see, in the following remark, a passage, which is the cause of my uncertainty. Mr de Perefixe (43) says, that Biron, the son, was very ignorant, and extremely fond of the predilections of his reminiscence deserves to be mentioned [K]. He was at first brought up in the Protestant religion (c). He was a great gamester (d); but little given to women, and other bodily pleasures (e). Henry IV had a mind to make him his son-in-law [L]; and it is said, he boasted, that he had saved his life [M]. I shall only take notice of two faults of Moreri [N].

of astrologers, diviners, geomancers, and such like cheats. For the rest Balzac's dealing upon this occasion is somewhat unfair: he uses one of the tricks of proud writers: he dares not name his author, hoping that the readers will think he has found this passage in a book unknown to every body else; and yet it is to be found in a common book, viz. in d'Aubigné's history (44). I have made, elsewhere (45), the like remark.

[K] What is reported of his reminiscence deserves to be mentioned.] I have already said, that he was brought up by his aunt, the lady Brissambourg: to which I add here, 'that he had no inclination for learning, but only for war: wherefore marshal de Biron, his father, who was a Catholic and a very warlike man, took him from his aunt, carried him for some time along with him into the provinces of Xaintonge, Aunis, and Angoumois, and had him instructed in the Catholic religion . . . thus Charles de Biron, being unqualified for learning till he was sixteen years of age, got such a skill in the art of war, that he found nothing impossible. His father was well pleased with it. What I am going to mention is very wonderful. Whilst he was at Brissambourg, he was taught history by one Manduca, a learned man of Malta; and though he made no progress in it, yet he has since alledged many historical facts admirably well, though naturally he was no great talker (46).

(48) That is, against the person of Henry IV.

[L] Henry IV had a mind to make him his son-in-law.] This I have read in the additions to Castelnau's memoirs; and I think the reader will not be displeased to find, here, the following passage, which is full of curious things (47). 'If the duke of Biron did not conspire against his person (48), it cannot be denied, that he conspired against his state, and designed to divide it into several parts, and to deliver it up to the king of Spain, and the duke of Savoy, his pretended father-in-law. The king was the more exasperated at him, because he loved him so well, that he intended to make him his son-in-law, by marrying him to Catherine Henrietta his daughter, who was afterwards duchess of Elbeuf; the better to secure the crown to the duke of Vendôme, whom he designed to legitimate by his marriage with the duchess of Beaufort. A few days after the death of that lady, his mistress, he discovered this design of his at Fontainebleau to the Sieur du Vair, counsellor of state, in a private conference; and having imparted his grief to him, he desired to know what he thought of it. S. I. R. said du Vair, if your majesty was duke of Tuscany, of Mantua, or of Urbino, (Italy affords many instances of cruelty, especially in the establishment of sovereignties, which generally have been tyrannical in the beginning) I should think, that, by destroying all your relations, and their friends, you might set illegitimate children upon the throne; but being a gracious king of France, and careful to tread in the steps of your predecessors, your majesty would have run the hazard of losing your kingdom, and even your life. You are mistaken, replied the king; The French nation use themselves to every thing. The king, having lost the opportunity of placing the duke of Vendôme upon the throne, had a mind to make him the greatest man in the kingdom; and was still resolved to marry this duke's sister to the duke of Biron. But the latter, either because he did not think the match good enough for him, or because he was unwilling to be engaged by authority in a marriage which could not satisfy his ambition as before, suffered himself to be foolishly flattered with the hopes of marrying the daughter of the duke of Savoy, who was descended by her father and mother from Francis I, and the emperor Charles V. . . . The same Mr du Vair, in his return from the court to Provence, by the way of Dijon, had a long conference with the duke of Biron's secretary; and having intimated to him, that he was a little surprized, that a lord of his age, who was so great a man, and had so great an interest, did not marry, the secretary gave him a hint of his design by this answer: these great men suffer themselves to be brought into such high enterprizes, that they hardly know themselves. Indeed, this duke of Biron, who was a proud and haughty man, and of a very untractable temper, was only pleased with difficult and almost impossible things. He envied the grandeur of other men; and his jealousy of the duke of Montmorency, by reason of his office of constable, reached Louise de Bados, his wife. Thinking to succeed the constable, he proposed to marry his wife (49), and the thing was agreed upon between that lady and him, if their fate had permitted it; but they died both of them in the flower of their age, and the constable survived them.'

[M] . . . and boasted that he had saved his life.] I have read this in a history of Henry IV, written by G. Soffi. That author (50) brings in this prince, saying; though I am a king, I have saved the life of one of my soldiers: had it not been for me, he had been killed before my eyes: I have seen that great warrior turning his back to the enemy. What the king said was true enough. As Biron was pursuing Farnese in the frontiers, there happened an accidental fight on horseback, in which the enemy, having recovered their strength, attacked Biron, and run his horse thro' with a lance. At Fontaine Française, he received several wounds in a rencounter, and his eyes were almost blinded with the blood that issued from a wound in his head. The king brought him off from those two dangers. Peter Matthieu gives us a clearer account of that matter. He has served me well, said the king; but he cannot deny that I have saved his life three times. I brought him off from the enemy at Fontaine Française, so wounded, and so stunned with his wounds, that, as I had acted the part of a soldier to save his life, I acted that of a marshal, in order to make a retreat; for he told me he was not in a condition to think of it, and to serve me (51). The following words are to be found in the margin of that historian. 'At the fight of Fontaine-Françoise, the king rescued marshal de Biron from the middle. One of his majesty's servants told him, that he exposed himself too much by running thus among the enemies. It is true, answered the king; but if I do not do it, marshal Biron will take advantage of it as long as he lives.'

[N] I shall only take notice of two faults of Moreri.] He says, that the barony of Biron was erected into a duchy and peerdom, after the marshal's return from his embassy in England, which is false (52); for the erection was made three years before that embassy. He adds, that Biron, having lost his office of admiral, and having some small reasons to be discontented, plotted against the state. This is likewise false; for he voluntarily laid down the post of admiral in 1549, and was amply rewarded for it.

(49) The author of the Discours Hist. de la Fortune & Dignité des Faveurs, inserted in the Additions to Castelnau's Memoirs, has these words: The king, to reward the said marshal for his services, made him a duke and peer, gave him great pensions, and wanted only for the constable's death, who was very old, to give him his place.

GONZAGA, (CECILIA DE) was one of the most virtuous and learned women that lived in the XVth century. She was instructed in polite learning by Victorinus of Feltri, and made a wonderful progress; for, if I am not mistaken, what we read in a book of Ambrosius Camaldulensis ought to be understood of her [A]. Her mother,

[A] What we read in . . . Ambrosius Camaldulensis ought to be understood of her.] If you read his Hodegopicon, you will find (1), that Victorinus Feltrius taught polite learning at Mantua, with great reputation, and instructed the children of the lord of that place: This was John-Francis Gonzaga. He had a daughter about eight years old, who understood the declensions and conjugations of the Greek tongue, mother, Paula Malatesta, a lady most eminent for her virtue, learning, and beauty, inspired her with a contempt of the world [B], and made her desire to be a nun. This desire was too strong to yield to any oppositions. Cecilia harangued her father, who was against her renouncing matrimony, and with substantial reasons demonstrated to him the justice of her design (a). I have said elsewhere (b) what books she was advised to read, when she was engaged in a religious life. Mr Joly has been guilty of some mistakes [C].

tongue, whereof she gave a proof before the most learned Ambrosius, general of the Camaldoli, when he passed by the city of Mantua in the year 1432. Principis filiam octo ferme annorum ita imbuerat (Victorinus Feltrius) ut legeret jam & scriberet, Græcæque & nomina & verba inoffense declinaret non sine admiratione nostrâ. These are Ambrosius's words in the account of his travels, that is, of the visits he made to many houses of the order, of which he was general. What follows, must, I think, relate to a later journey. I take it from Mr Joly (2): *What is said of another girl, in the life of Ambrosius * general of the order of the Camaldoli, is much more remarkable: Ambrosius, being sent by Pope Eugenius IV to the council of Basil, came to a castle called Gorda, in the territory of Mantua, where he found two children, one a boy of fourteen years of age, who repeated before him two hundred verses he had composed, with such a grace, that he did not believe Virgil pronounced the sixth book of his Æneid before Augustus with a better: It is not said who this youth was: but as to the girl, we have the following account of her †. He saw also the prince's daughter, (that is the duke (3) of Mantua's) about ten years of age, who wrote Greek to elegantly, that Ambrosius would have desired no more in any learned man.*

I believe the same young lady is meant in both these journeys, and that it is she, who is the subject of this article.

Note, that Victorinus Feltrius was a very famous man. This is what Leander Albertus says of him in his description of Italy (4): 'Illustrantur Feltrium in genia quedam nobilia, nominatim Victorinus memoria nostrorum avorum linguæ Latinæ, quæ tam diu perierat, reductor ac instaurator. Feltria was famous for some great wits, particularly Victorinus, in the memory of our grand-fathers, the restorer of the Latin tongue, so long lost.'

[B] Paula Malatesta . . . eminent for her virtue . . . inspired her with a contempt of the world. Leander Albertus praises her very much, and declares, she was celebrated by all the authors of the time. 'Paula, Francis primi Gonzagæ Mantuani Marchionis conjux, non solum excellenti formæ pulchritudine (venustissima quippe totius Italiæ habebatur) sed etiam multis virtutibus, literis, prudentia, sanctitate, quæ decorata (5). — Paula, wife of the first Francis Gonzaga, marquise of Mantua, a lady not only of an excellent beauty (for she was esteemed the handsomest woman in Italy) but of many virtues, learning, prudence, and sanctity.' Speaking elsewhere of the same Francis Gonzaga, promoted to the marquise of Mantua by the emperor Sigismund, the twenty second of September, 1433, he says, 'Uxor rem habuit lectionissimam feminam, religione, sapientia, pudicitia, literisque decoratam Paulam Malatestam, ab omnibus illorum temporum scriptoribus ob singulares virtutes mirifice laudatam (6). — His wife was a most extraordinary lady, for religion, wisdom, chastity, and learning: her name was Paula Malatesta, praised for her singular virtues by all the writers of that time.' Who could chuse but praise so incomparable a woman? She passed for the handsomest in all Italy, and yet she despised all the ornaments of the body, and omitting expences upon jewels and finery, she laid out a great deal upon building and repairing of churches, feeding the poor, and marrying young women, &c. She inspired our Cecilia with the same spirit, as Matthew Bossius informs us (7). 'Habuit Mantua Paulam Gonzagam illustrem foeminam univerſa Italia celeberrimam; quam si dixerò, corporis cultum contempniffe, omnem suam rem in ædificandis instaurandisque delubris, in pauperum Christi necessitatibus, in locandis nuptiisque tradendis virginibus, quæ quidem maxima sunt, erogasse, si nihil unquam illam omiſſiſſe, quod ad veram humilitatem culmenque virtutis conducit, si omnis denique ingenioli mei vires in ejus laudibus expendam, parum dixiſſe me profecto semper agnoscam. Primam Paulam, cujus modo mentionem fecimus (8), imitata Cæciliam virginem suam filiam literarum peritissimam suo educatu, suæque imitatione ad tantam sæcularium ornamentorum, ut ita dixerim, nauscam perduxit, & ad religionem inflammavit, ut apud patrem primum Mantuæ Marchionem vincere ejus propositum cupientem, causam constanter tiffimè agere non sit verita. — Mantua bad Paula Gonzaga, an illustrious lady, famed over all Italy; of whom if I shall relate, that she despised drests that she spent her estate in building and repairing churches, in supplying the necessities of Christ's poor, in placing out and marrying virgins; that she omitted nothing, which can conduce to true humility and consummate virtue; if, lastly, I should exert the whole force of my little abilities in her praises, I shall always acknowledge that I fall short of her desert. In imitation of the first Paula, whom I have just mentioned, she inspired her virgin daughter Cecilia, a very learned maid, by the force of education and example, with such a disrelish of worldly ornaments, and such a religious zeal, that she was not afraid to plead her cause strenuously to her father, the first marquis of Mantua.' These words are taken from a discourse, that Matthew Bossius (9) inscribed to cardinal Bessarion, exhorting him not to suffer the women of Bologna to re-assume their ornaments.

[C] Mr Joly has been guilty of some mistakes. I will not abridge his discourse, because many will be glad to learn what I should leave out. Upon a due consideration of those times, says he (10), we may say, they were more fruitful in learned women, than others, though ignorance was then very great among the men. For in the end of the XVth century, we hear of a Paula Gonzaga, daughter of the marquis of Mantua, a nun; of a Baptista, widow of the lord of Arimini; of the daughters of John Ferrusini, a Milanese civilian, whom Margaret their mother took as much care to & cii. have instructed in the Greek and Latin tongue, as since Sir Thomas More has done with his of Iſta No-garola of Verona, whither cardinal Bessarion going on purpose to visit her, said, She was a virgin more divine than human; of Violanta, widow to the prince of Cesena, and afterwards a nun of the order of St Francis, all mentioned by Matthew Bossius & also a Veronese, and regular canon of St Austin. This is committing more than one fault, to say, that the learned woman, named Paula, mentioned by Matthew Bossius, lived at the end of the XVth century, and that she was the daughter of the marquis of Mantua, and a nun. She was of the house of Malatesta; and since her husband was the first marquis of Mantua (11), she cannot be placed at the end of the XVth century; for this marquis died in the year 1444 (12), having had many children by her. If it were true, that he married her in the year 1410, as Mr de Marolles (13) affirms, Mr Joly's error would be more manifest. Add to this, that Matthew Bossius observes, that she disposed her daughter Cecilia to a religious life: he does not say, that she entered upon it, finding herself a widow. I have not this author's letters, and so I cannot say, whether the learned Baptista be there found to have been married to the lord of Arimini. I only know, that he does not say it in the other work, cited by Mr Joly. I know moreover, that she was of the family of Malatesta, which governed at Arimini (14). However, I am very certain, that this lady had a great credit throughout the whole city; for her example, her exhortations, and her orders, obliged the women of Arimini to modesty of dress, and to leave off their long trains. Such a reformation is not the work of a lady of an indifferent authority and merit. It is one of the most difficult enterprises that can be undertaken. However, let us see at large the noble eulogy, that Matthew Bossius has given this Christian heroine, the Baptista insignem Ariminensem solum habuit singularem humilitate, pariter & literarum studiis præditam, quæ adeo animi ornamenta corporalibus prætulit, ut nihil learning of this lady, and observed, that Leonard Arc-there was a nun named Paula Gonzaga; I only say, that it is not she that Matthew Bosius has spoken of:

GONZAGA (ELEONORA), daughter of Francis II, marquis of Mantua, and wife to Francis Maria de la Rovere, duke of Urbino [A], in the XVIth century, made herself famous by her excellent qualities. She discovered a great constancy in her ill fortune, and a great moderation in her prosperity. She always loved her husband, and was his faithful companion in his disgraces [B]. But, above all virtues she cherished chastity, which she made very apparent by her severity against women of a bad life [C]. She had five children, two sons and three daughters. Guido Ubaldo de la Rovere, her eldest son, was duke of Urbino; the younger was duke of Sora, and cardinal. Hippolyta, the eldest of the daughters, was married to Antony of Arragon, duke of Montalto. Julia, the second, married Alfonso d'Est, marquis of Mon-tecchio. Isabella, the youngest, was married to Alberic Cibo, prince of Malespina, and marquis of Massa (a).

son to that John de la Rovere, to whom Sixtus IV gave the principality of Sora and Senegaglia, and who married Joan de Montefeltro, daughter of Frederic de Montefeltro, duke of Urbino. Our Francis Maria, the issue of this marriage, became duke of Urbino after the death of Guidobaldo de Montefeltro, his uncle by

[B] . . . and was his faithful companion in his disgraces.] Leo X, having made Laurence de Medicis his nephew, duke of Urbino, divested Francis Maria de la Rovere of this duchy. This was the misfortune, in which Eleonora shewed a great constancy in adversity, under the injurious blows of fortune, which her husband received, whilst for some time he was deprived of dominions; which never made her abate of her usual generosity, or entire fidelity to her husband, keeping him company, and comforting him in his misfortune, in which, as a woman of honour, she would always bear a share (2). They were restored to their duchy after the death of Laurence de Medicis (3). The husband died in the year 1538 (4). Paul Jovius greatly praises him (5).

[C] She shewed her love for chastity by her severity against women of a bad life. For she would neither see at her house, nor have any familiarity with women of quality, who were the least suspected or reported to have defiled the honour of their sex by the disorder of their conduct; and she was a mortal enemy to all those, who gave themselves up to the infamous pleasures of debauchery, banishing many from her dominions, and severely punishing those wretched old women, who, after having lost, in their youth, shame and honour, conscience and reputation, think of nothing continually, at the end of their days, but how to ruin and destroy young, filly, and unadvised maids. And therefore she is worthy of an eternal remembrance, for never being sparing of her money in rescuing all the innocent abused doves out of the talons of the hawks, and consecrating them to the altars, where afterwards they have done wonders in point of virtue (6). This was filling up all the duties of a virtuous princess, which she could not be said to have done, had she contented herself with an exact observation of her conjugal loyalty. This may suffice for the generality of women, but not for those women, who are of the first rank. They are indispensably obliged to stamp a mark of infamy on intriguing women, by manifest testimonies of their indignation. This stain is a more effectual lesson, than the most eloquent sermons of a pious preacher; and it is certain, that the corruption of a court, that proceeds from womens galantry, is a blot upon the life of a sovereign prince, though she be never so chaste and virtuous; for if she excluded from her familiarity women of ill fame, if she denied them admittance to her palace, if at least she mortified them by marks of coldness and censures, whilst she expresses her esteem and affection for chaste women, she would infallibly produce a reformation of manners. Whence we may conclude, that, if galantry walks barefaced, it is a sign, that the chief lady makes but little outward distinction betwixt those that give occasion to scandal, and others of an unblameable conduct. See what has been said in another place (7). If it be said, that this connivance is not to be attributed to want of zeal for the propagation of chastity, but to a certain good nature, that will not suffer the torrent to be opposed with the necessary vigour; I will still maintain, that this softness of temper, or good nature, is a great fault on the like occasions.

GONZAGA (ISABELLA DE), the wife of Guido Ubaldo de Montefeltro (a), duke of Urbino, deserves to be reckoned amongst the most illustrious ladies. One of her panegyrist calls her a woman, for her goodness, integrity, courage, and nobleness, more divine than humane (b). She had such a chastity, as deserves to be admired: but some circumstances are told of it, that appear fabulous; for it is said, that, after she had lain two years with her husband, though he had done nothing of what they call conjugal duty, she remained fully persuaded that nothing was wanting to her marriage [A], and that [A] After having lain two years with her husband, though he had never performed the conjugal duty, she was fully persuaded, that nothing was wanting to her marriage. I will use the words of Hilarion de Coste the Minime: 'She was one of those, the apostle speaks of, who are married, as if they were not; for either by reason of her tender age, or the simplicity of her temper, she lived for two years together in so profound an ignorance of the sacrament she was engaged in, as to think other married women came was like her's: in this resembling the wife of the antient Hiero, who complained not of her husband's stinking breath, thinking that the breath of all other men was as strong. But age, by a secret and not insensible

that all other husbands were like her's. At last she was undeceived, and her husband himself confessed his infirmity to her, when he perceived she understood the nature of it [B]; but she nevertheless continued her tender affection to him; she comforted him, and never complained, nor revealed the state of her marriage to any body. Nevertheless, this secret came to be publicly known [C], and then she was strongly solicited to think of another match: it was made appear to her, that she might very easily get her marriage declared null; and they represented many other forcible considerations to her: but nothing moved her [D]. She was troubled, that her husband's impotency was known, and nothing but the death of the duke could part them. His death cast her almost ble lesson, having taught her what neither the most barbarous nations nor the most stupid women are ignorant of, our corrupt nature being but too much inclined to sensual pleasures, or whether the free company she kept, as a married woman, with women in the same state, taught her things she did not know, her ignorance went off (1). It is not probable, she had been so long ignorant in such an affair as this. Most of this monk's readers have doubtless said, that a maid of so great innocence, as to the theory, must be taken for one that is but five or six years old. Indeed there reigns a very bad custom in families, whether it cannot be prevented, or whether it is hoped it will be of some use, or whether a secret providence suffers it for the temporal good of the universe. When children come to a certain age, they are told of nothing but mistresses and sparks. Little girls, are told, that, if they do not mend their faults, they shall never have a husband. They are promised the conquest of a galant, provided they do such or such a thing (2). An hundred promises and threats of this kind are continually offered them. The housemaids, landresses, seamstresses, and chamber-maids, &c. go much farther: they whisper to them the meaning of all this. A thousand occasions naturally offer themselves. Marriages are made from time to time amongst their neighbours and relations. There is a curiosity to go to church to hear the ceremony of the nuptial benediction, which frequently happens: and this affords an ample subject of conversation, both aloud, and with a low voice, for the mysterious instruction of the little female novices. This instruction is especially given in the interval of the preliminaries to the wedding, or rather between the contract and the wedding-day. By this means the theory of matrimony comes to be well known before a woman be marriageable. But put the case, that a maid could be secured from secret conversations, in which the servants and other women love to satisfy, or even prevent the curiosity of nature: put the case, I say, that a maid should be delivered to an husband, as ignorant in the theory, as in the practice, could she long remain so? Is there not another universally prevailing custom? Are not the new brides asked a thousand questions the next day? If their mothers, out of decency, forbear to question them, do they not employ other women? Can the aunts, cousins, friends, &c. forbear to be inquisitive? It cannot therefore be imagined, that our duchess of Urbino should have been two years after her marriage in the ignorance, that this Minime imputes to her.

[B] Her husband himself confessed his infirmity to her when he perceived that she knew the nature of it. We will go on in the words of the same Minime (3): 'The duke her husband, perceiving, that the duchess of Isabella had discovered his infirmity, was forced to declare to her his impotency in very modest terms, testifying by his discourse the great affliction it was to him to see himself incapacitated to leave heirs to his dominions; and that, if this came to the knowledge of his subjects, he should be less beloved. Upon this melancholy discourse, the prudent and virtuous Isabella, with a joyful and serene countenance, began to comfort him, exhorting him to bear this disgrace with a perfect resignation to the will of God: that many kings and great princes had been, and were at present, under that affliction; and that it is commonly better to have no children, than to have wicked and vicious ones; the old proverb being generally true, Filii Heroum nauxæ, that is, Heroes beget nothing but monsters, ungrateful and unnatural children, fatal incendiaries, and the ruin of their families, estates, commonwealths, and fathers that beget them: that, for her part, she would not be concerned for it, and that it would not in the least abate her love and affection: that she would preserve her virginity to the grave, that, whilst a defect of nature hindered him from enjoying what was designed him, no body else should ever possess it, and that no body should ever know any thing of the matter.'

[C] Nevertheless this secret came to be publicly known. Hilarión de Coste (4) having made an exclamation against those, who say, that women cannot keep a secret, adds, 'that the duchess of Urbino more faithfully kept her secret and promise to her husband than he did, having lived fourteen years with him without ever discovering the defect of her marriage by any complaint: for the first years, she concealed it through youth and ignorance, and afterwards out of honour and virtue, and the obligation of secrecy. Not only the people of the duchy of Urbino, and the inhabitants of the fine city of Pesaro, but even the most intimate and familiar domestics, and the principal lords of their court, were ignorant, that this defect and barrenness proceeded from the duke; on the contrary, they rather attributed it to the duchess. Nor had it ever been known, if the duke himself had not told it, when, being driven out of his dominions by Cæsar Borgia, duke of Valentinois, he came to wait on our king Lewis XII, who was then in his duchy of the Milanese, and city of Milan, to whom he had recourse to be restored to his dominions; but not obtaining his desires, because the king was in league with Pope Alexander VI, father of the duke of Valentinois, and feared the hatred of the house of Borgia against him and his family, he gave them hopes of parting with his wife, and becoming an ecclesiastic; affirming he had never consummated the marriage, by reason of his impotency; and, being asked by the king, he certified the truth of it. Thus this secret, being revealed by the husband, was divulged through all the territories of Urbino and Italy, where the meanest people knew, that Ubaldo de la Rovere (5), duke of Urbino, was only a man in face, or that if he was a man, he could not be ranked among husbands; and all the world admired the constancy and modesty of his prudent and chaste princess Isabella Gonzaga: her constancy, because, tho' she might have had her marriage declared null, yet she would not, chusing rather to be silent, than to pollute her lips: her modesty, by that heroic act of it, having lived above twenty years, without being ashamed of having such a husband.'

[D] She was strongly solicited to think of another match. But nothing moved her. Here the monk strains his throat, and lifts up his voice like a trumpet (6). 'What a wonderful chastity of a woman! what an incredible constancy! what a perfect and unparalleled virtue! thus to live twenty years with an husband in the same house in the same palace! here is a true pattern of chastity, and a demonstrative proof, that the spirit and virtue have more power than the flesh and sensuality; and that conjugal faith and affection prevail over the inferior lust, and the brutish part. How few others would have thus concealed the secret, I do not say for fourteen years, but for fourteen months, which she kept, not twenty months, but twenty years, and even to the death of her husband, without voiding the marriage: when, being intreated, importuned, and almost forced by all sorts of powerful persons, that were her relations, to separate from her husband, for a thousand urgent considerations they laid before her, she would never hearken to them; but, on the contrary, constantly maintained, that the fault lay not in him, taking it ill to have it said otherwise; and she was much concerned when the truth of the story came to light. O most faithful and chaste princess! let thy example dazzle the eyes of those women, who, led by almost into despair, and her affliction had like to have proved truly mortal [E]. Note, that she was married twenty years (c). The exclamations of a Minime, who has praised her, are pardonable considering the rarity of the thing; but he might have been a little more moderate without transgressing the rules of a good Rhetorician. Our Isabella spent the rest of her days in a glorious widowhood. She was aunt to Eleonora Gonzaga, whom she married to a nephew of Julius II, that is, to Francis Maria de la Rovere, who succeeded her husband in the duchy of Urbino. By that you will see at what time she lived; and, if you read Il Cortegiano of Balthasar Castiglione, you will see her very much praised; and you will see, that the court of Urbino was then very polite. I will mention what Peter Bembo said of this duchess [F].

(7) *Eloges des

Tom. I, pag.

‘by the spirit of sensuality, without grounds, or with the least pretence and frivolous reason, break a marriage concerted by the consent of relations, and celebrated in the face of the church, procuring I know not what dispensations under pretence of misunderstandings, which will only serve as a chain to drag them to damnation; whilst you, a young, beautiful, and noble lady, who might have lawfully procured a divorce, have shewn your marriage to be rather a match of the mind than of the body.’ After this he observes four great subjects of admiration in her victory over herself (7). 1. Through abundance of courage and virtue, she never separated from her husband, tho’ she might lawfully do it. 2. The affection she had for her husband made her renounce the common and reasonable desire of all married people of leaving children behind them. . . . which ought to be the more admired in this great princess, because she saw the direct line of a sovereign house end in her husband. 3. She had the prudence to accompany him every where, that she might not manifest this prince’s imperfection. The fourth wonder is, that, considering the liberty of a person of quality, and the numbers of men she conversed with, she preserved her virginity entire. The circumstances of the fourth point are confirmed by Balthasar Castiglione, who says, that the court of Urbino was full of gentlemen accomplished in body and mind, who spent all the day in exercises suitable to their condition, and, after supper, met at the duchess’s chamber, whilst the duke, who went early to his repose, by reason of his distempers, was in bed. Erano adunque tutte l’hore del giorno divise honorevoli & piacevoli esercitii, così del corpo, come dell’animo: ma perché il S. Duca continuamente per la infirmità, dopo cena assai per tempo se n’andava a dormire, ogn’uno per ordinario dove era la S. Duchessa Elisabetta Gonzaga, a quell’hora si riduceva (8). I will relate what he observes of the duke’s infirmity, which gives reason to believe, that Hilarion de Coste has followed some writers who have too much exaggerated things. Observe well what I am going to say. The duke was very well made, vigorous, and nimble (9); but, at twenty years of age (10), he grew so prodigious gouty, that he could not move himself. He married, doubtless, before he was reduced to that condition; which makes it highly probable that he consummated the marriage. Tis true, the same author informs us, that the duchess was solicited to separate from her husband, since her marriage was a state of widowhood; which is a sign she was taken for a maid; for an impotency, succeeding the accomplishment of marriage, is no just cause of divorce. ‘Non posso piu tacere una parola della Signora Duchessa nostra, la quale essendo vivuta xv. anni in compagnia del marito, comme vedova, non solamente è stata costante di non palesar mai questo a persona del mondo, ma essendo da suoi proprii stimolata da ufcir di questa viduità, elesse piu presto patir effluio, povertà, & ogni altra forte d’infelicità, che accettar quello, che a tutti gli altri pareva gran gratia, & prosperità di fortuna: & sequitando pur Messer Cesare circa questo, disse la Signora Duchessa, Parlate d’altro, & non intrate piu in tal proposito, che

(10) Odaxius, in this prince’s Funeral Oration, says, that it was at twenty one years of age.

(a) This excuses me from saying, that she lived in the XVth century.

‘affai d’altre cose havete che dire (11). — I cannot omit a saying of our duchess, who, having lived fifteen years in the company of her husband, as a widow, not only persisted in not declaring this to any person in the world, but, being solicited by her relations to take advantage of this widowhood, chose rather to suffer exile, poverty, and every other misfortune, than to embrace this, which to every one else appeared great good luck: and, being solicited upon this head by Mr Cesar, she bid him say no more of it, but talk of something else.’ You see in these words an admirable instance of that lady’s modesty; she would not be praised; she turned off the conversation, whenever any body went about to shew the merit of her continence.

Note, that Christoforo Bronzini, who made this lady’s encomium, says the same things, and with the same exclamations as this Minime. See the Giornata quinta of his dialogues della dignità e nobiltà delle Donne (12).

[E] Her affliction had like to have proved truly mortal. Father Hilarion de Coste finds himself at a loss how to give proofs of the love and prudence she expressed in mourning for her husband; for . . . as long as he was alive she never gave way to her tears . . . least her affliction expressed by them should cause another in him; but, as soon as ever he was dead, she indulged her grief, which made her fall upon him, crying out, O my dear husband, why will you leave me thus, and whither do you go? Having spoken those words, she fainted away, and lost her speech, and remained as it were half dead: some believed her truly dead, having much ado to recover her spirits; so that they lamented at once the death of both. But GOD was pleased, that she should come to herself again, by degrees, opening her eyes and lifting them up towards heaven: afterwards she cast them upon those about her, and by way of complaint and reproach told them; how troublesome you are to me? why do you use me so cruelly, as to hinder me from following my most honoured lord and husband? why will you not suffer me to be his companion in death; with whom I have spent the best of my life? what a wretched creature am I; he must go, and I must stay behind! No, no, I can never be persuaded to it, I must follow him. As soon as she had uttered these complaints, her eyes, like two fountains, gushed out with tears, and no other answer could be got from her for two days together, refusing to sleep or eat, but that she could not survive her husband (13).

[F] I will mention what Peter Bembo said of this duchess. The author of the tract, entitled, De Matrimonio Literati, an calibem esse an verò nubere conveniat (14), alledges the great merit of some women, and does not forget this. ‘Quid de Elizabetha Gonzaga? says he, quam Bembo ita laudat ut lapideum eum esse dicat qui non unam ejus festinulam culam omnibus Philosophorum ambulationibus & disputationibus anteponat. — What shall we say of Elizabetha Gonzaga? whom Bembo so far commends as to say, he must be as stupid as a stone, who does not prefer one sitting of her to all the walkings and disputations of the philosophers.’

GONZAGA (JULIA), duchess of Traietta, and countess of Fondi, was the wife of Vespasian Colonna. After the death of her husband, she took for her device, ‘an amaranth, which the Botanists call Love-flower, with this motto, non moritura, designing to express, that her first love should be immortal. The wonder is, that her husband was old; that she was in the flower of her age, and in so great a reputation for her beauty, that Soliman, emperor of the Turks, had a desire to see her. To this end, he sent Barbarossa, king of Algiers (a), and his lieutenant-general, with a powerful army, to Fondi, where she made her usual residence: but he succeeded not in his design;

design; for, tho' this general arrived by night, and took the town by storm, the fair and chaste Julia fell not into the hands of the Barbarian. Whether she had notice given her of the danger that threatened her, or whether she was divinely inspired, she fled barefooted upon the first noise she heard; and, to save her honour, exposed her life to a thousand dangers (b). This lady was suspected of Lutheranism (c). Thuanus, Francis Billon, and other authors, praise her for her learning, which made her esteemed by the most learned men in Italy (d). The reason why she did not marry again is considerable [A]. One may very well question, whether she acted the part of a step-mother without retaining some faults of it [B]. We shall see how Brantome has related Barbarossa's adventure [C].

[A] The reason why she did not marry again is considerable. After her husband's death, she was courted by the greatest lords of Italy, who could not induce her to a second marriage; because she said, that, if her second husband should prove good, she should be in perpetual fear of losing him; and if he should prove bad, it would be a grievous thing to bear; and that, having had a good one, she would never remove from her heart the affection she bore him (1). She was very fortunate in not having her eyes tempted by a charming object; for in that case her dilemma would have been quickly destroyed. In vain did Dido say:

Sed mihi vel tellus optem prius ima dehiscat,
Vel pater omnipotens adigat me fulmine ad umbras, Pallentes umbras Erebi, noctemque profundam;
Ante, pudor, quam te violo, aut tua jura resolvo.
Ille meos, primus qui me sibi junxit, amores
Abtulit; ille habeat secum, servetque sepulchro (2).

Let earth, disparting, snatch me from the light,
Or thunder drive me to the shades of night;
Immediate death be wretched Dido's fate,
Ere, modesty, thy laws I violate.
My love, which one dear object only knew,
Is still to my Sisyæus' memory true.

The noble carriage (3) and the merit of Æneas had already made an impression and renewed the traces (4). She could not withstand a second match, and forgot her fine resolutions. Generally speaking, Julia Gonzaga's dilemma may be turned another way; for it may be said, if my second husband be an ill one, I shall not be afraid of losing him; if he be good, he will make me very happy; besides, they, who have lost a good husband, may alledge this argument: I have sped so well in marriage, that I am willing to re-enter into the state I have so much reason to commend. They, who have lost a bad husband, may say; there is reason I should try whether I shall be more happy in a second choice than in the first: I ought not to die without endeavouring to mend my self.

[B] There is room to doubt, whether she acted the part of a step-mother, without retaining some of the faults of it. It is a very difficult part: the wisest heads find it a hard task to come off well; there is a certain fate, that possesses mothers-in-law with a great deal of ill humour. Be that how it will, the monk I have cited informs us (5), that Vespasian Colonna had by his first wife (6) a daughter named Isabella, whom our Julia, her mother-in-law, designing to marry to Lewis Gonzaga her brother, opposed Pope Clement VII (who had a mind to marry her to Dom. Hippolito his nephew, who was afterwards cardinal) and the emperor Charles V. who had seized on her, to marry her to Dom-Ferdinand Gonzaga; and by her courage and industry, she accomplished her design. But did she consult the inclinations of the young lady? that is the question. Perhaps Isabella Colonna would have rather chosen the match proposed by Clement VII. or by the emperor, than her step-mother's. Is not this to act like a step-mother, to force the inclination in such a point as this?

[C] We shall see how Brantome has related Barbarossa's adventure. There is such another story, which was told me in the town of Fondi, near Naples, and which is in every body's mouth in that country, about Signora Livia (7) Gonzaga who had married Afcario (8) Colonna: she was reckoned the finest woman in Italy of her time, and was in such repute, that the fame of her beauty reached the Levant, (I have often seen her picture as a widow, which confirms it), and Constantinople; for which reason Ariadan Barbarossa, who was general of the Grand Signor's sea-forces, having first, with a very solemn pomp, (as it is written) passed the straits of Messina, and coasted along Calabria, committed great ravages there, and about Naples, and made an attempt upon the town of Fondi, and came there by night so opportunely and unexpectedly, that, landing two thousand Turks, they scaled the walls, and took the town, and seized upon the castle, where the lady Livia Gonzaga was asleep in bed; who, hearing the alarm, was so surprized, as to start up in the fright, and had only time to leap out of the window in her shift; which she did so seasonably, escaping through the mountains, that the Turks entered her chamber just as she was escaped out of it. They say, that Barbarossa designed her for a present to the Grand Signor, and that the enterprize was made on that account; and that, when he found he had missed of her, he was like to run mad: but the lady's ill-fortune would have it, that, thumping Scylla, she fell into Charybdis, falling in her flight amongst the banditti of the kingdom; and she was known by some and not by others. I therefore leave you to judge, whether such a dainty bit, when in the power of those famished wretches, was not actually tasted by them: some believe it, and some not. But whatever oaths she made, she could not be believed, since so noble a morsel could never escape such people without being polluted. The most cleared, and who understand these matters, and have had a taste of them, can but too well speak of them: thus you see how easily men and women damn themselves by their oaths; for even the finest queens and princesses, if they should fall into such hazards, would be no more spared than others, since a great beauty carries no passport along with it, and love in that case uses its authority without respect of persons; and yet they will protest and swear, that their greatness dashed the insolence of those who would attempt them, and God knows (9).

Varillas (10) has taken from this book of Brantome all that he has said of the adventures of Julia Gonzaga.

He is mistaken as to the time: he places this in the year 1537, whereas he should have followed Paulus Jovius (11) who speaks of it under the year 1534.

[A] She heightened the nobility of her birth by her learning. There is no learning in her letters; but yet we may perceive by them that she was a learned woman: for, writing to Robertel, she declared that his commentary had made her understand many obscure passages of Aristotle, and the poet Æschylus.

to praise her [B]. She wrote such fine letters, that they were eagerly collected for the press. I have seen the collection of them, which was published at Venice in 1552. They inform us, that her marriage with John Paul Manfrone was very unfortunate. He was a man who did not deserve her by his wealth; she married him against her will, being but fourteen years of age (a). She easily comforted herself for not living with him in all the figure her quality required. We cannot see a finer piece of morality, than what is to be found in a letter she wrote to a monk (b), who lamented her being married to such a mean country 'squire [C]; but she was very much concerned and dis-cause he taught his daughter astrology; but understanding the great service, that Sulpitius Gallus had done to the Romans, and Pericles to the Greeks, by their skill in astrology, she had a mind to learn it, and intreated Lewis Pico to instruct her in that science (2). One of the things she studied most was rhetoric (3). It appears also, that she learned a great deal of logic from Bandel her master (4), and that he read Euripides to her (5).

[B] The wits of that time failed not to praise her.] Hortensio Lando was her most zealous and best panegyrist. He made a very fine encomium on this lady. See the letter (6), in which she modestly thanked him and represented to him (7), that it had been better for him to keep his ingenious thoughts, and his fine expressions, for a panegyric upon the Signora Marchesana (8). I say this to make known the name of another very famous lady of that age. The same author dedicated to our Lucretia his dialogue, Del temperar gli affetti d'ell'animo (9). There was a great correspondence by way of letters betwixt her and him: he wrote to him above thirty that have been printed. To say something of that in the 215th page, we find there Hortensio Lando a little censured for his violent discontent at his poverty. She blames him for being afflicted at a thing, the advantages whereof she reckons up to him. 'Essendo voi persona

Jerome Ruscelli was one of this lady's panegyrist. This appears by a letter she wrote to him, which begins thus: 'Insieme col panegirico fatto da non so cui; in mia commendatione, hò ancho letto la bella & prolissa lettera che per voi vi si è aggiunta; nella quale, m'havete ritratta col pennello della vostra faccenda, tale, quale io doveri essere per haver quella perfectione che non hò (11). — Together with a panegyric by an unknown hand: I have this day read the fine, long, letter you have added to it, in my praise; in which your eloquent pen has drawn me such, as I ought to be, to be mistress of this perfection, which I have not.' Read also the other letter she wrote to him (12). A memoir which I have from good hands, informs me, 'that Bandel dedicated to her one of his novels, viz. the twenty first of the second part. And it is upon those stanzas that Julius Cæsar Scaliger, a great friend to Bandel, made a sorry epigram, intitled, de Bandelli amoribus Thufca lingua decantatis (31). Perhaps the reader will not be displeased to find it here.

Greatest of Phæbus's sons, whose numbers flow
With Nectar, such as Homer's only know, Say, how is thy exalted fancy fir'd,
By love's soft influence alone inspir'd?
So bright a nymph we in thy numbers see,
Mad'st thou her fair, or she a poet thee?
Thy verse, that bids to heav'n thy mistress rise, Lifts thy own fame above the starry skies;
And fair Lucretia, deis'd by thee,
Repays her poet with divinity.

See, in the nymphs of the same author, the piece intitled, Pro Diva Lucretia Gonzaga Pyrrbi filia canit Talaris (15), and, in the Heroids the epigram (16) it is in the intitled, Lucretia Pyrrbi Gonzaga F (16). But especially see the Rime di diversi autori in lode di donna Lucretia Gonzaga, printed at Bologna in the year 1565, in 4to. Here is another passage of Matthew Bandel (17), from which we may learn the name of Lucretia's mother, and some other particulars. Thus he speaks: 'A la molto illust. e virtuosa Heroina la S. Isabella Gonzaga di Poccino, dedicating to her the 57th novel of the first part. Essendo troppo al mondo manifestato il debito e obbligo che io ho a la felice e honorata memoria del valoroso S. Pirro Gonzaga, e de la gentilissima S. Camilla Bentivoglia, vostri honoratissimi padre e madre che tanto m'amavano, e tutto il di con nuovi beneficii m'obligavano, e mentre vissero, furono da me (secondo le debolissime forze mie) sempre tenuti in quella riverenza che io seppi la maggiore, come ne le Stanze mie si vederà che io in lode ho composte de la vostra nobilissima Sorella dal mondo riverita e da me santissimamente amata, la Signora Lucretia, le quali in breve saranno publicate, ove ancora vederete il nome vostro essere celebrato. — To the illustrious and virtuous heroine, Isabella Gonzaga di Poccino Is being too manifest to the world how much I am indebted to the happy and honourable memory of the brave Peter Gonzaga, and the most noble lady Camilla Bentivoglia, your very honoured father and mother, who shewed me such repeated marks of their favour, and whom I shall always hold in the utmost reverence, as my stanzas testify, which I composed in honour of the most noble Lucretia, your sister revered by the world, and whom I most affectionately loved; which stanzas I will soon publish, once more to celebrate your name.'

[C] A monk . . . who lamented her being married to such a mean country 'squire.] Thus I think I may translate these Italian words: 'Ho inteso che la riverenza vostra molto si è maravigliata che i miei maggiori mi maritassero mai in huomo di sì poche facultà, il quale m'haveste à condurre in una poco amena villuccia, & farmi habitare in una torre poco degna degli Avoli onde ne sono secondo la carne discesa; & per quanto appare dalle vostre scritte à mia sorella, assai ve ne dolette (18). — I am informed that your reverence is surprized at my marriage with a man so much beneath me, who may conduct me to a place unworthy my birth and ancestors; and by what appears in your letter to my sister you cannot sufficiently lament it.' But, lest the reader should have wrong notions of John Paul Manfrone, I must observe, that he was a much more considerable man than this monk thought. A letter of his wife's informs us, that he had had good posts in the Venetian army, and that he had built magnificent palaces. The following passage contains some other circumstances of his life. consolate for the conduct of her husband. He was very brave and haughty (c), and did some actions that went not unpunished. The duke of Ferrara had him carried away, and detained him many years in a severe prison (d). By the process he formed against him, he found him worthy of a capital punishment; but he was merciful, and would not put him to death (e). Our Lucretia laboured as much as possible to procure his liberty. She endeavoured to soften the duke of Ferrara by a very moving letter (f). She implored the intercession of Paul III (g), of Julius III (h), of the sacred college, of the emperor, of the king of France, and of all the other potentates of Christendom. She had recourse to the assistance of the court of heaven by her prayers, and those she caused to be put up in all the convents and churches; and, when she saw that nothing would do, she formed a resolution of addressing the great Turk (i), and writ to him a flattering and respectful letter (k), beseeching him to seize the fortrefs, in which her husband was confined, and to do no other prejudice to the Christian states. She most humbly thanked the duke of Ferrara (l) for sparing the life of a prisoner whom the judges found worthy of death [D]. But she was desirous to have his clemency carried farther. Her husband was not set at liberty; nor was she permitted to visit him: they could only write to one another (m); which did not satisfy her: and therefore she used her utmost endeavours to obtain his enlargement; but all her pains proved ineffectual. He died in prison (n), having expressed in his disgrace so great an impatience, that people thought he was beside himself (o). The answer his widow made to those, who proposed another match to her, deserves our admiration [E]. Of four children she had (p), there remained only two daughters (q), whom she put into convents (r). All the productions ullo essendo diligentemente studiò: ve ne priega il Polesino, dove molti anni praticò, & palazzi, & giardini con grande arte edificò: ve ne priega tutto il distretto Mantouano, dove sposandomi ben fanciulla, si imparentò: ve ne priega finalmente tutto il Senato Vinitiano, il qual hà fin dalle fascie per condottiere & fedelmente, & honoratamente sempre servito (19). — The whole territory of Vicenza, whence he drew his birth, petitions your holiness in his behalf: as does the city of Padua, in which, when a youth, he diligently studied: the Polesin, in which he practised many years, and built palaces and gardens with great art, joins in the petition: so does the district of Mantua, in which being very young, I was contrasted in marriage to him: lastly, the whole senate of Venice, in whose armies he served faithfully and honourably, becomes a petitioner to your holiness in his favour. These are the reasons his wife made use of to engage Paul III to intercede for him.

[D] She thanked the duke of Ferrara for sparing the life of a prisoner, whom the judges had found worthy of death. To understand perfectly the circumstances of this trial, we must see the history that Antony Brasavolus (20) has published of it. We find, in the epitome of Gesner's Bibliothéque, that the three first books of a volume of physic, written by Brasavolus, contained Historiam capiti & supplicio afflicti Pauli Manfroni propter infidias adversus duces & quomodo dux ei vitam donaverit, sed in carcere retinuerit (21). — The history of Paul Manfrone, taken, and to be punished, for plotting against the duke, and how the duke gave him his life, but kept him in prison.

[E] The answer of his widow to those, who proposed another match to her, deserves our admiration. I confess they did not observe decorum; they made too much haste; for they proposed the thing within less than a month after the burial of her husband. Widows, never so wanton and fond of marriage, would express some repentment against those, who should talk to them so suddenly of a second husband. Decency, custom, the formulary of the style of conversations, require an appearance of affliction for some time, and a seeming averseness to a second marriage; and, as those, who should think to ingratiate themselves by too early advices of matrimony, would have but an ill opinion of a widow's continence, it is requisite, that they should be answered with airs of indignation. I confess therefore, that those, who so hastily advised our Lucretia Gonzaga to a second husband, did not well observe the ceremonial. But I find, in her answer, I know not what that does her a great honour, and which does not resemble the artificial language of la Fontaine's young widow (22). 'Appena hò rasciutto le lagrime che giorno è notte mi sono con larghissima vena piovute da gli occhi: à fatica hò posto termine ai singhiozzi & ai sospiri: ne anche è compiuto il mese che l'infelice mio consorte è stato sepolto, & voi già mi parlate di rimaritare?

'non sapete voi casta non esser mai stata istimata, ch' due state si è maritata? Didone anchora presso di Virgilio, chiama sotto nome di colpa le seconde nozze, & voi con tanta istanza mi ci invitate? nò nò, io non voglio più sentire de fi fatti cordagli: ne altro marito intendo più di volere che GIESU CRISTO (23). — Scarce have I dried up the tears, which have, day and night, trickled plentifully from my eyes: with difficulty have I put an end to my sighs and groans: nor is it yet a full month, since my unhappy husband was buried: and do you already talk to me of marrying again? Know you not, that second marriages are deemed unchaste? Dido, in Virgil, calls such matches by the name of A Crime: and do you so earnestly invite me to it? No, no, I will think no more of such troublesome matters, nor will I have any other husband than JESUS CHRIST.

The remaining part of the letter turns upon the design of devoting herself for the future only to JESUS CHRIST as her husband. Our Lucretia goes too far in affirming, that a woman was never reckoned chaste that married again: but it is certain, that those, who would never marry again, and who lived in an unblameable widowhood, have always been more admired. We have seen our widow's answer to Orsola Pellegrini, who advised her to think of a second match, and that within the first month of her mourning. Let us see now how she answered Andriana Trivulcio, who did much better observe decorum; for he gave her not his advice till towards the end of the first year of her widowhood. Lucretia declared to him, that she wondered, when she had been so unhappy with her husband, that any one should propose to her to come again under the conjugal yoke, from which God had delivered her. Know, said she, that I would not do it, though I could meet with a husband wiser than Lælius, handsomer than Nireus, and as rich as Crassus. It is better to hear her in her own language (24).

'Non mi posso veramente pensare che fantasia vi sia venuta in capo, di procacciarmi marito, non essendo anchora consunto il cadavero di chi già prima à se di legittimo nodo mi legò, ilquale, mi hà fatto sentire tanti affanni, che se divina forza non mi haveffe aiutata, non haurai potuto mai resistere à tanti guai. Io dico finalmente mi hà restituito quella libertà, che m'era stata occupata dalla fraterna volontà, dandomi marito contra mia voglia: & voi, non so da qual spirito guidata, cercate di condurmi un'altra fiata sotto'l marital giogo: ponete pur il vostro core in pace, & pensate ad altro: che non ritoglierei marito s'egli fusse più savio di quel Lelio, che hebbe el titolo del savio, s'egli fusse più bello di Nireo, & s'egli possedesse le facultà di Crasso. — I cannot imagine how it came into your head to propose another husband to me, before the dead body of him, to whom I was first lawfully joined, be consumed; in whose lifetime, I underwent so much anxiety, that had I not been supported by heaven, I could never have born up against so great misfortunes: GOD, at last, has re-

Thus you see a widow very different from that of la Fontaine. She talks at the end of the year as if it were the first day; and therefore these four verses cannot be applied to her:

(29) Valerius Maximus, lib. ii, cap. i, n. 3.

I think myself obliged a little to soften the criticism I have made on this lady's thoughts, when I have said that there was an excess in her expressions. This excess may be excused by supposing, that our Lucretia had a little too respectfully espoused the maxims of St Jerome. The wisest critics observe, that this great saint has carried this matter too far. Here is a passage of Mr Daillé (26). I omit what at every turn he speaks reproachfully, both against marriage in general, and against second marriages in particular, using sometimes such harsh expressions, that, though he used all the cautions to explain them, that are to be found in his epistle to Pammachius upon this subject, yet it seems impossible to free them from the sense of Tertullian, condemned by the church as contrary to the honour of marriage, and the authority of scripture. For example, how is it possible to mollify what he writ to a lady named Furia *. That she will not be so commendable for remaining a widow, as she will be execrable by marrying again, not observing, though a Christian, what many women of her family had observed, being heathens: a thing which he repeats in the following epistle, exhorting Ageruchia to the same design †; and he brings some scandalous comparisons, applying to those, that marry again, the proverb St Peter uses to another purpose, a dog returning to his vomit, and a swine to her wallowing in the mire. Is not this clearly to reckon second marriages amongst filthy and polluted things? If you desire to know farther what relates to the modesty, which St Jerome ascribes to the female ancestors of Furia, read the article CAMILLA (27). I add, that the virtuous Lucretia Gonzaga was dazzled with the glory that surrounded, even among the heathens, the women that did not marry again. And so she concluded, that those women were not reputed chaste, that took a second husband. She had, doubtless, read the words I shall presently quote out of a heathen writer; from which we learn, that a crown of chastity was decreed to the women, who had been married but once, and that repeated marriages were looked upon as a sort of corruption. Quæ uno contentæ matrimonio fuerant, coronâ pudicitie honorabantur. Exultabant enim eum præcipuè matronæ sincera fide incorruptum esse animum, qui post depositæ virginis tatis cubile in publicum egredi nesciret: multorum matrimoniorum experientiam, quasi illegitimæ (28) cujusdam intemperantiæ signum esse credentes (29). I believe also she had read, in Tertullian, what privileges the heathens granted to women who had married but once. Monogamia apud Ethnicos in summo honore est: ut & virginibus nubentibus univira prouba adhibeatur, & sic auspicii initium est. Item in quibusdam solemnibus & auspiciis, ut prior sit univiræ locus. Certe Flaminia non nisi univira est. — Monogamy is in high esteem among the antients; inasmuch, that, when a virgin is married, they assign her a woman, that has been but once married, to perform the ceremony of bringing her home to the bridegroom's house. Likewise, on some solemn occasions, the precedence is given to the once-married woman. Flaminia is certainly of that number. Lippius alleges this passage of Tertullian in commenting on the place, where Tacitus observes, that Pollio's daughter was preferred to the daughter of Fonteius Agrippa, for this reason alone, that her mother had never any more than one husband. The question was about the election of a vestal. Prælatâ est Pollionis filia non ob aliud quam quod mater ejus in eodem conjugio manebat. Nam Agrippa discidio domum imminuerat (30). Lippius does not mention all the privileges spoken of by Tertullian: he does not say, that no women, but those who had observed monogamy (31), were permitted to put a crown on the head of Fortuna Muliebris (32). I say nothing of the epitaphs, whereon the epithet Univira was carefully remembered, in honour of the women, that did not marry twice; which shews, that this conduct was looked upon as a thing deserving immortality. Libanius's exclamation informs us, that this conduct was admired, amongst other reasons, because few instances of it were to be seen. This sophist, hearing, that St Chrysostome's mother was forty years old, and had been a widow twenty, cried out, Good GOD! what women are there among christians (33)!

The author of the news from the Republic of letters, says somewhere, that a certain encomium, which had been lately bestowed upon marriage, was built upon reasons that prove too much; and which destroy a notion that has been very common even amongst those, who, for political reasons, cast a kind of blot upon celibacy. This notion is, that a widow, who marries not again, is more esteemed, all other things being equal, than one that does. If we had not a vast number of authorities for this, the bare words of Virgil, which he makes Dido speak, would teach us what was the judgement of the ancients: (Æneid. IV. 28.)

Ille meos primus qui me sibi junxit, amores

Abstulit. Ille habet secum fervetque sepulchro.

*My love, which one dear object only knew,
Is still to my Sicæus' memory true.*

It must be granted, that the ideas of virtue are more favourable to the men, who marry a second time; yet it is certain, that such marriages have been subject formerly, and are still, to canonical penalties; and if we believe the learned civilian, who has written the Rights of the queen, the devolution, which takes place in some countries, was established only to bridle the incontinence of widowers, and to hinder them from marrying again, to the great prejudice of their children by the first wife (34). What he says of Dido was not unknown to the illustrious lady, who makes the subject of this article. I do not know whether she ever read the passage of Pausanias, which I have cited in the article GORGOPHON, or the reasons alleged by Plutarch, why the nuptials of virgins at Rome were never celebrated on festival-days, nor those of widows on work-days. According to Varro, the reason of this custom was, because nothing was to be done unwillingly on festival-days. Ἐορτῇ μὴδὲ λυπημένους ποιεῖν μηδὲ πρὸς ἀνάγκην. Festo die nihil cum molestia & coactione agendum (35). Now, added he, a widow marries again with pleasure, but a maid with reluctance. Λυπημέναι μὲν αἱ παρθέναι γαμήναι, χαίρουσαι δὲ αἱ γυναῖκες. Virgines nubere tristes, mulieres autem cum letitia (36). This thought would be unworthy of this learned man, if we took it literally; we must say therefore, that he spoke only of appearances. His meaning, no doubt, is, that festival-days, being designed for public rejoicings, mirth ought to appear in every face during those solemnities. Since then the laws of decorum oblige maids to appear serious and pensive on their wedding-day (37), and widows are dispensed with that affected grimace, maids are not married on festival-days, &c. Let us mention another reason alleged by Plutarch. He says, that marriage being honourable to maids, and scandalous to widows, the marriage of the former ought to be celebrated in the presence of many people; but, on the contrary, widows ought to desire to be married in the presence of few people; and for that reason they chuse a day, when the people mind other shews. Ἡ μάλιστα οὔτε ταῖς μὲν παρθένοις, καλὴν μὲν γὰρ metics were collected [F]: you will find many of them in the edition of her letters; and you will find likewise many marks of her virtue and piety. Her reprimands to some leud, covetous, or proud women, are very fine [G], and deserve to be read, as well γων, ταῖς δὲ χήραις αἰσχρὸν πολλῶν ὄντων γαμεῖσθαι (ἡλωτὸς γὰρ ὁ πρῶτος γάμος, ὁ δὲ δεύτερος ἀπεικταίῳ ἀισχύνοται γὰρ ἂν ζώντων τῶν περτέρων ἐτέρης λαμβάνωσιν, ὁδύονται δὲ ἂν ἀποθανόντων ὅθεν ἡσυχία χαίρουσι μᾶλλον ἢ θορύβοις καὶ περιστομαίσι· αἱ δὲ ἔορται πεισπῶσι τὰς πολλὰς, ὥς τοῖς τοῦτοῖς μὴ σχολάζειν. Aut quia decori est virginibus nuptias earum multis præsentibus peragi, idemque viduis dedecori? primæ enim nuptiæ optandæ sunt & in præcio: secundæ votis recufandæ, quod vel cum turpitudine nubunt vivente priore marito, vel cum læstu, si sit mortuus. Itaque viduæ ad suas nuptias quiete magis gaudent quàm frequentia hominum & tumultu: felicitatis porro multitudinem ad se trahunt, neque nuptiis vacare patiuntur (38). — Or is it because it is an honour to virgins to be married in the presence of many, but to widows a disgrace? For the first kind of marriages are desirable and esteemed: the second to be scorned, because, if the first husband be alive, they marry with disgrace; if dead, with grief. For this reason, widows, when they marry, chuse privacy rather than a concourse of spectators: now festivity shows draw the multitude to them, and suffer them not to attend on weddings. I thought it requisite to cite the whole passage of Plutarch, because, in the substance which I have given of it, I have not represented the whole force of the expressions and circumstances, whereby he shews how little those women were esteemed, who married a second time. If you add to this the answers that were made by some illustrious ladies, when they were told of marrying again (39), you will excuse the strained expressions of our Lucretia.

Call to mind the answer of another lady of the house of Gonzaga (40).

[F] The very notes she wrote to her domestics were collected. They have even inserted what she wrote to her footman, to chide him for not readily obeying dame Lucia, who was her house-keeper (41); and what she wrote to this Lucia, forbidding her to be so parsimonious, and commanding her to laish a disobedient fervent-maid till the blood came. See Livia non vi è obediante alzatele in capo i drappi & datelene tante che le carni si facciano livide & il sangue le scorra fino alle calcagna (42). I do not know whether Mr Montreuil followed this example, when he inserted in the collection of his letters, what he wrote to his butcher (43); but I think this kind of notes might have been omitted without any prejudice to our Lucretia. I am of another opinion as to those, which acquaint us how carefully she applied herself to marry her servants. This is very glorious to her memory. It is one of the good qualities a great lady ought to be mistress of, and at the same time it is a virtue seldom practised among great people: for if a lady is ill served, she turns away her maids and waiting women, &c. without rewarding them; and if she is well served, she keeps them as long as she can, without procuring them a marriage, that might deprive her of the good services they do her. None are more inexcusable in this respect, than the ladies of great retinue and equipage; for they may easily know, by the familiarity between their domestics of different sexes, that to marry them would be to do them a great pleasure. The greatest watchfulness of mistresses, their severity, exhortations, censures, cannot prevent the familiarity and private correspondence of servants, and other stronger engagements, the scandalous consequences whereof do but too often appear. This most evidently shews what ought to be done to recompence the service they have received. We may therefore justly blame the ladies, who do not imitate our Lucretia, and praise her for her affection and generosity to those of her sex, who served her. She was so kind as to write to Cornelia Giannotti, that she had found her a young, rich, prudent and handsome husband. She exactly described to her his perfections; that he had a great deal of wit, was modest in his discourse (44), polite in his carriage, industrious, grave, civil, &c. Thus much for the soul. She forgot not what concerned the body: she is very particular in her description of it. 'Vengo hora alle qualità corporali, says she, lequai sono: mi parute degne di contemplatione, perche egli

è piu tosto robusto, che delicato, non molto grande ma thorofo, d'occhio vivacissimo; di largo petto; di fianco rotundo; di gamba suelta, di fronte ampia; di capo tondo, & ricciuto, ne aggiugne al ventesimo anno (per quanto si dice) (45). — I come now to his bodily perfections, which seem to me worthy of consideration, because he is rather robust, than delicate, not very large but braveny, of most lively eyes, of a wide chest, round hips, a fine leg, a broad forehead, with a curled head of hair, and, they say, scarce twenty years old. This shews that she made a choice like a good mistress, and a good friend. At another time, having found an advantageous match for one of her women, she immediately wrote to her the happy news; and advised her in the first place to give thanks to God, and in the next place to keep herself neat, that, when the galant came to visit her, he might not take her for the kitchen-maid. 'Rallegrati Giulia, & alza le mani al cielo, poi che mentre non stata alla fiera di Rovigo, ti hò trovato un marito di tal qualità che ogn'uno che lo conosce lo giudica laborioso . . . ponti adunque in ordine, perche io penso ch'egli se ne verra con noi alla Fratta; fa che non ti ritrovi con i capegli scarmigliati, col viso tinto, & con le mani impastriate come se tu fussti la cuoca (46). — Rejoice, Giulia, and return thanks to heaven: I have found you such a husband, that whoever sees him will judge him to be a pains-taking man. . . . Put your self therefore in order against he visits you, and take care he does not find you with your hair about your ears, and your face and hands greasy, like any cook-wench. She did such another piece of service to one of her sister's women (47).

[G] Her reprimands to some leud, covetous, or proud women are very fine. Read what she wrote to a woman, who, to excuse her wanton life, urged, that her resistance was to no purpose (48). Amongst other counsels, she advised her to eat and sleep but little, to avoid idleness and lascivious discourses, to abstain from lawful pleasures, to study the holy scriptures, and to apply herself to prayer. I do not wonder, says she, that you have not the power to resist sensual pleasures, since I do not perceive that you are sufficiently cautious of avoiding those things, that prompt you to luxury. The temptations of the flesh are like the Sirens. We must keep at a distance from them, if we would not be caught by them (49): Non ti vego porre alcuna diligenza per sibiuar quelle cose che alla libidine incitar ti possono, & è ben ragione che chi ama il pericolo perisca nel pericolo. Sono le tentationi carnali simili alle Sirene, dalle quali pochi ne scampano se non si allontanano (50). This, by the bye, is a very common illusion. People complain, that they cannot withstand some temptations, though they oppose them with all their strength, as they say. But can they be said to oppose them, who feed upon the finest dishes, who make all sorts of visits, who seek for the most agreeable conversations, &c.? It is so easy a transition from lawful to unlawful pleasures, that he cannot be thought to design a good life in earnest, who does not renounce many innocent conveniences. Raffrenati etiam dai leciti piaceri (51). — Refrain even from lawful pleasures, is what should be said to the voluptuous, as our Lucretia said to the leud woman here mentioned. This leud woman had a sister, who led the same life: Lucretia wrote to her a long letter (52), full of reasons most likely to convert this creature. She expresses herself with admirable life and eloquence against the brutishness of this vice. Nor is she less eloquent in censuring an old finner, whom she turns into ridicule: 'Oh bella cosa, che per tutta la città vostra si dica, che non vi possiate per vecchiezza che vi habbia soursiunguto distogliere dalle libidinose schifèzze . . . Fra tutti i mostri, niuna cosa è piu mostruosa di un vecchio libidinoso. Contemplate almeno allo specchio i canuti capegli, la canuta barba, la fronte rugosa, & la faccia smigliante ad un cadavero (53). — What a fine thing it is, for the whole town to cry out, that old age itself cannot cure you of lust . . . Of all monsters a libidinous old man is the greatest. Do but look in the glass, and contemplate those grey hairs,

'bairs, white beard, wrinkled forehead, and complexion of a dead man.' What she writ to a man, who, far from finding the cure of his disorders by marriage, grew more lascivious by it, is no less forcible. 'Io mi credevo, che voi vi foste maritato, perche il matrimonio vi haveffe ad essere il rifugio della vostra incontinenza: ma per quanto s'intende, gli vi è piu tosto stato un sprone, & uno incitamento alla lussuria (54). — 'I thought you had married to avoid incontinence; but I find marriage has proved to you rather a spur and incitement to wantonness.' If she would have censured all those, whom neither old age nor marriage cure of that vice, she must have written more letters than would have made two volumes in folio. As to covetous or proud persons, whom she endeavours to reclaim, see the pages which I quote (55).

GORGOPHONE, daughter of Perseus and Andromeda, was the wife of Perieres, son of Æolus, and king of the Messenians in Peloponnesus. Out-living her husband, she married Oebalus, and was the first woman that took a second husband; for, before her, her sex religiously abstained from second marriages (a). This innovation cannot be so great a blot on her memory, as that of Lamech was, who married two wives at the same time. Yet it is a blot, whenever history observes, that a person was the first, who introduced a relaxation in the practice of rigid morality. The relaxation of Gorgophone's children was much more to be condemned; for they fell into incest. She had two sons by her first marriage, viz. Aphareus and Leucippus. By the second venter, she had a daughter called Arena, who was Aphareus's wife. This Aphareus permitted his son to reign with him jointly at Messena; but he reserved the chief authority to himself. He built a city, which he called Arena, from his wife (b). Gorgophone was buried at Argos, her native country (c). She had by her second marriage a son called Tyndarus, the father of Helena (d). I believe Plautus took her for the grand-mother, and not the aunt, of Amphitryon [A].

(1) Amphitr. Act. IV, Scen. IV, ver. 49.

(2) Apollodorus, lib. ii, p. m. 97.

[A] Plautus took her for the grand-mother . . . of Amphitryon.] His words are these (1). Ego idem ille sum Amphitruus, Gorgophones nepos, imperator Thebanorum. Madam Dacier makes this note upon it. 'I have never observed, that the word nepos, among the ancients, signifies nephew, but always grand-son: yet I believe, that Ovid used it in the same sense as Plautus does here; for Gorgophone was the daughter of Perseus, and sister of Alcæus, and consequently Amphitryon's aunt.' For my part, I cannot be persuaded, that Plautus used the word nepos in any other sense than that of grand-son. We do not certainly find, that this word had any other signification before the decline of the Latin tongue; and therefore all the spectators and readers of the Amphitryon directly understood a grand-son by the word nepos. What probability is there, that the poet would thus impose upon them, in making him Gorgophone's grand-son, who was only her nephew? I know indeed, that, according to Apollodorus's genealogy (2), Amphitryon is but the nephew of Gorgophone; but I know likewise, that all the genealogies of the fabulous ages have been differently related: and it is very likely, that Plautus had read some authors, who made Amphitryon Gorgophone's grand-son. Let us remember, that she had two husbands, and children by each: perhaps it has been said, that she had a daughter, who was Alcæus's wife, and Amphitryon's mother; which would not be more strange, than what we read in Apollodorus (3), viz. that Electryon married Anaxo his niece, daughter of Alcæus. If Electryon married his brother Alcæus's daughter, Alcæus might have married the daughter of his sister Gorgophone. Add to this, that the authors, that remain, are not agreed about Alcæus's wife, who was Amphitryon's mother. Some (4) will have her to be Menœceus's daughter, and that her name was Hipponome. Others (5) say, that she was called Lysidice, and that she was Pelops's daughter. Others (6), lastly, make her the daughter of Guneus, who was of Pheneum in Arcadia, and call her Laonome. What hinders but other writers, who were not lost in Plautus's time, might say she was Gorgophone's daughter (7)? To conclude, we need not wonder, that Amphitryon gloried on the stage in this genealogy; for the bare name of Gorgophone raised the idea of Perseus, the conqueror of the Gorgones, from which action his daughter took her name (8).

GORLÆUS, (ABRAHAM) born at Antwerp in the year 1549, became famous by his curiosity in collecting medals, and other like monuments. He was particularly fond of the rings and seals of the ancients. He collected a prodigious quantity of them, as appears by the book he published in 1601 [A]. Seven years after, he

[A] The work he published in 1601.] The title of it is: Dactylothece, seu Annulorum sigillarium quorum apud priores tam Græcos quam Romanos usus ex ferro, ære, argento & auro Promptuarium. This was the first part of the work: the second was intitled, Variarum Gemmarum quibus Antiquitas in signando uti solita Sculptura. What makes me say, that this work was printed in the year 1601, though I know that Swertius he published a collection of several medals. He pitched upon the town of Delft for the place of his residence, and he died there the fifteenth of April 1609. It is not true that he had a place in the mint [B]. Some say, that he never studied the Latin tongue; and that the learned preface, prefixed to his Daëtyliotheca, was written by another man [D]. His executors sold his cabinet to the prince of Wales (a). It is not always safe to depend on his medals, if we may believe the Scaligerana [E].

(10) Gronovius, in Prefat.

Swertius (1) and Valerius Andreas (2) say it was printed at Nuremberg in the year 1600, is the date of the epistle dedicatory. The author dedicated his book to the elector of Cologne, the first of October 1601. Besides, the print of the author, prefixed to the book, is of the same year (3). Lastly, Mr Gronovius, who has published a new edition of it (4), observes (5), that it was printed the first year of this century. The edition of this book in Thuanus's library is of Leyden 1605. In that of Mr le Tellier, archbishop of Rheims, it is of Antwerp, 1609. Father Labbé (6) mentions the edition of Leyden 1650: perhaps his printers have made 1650 of 1605, by transposing figures: but, however, the Leyden edition exceeds all the rest, as containing not only a greater number of figures, but also a short and very learned explanation, which Mr Gronovius has added to it.

[B] It is not true, that he had a place in the mint at Delft. Valerius Andreas has here made a very notable blunder. Abrahamus Gorlaeus, says he (7), Antwerpiae natus, celebri emporio, Delphis Batavorum exivit in Collegio III. virorum monetariorum. He affirms two things: one is, that there is at Delft a body composed of three directors of the mint: the other is, that Gorlaeus was one of those three men: neither of which is true. This error was occasioned by these words of Gorlaeus (8). 'Nescio quo fato in antiquorum numismatum Συναγωγῇ de lapsus, reique dulcedine affectus totum me tradidit huic contemplationi; & tanquam in Collegium III. virorum Monetariorum cooptatus, nihil præter nummos veteres somnio — Falling, I know not how, into the study of ancient coins, and being pleased with the thing, I gave myself wholly up to that contemplation; and, as if I were one of the three mint-masters, I dream of nothing but ancient coins.' Swertius (9) understood very well the meaning of these words, and has quoted them in the author's sense; but Valerius Andreas has perverted them: he does not say, that Gorlaeus applied himself to the search of ancient coins, like a man who had been one of the Triumviri of the mint; but he represents him as being actually possessed of that employment. Mr Gronovius enquired into the reasons that induced this antiquarian to leave his own country, and to retire into Holland for the rest of his days, and what employ the magistrates of Delft gave him, but could find out nothing about it. 'Ipsam Gorlaeum cognoscere familiaris cupivi, & quæ causa illum induxisset patriam Batavia mutare, præsertim quum dissona de eo memorarentur, sic ut ibi quoque mori & sepeliri novem annis post voluerit. Ipse in præfatione postrema videtur se describere eum qui publicis quotidie distringeretur muneribus, & qualia ista fuerint resciscere non magis potui, quam id ipsum quod modo dixi (10). — I desire to be better acquainted with Gorlaeus, and to know what induced him to leave his native land for Holland, especially since there are such different reports concerning him, inasmuch that, nine years after, he desired to die and be buried there. In his last preface, he seems to describe himself as one, who was daily embarrassed with public affairs; but of what kind they were, I could never learn.' What is certain, is, that Gorlaeus describes himself as a man whom public employments hindered from studying as much as he desired. Cæterum says he (11), cum illud præstare quod a nobis ipsi exigimus, ejus sit verius qui in umbratica rerum contemplatione & desidia literarum torpescit, quam qui publicis quotidie distringitur muneribus, aliis relinqueamus quod optari possit, nobis quod ad nominis nostri exultationem publicamque utilitatem sufficere reservabimus. — But since the performance of what I require of myself demands leisure and literary indolence, but is inconsistent with the daily avocations of public business, I leave that to others, and reserve myself for the care of my own reputation and the public good.

[C] Some say that never studied the Latin tongue. Peireskius said this, speaking of the conversation he had with Gorlaeus at Delft. The words of his historian deserve to be set down. 'Quo loco narrare solebat rem memoratam non indignam, nempe Gorlaeum, cum aliis Latinæ linguæ non studuisset, intellexisse tamen libros omnes circa rem nummariam Latine conscriptos; eodem modo, quo Forcatulus omnes circa rem Mathematicam: tantum valet improbus labor ex desiderio quidpiam noscendi vehementissimo profectus (12). — Upon which occasion, he used to relate a memorable thing, to wit, that Gorlaeus, tho' he had never studied the Latin tongue, yet understood all the books of coins written in that language: in the same manner as Forcatulus understood all books of Mathematics: such is the force of industry, arising from an eager desire of knowledge.' This would be a thing somewhat singular, and perhaps it would be more to Gorlaeus's glory, than his want of scholarship would be shameful to him. Is it not a sign of a great genius, to be able to understand a Latin book, merely by being skilled in the subjects it treats of? Plutarch says somewhere, that, having studied the Roman history in Greek books, he, thereby understood the language of the Latin historians. Gorlaeus might have said, that the knowledge of medals, which he had acquired, let him into the notions of the Latin authors, who had written upon that science. But this story of Peireskius cannot be reconciled with what Swertius says, who was intimately acquainted with Gorlaeus (13). A school-fellow of Andrew Schottus went, no doubt, to the college. Mr Gronovius (14) urges this argument against what Gassendus says.

[D] The learned preface at the head of his Daëtyliotheca was written by another. Cunæus says, that Ælius Everhard Vorstius was the author of it: this he says in Vorstius's funeral oration. A learned German (15), who has written concerning rings, affirms the same thing.

[E] It is not always safe to depend on his medals, if we believe the Scaligerana. There we find these words (16): Gorlaeus casts medals: he has sometimes shown me some of them; but I discovered, that they were not ancient; ever since he has shewed me none but what were true: he is a good man. This, and the rest of the passage, shews, that Scaliger reckoned Gorlaeus among the forgers of false medals.

G O R L Æ U S, (DAVID) a native of Utrecht, lived in the XVIIth century. He published some books of Philosophy (a), in which he departed from the common opinion of the schools. Regius, a disciple of Descartes, being brought into trouble for a thesis concerning the union of the soul and body, alledged that he had used Gorlaeus's own words. This did him no service; and gave an opportunity to Voëtius, professor of divinity, to blast as much as possible Gorlaeus's opinions [A].

[A] Voëtius . . . blasted as much as possible Gorlaeus's opinions. You will find the history of all this in Mr Baillet (1). He tells us, that Regius had maintained, amongst other things: * That from the union of the soul and body there results, not a real, but only an accidental being . . . it was enough for Voëtius, that this was not agreeable to the usual language of the schools, to declare Regius an heretic, and to proceed to the degrading of him. It was in vain for Regius to excuse himself, by saying, he was not the author of this way of speaking, but Gorlaeus, in whose writings he had found it in the very words used in the disputations. Voëtius had it decreed, in the name of the faculty of divinity . . . That the students should avoid Regius's lectures, as doctrines pernicious to religion. A few days after, Voëtius printed some theses; to which he added three corollaries. The first thereof was this: the opinion of the atheist Taurellus, and of David Gorlaeus, teaching, that man, made up of a body and a soul, is a being per accidens, and not per se, is absurd and erroneous. The third was this: the philosophy, that rejects the substantial forms of things, with their proper and specific faculties, or their active qualities, and consequently the distinct and specific natures of things, such as Taurellus, Gorlaeus, and Basson, have endeavoured to introduce in our days, is inconsistent with Moses's physics and all that the scripture teaches us. This philosophy is dangerous, favourable to scepticism, proper to destroy our belief concerning the rational soul, the procession of the divine persons in the Trinity, the incarnation of JESUS CHRIST, original sin, miracles, prophecies, the grace of our regeneration, and the real possession of devils.

This manifestly shews the power of custom and prejudices. It is a weight that drags us whither the interest of our cause forbids us to go. For what can be said more contrary to the interest of those fundamental doctrines of religion (2), than to maintain, that they stand in need of the doctrine of the schools, concerning the distinction of ens per se, and ens per accidens, and the nature of forms that constitutes the species of bodies? Ens per se, and ens per accidens, are inexplicable phrases, a meer jargon of the Spanish logicians, which signifies nothing: and as to substantial forms, what is said of their nature, and the way of their production and destruction, is so absurd and incomprehensible, that they cannot be set up for doctrines necessary to religion, without dangerously exposing the sublimest truths of the gospel, and filling the general course of nature with so many mysteries, that religion will have no prerogative over nature. It is certain, that the most profound mysteries of the gospel are at least as easy to comprehend, as the doctrine of forms, and the nature of the ens per se of the schools.

This reflexion affects Voëtius but in a remote and indirect manner; for if we read his whole corollary, we see, that the reason of his apprehending so much danger to the doctrines of the gospel, from the rejection of forms, is not that rejection itself, but the motive of it (3). He observes, that the principal reason of those, who deny them, is the inexplicable manner of their production; and then he shews, that, upon the like foundation, it is to be feared the mind of man will proceed to deny mysteries, &c. This alters the state of the question, and puts the dispute in a capacity of being more easily ended. It is but explaining the misunderstanding, and shewing the disparity. As for those, who condemn the rejection of forms in it self as prejudicial to religion, I repeat it, they deserve to be made acquainted with what I have said before.

You will find in the remark [E] of the article HEIDANUS, something concerning the inexplicable difficulties of the peripatetic doctrine about substantial forms. But, to see this in it's whole extent, you need only read the first volume of Hadrian Heereboord's theses, from the 125th page to the 148th; where he enforces the profound and subtil reasonings of William Pemble, who has written in English upon this subject.

(3) Quidquid sit de summa rei, quam Philosophorum disquisitioni relinquimus, hoc unum saltem hypomena studiosis nostris subijcimus: Achillei argumenti istius, quo formas explicate conatur, coniecturam suspicam habent; quæ est hæc, negatur essentia & existentia formarum, quia eorum origo seu modus originis incertus est, aut explicari non potest, sic ut patrum formarum & sibi & aliis in eo satisfaciant. Hoc periculo axiomaticæ semel habito proclive erit vanitati, scepticismo & petulantie humani ingenii, disputare, non dei animam rationalem, &c.

GOSELINI (JULIAN), born at Rome in the year 1525, was, at seventeen years of age, secretary to Ferdinand Gonzaga, viceroy of Sicily. He continued so when that viceroy was made governor of Milan. He had the same post under the dukes of Alba and Sessa, who were successively governors of that state after the death of Gonzaga. The duke of Sessa took him with him to the court of Spain, where Gofelini made himself so acceptable by his address and prudence, that the duke was told he would do well to employ only this negociator in his affairs with the king. Gofelini was gratified at the same time with a pension for life of 200 crowns per annum. The marquis of Pescara, who succeeded the duke of Sessa, had the same consideration for Gofelini, and the same confidence in him as his predecessors: but things altered strangely under this marquis's successor, the duke of Albuquerque. He treated Gofelini in such an odd and barbarous manner, as had like to have cost him his life and honour at once. However, the end of this persecution was honourable to this secretary. He dexterously warded off the blow, and managed himself with that prudence during all this heavy storm, as to make it turn to his honour. He got again into that employment under the marquis of Aimonte, and the duke of Terranova, who were governors of the Milaneze, and whose secretary he was, to their great satisfaction. Amongst many good qualities, he is said to have been a pacifier of quarrels, and to have had a very particular talent for it. The thing deserved to be observed on his epitaph, Titulo res digna sepulchri: nor has it been forgotten (a). The affairs of the secretaryship, which took him up above forty years, hindered him not from publishing several books [A]. He died at Milan the twelfth of February 1587, being near sixty two years of age (b).

[A] He published several books. These are the titles of some of them: Rime: Discorsi: Lettere: Ragionamento sopra i Componenti del Borgbesi: Dichiarazione di alcuni Componenti: Vita di Don Ferdinando Gonzaga: Trè Congiure, cioè de Pazzi e Salviati contra i Medici, del Conte Giovan Luigi de' Fieschi contra la Republica di Genova, &c. d'alcuni Piacentini contra il loro Duca Pietro Luigi Farnese. He also wrote Latin verses and letters, and translated into Italian a French book, intitled, A true account of things that happened in the Netherlands since the arrival of Don Juan of Austria, &c. Varillas, doubtless, did not know, that Gofelini had written the conspiracy of the count of Fiesque, since, in giving the reason of his treating of this conspiracy, he names (1) but four authors, who have published the history of it, Hubertus Folietta, Agostino Mascardi, Madam de Seuder, and cardinal de Rets. He acknowledges, that they are incomparable each in their kind; but that the two first ascribe too much to France in that project, and the two latter do not ascribe enough to it.

GOSSELIN. I know three authors of Normandy, who have born this name. WILLIAM GOSSELIN, a native of Caen, lived in the XVIth century, and studied mathematics [A]. JOHN GOSSELIN lived in the same century. He was

[A] WILLIAM GOSSELIN applied himself to the mathematics. This appears by the work, he published at Paris in 1577, with this title: De Arte magna, seu de occulta parte numerorum quæ est Algebra & Almucabala vulgo dicitur libri quatuor, in quibus explicantur æquationes Diophantis, & regulæ quantita-

was of Vire, and was the king's library-keeper. He applied himself very much to astrology [B], and died very old by an extraordinary accident. We shall see what Scaliger said of him [C]. ANTONY GOSSELIN was of Caen, where he was Regius Professor of history and eloquence, and principal of the college du Bois. He published the history of the ancient Gauls in Latin, in 1636. He was mistaken in a great many things, as Mr Bochart shewed in some observations he composed upon that work; but he would not publish them, fearing to displease the friends and relations of the author. They have been inserted in the last edition of his works.

tis simplicis & quantitatis surdæ. He added some demonstrations and inventions of his own to his French translation of the arithmetic of Nicolas Tartaglia, an Italian author. This version was printed at Paris in 1577 (1), and at Antwerp by Plantin, the year following (2).

[B] JOHN GOSSELIN applied himself very much to astrology. Witness the book he published at Paris, in 1577, intitled, Historia imaginum celestium nostro sæculo accommodata in qua earum vicinities seu habitudines inter se atque stellarum fixarum situs & magnitudines explicantur. Six years before, he had published, La Main harmonique, ou les Principes de Musique antique & moderne, & les propriétés que la moderne reçoit des sept Planètes; as also, Ephemerides, ou Almanach du jour & de la nuit pour cent ans commençans en l'an 1571 (3). He printed, at Paris, in 1582, a table of the reformation of the year, and a French version of the Gregorian calendar (4). Note, that Vossius (5) has made no mention of these two authors. It is a sign he had not heard of them.

[C] He died very old We shall see what Scaliger has said of him. Gosselin the king's library-keeper is dead, being burnt to death: he fell into the fire, and, being alone, by reason of his age, could not get up again, which is a common fate to old people. Mr Casaubon will succeed him. Gosselin suffered no body to go into the library; so that Mr Casaubon finds unexpected treasures there (6).

From this passage two things may be inferred: one is, that John Gosselin died about the beginning of the XVIIth century: the other, that his place was given to Casaubon.

GOUDIMEL (CLAUDIUS), one of the most excellent musicians of the XVIth century, was massacred at Lyons in 1572, because he was a Protestant. The Protestant Martyrology makes mention of him [A]. D'Aubigné is mistaken in placing him amongst those, who were murdered at Paris on St Bartholomew's day [B]. Varillas has not committed this fault; but he is to blame for believing, that Goudimel and Claudin the younger were one and the same person [C]. He makes a curious observation against those who excepted not so skillful a musician out of the massacre [D]. If notice

[A] The Protestant martyrology makes mention of him. In these words (1): 'Claudius Goudimel, an excellent musician, and whose memory will live for ever, for what he has so well done upon David's Psalms in French, the greatest part whereof he has set to music, in the form of motets, of four, five, six, and eight parts; and had not death prevented it, he would have quickly completed the whole work. But the enemies of God's glory, and some wicked persons, who envied the honour he had acquired, have deprived the lovers of Christian music of such an happiness.'

[B] D'Aubigné is mistaken in placing him among those, who were murdered in the massacre of Paris on St Bartholomew's day. After having named many eminent persons killed in the Paris massacre, he adds: 'Goudimel, an excellent musician, and Perrot a civilian, were all thrown out at the windows, and dragged along the streets, and cast into the river, at the instance of the duke of Montpensier, who had joined with those we have spoken of, to cry out, kill, and that they had attempted upon the king's life (2).' If he had consulted Thuanus, as he has in other cases, he would have avoided this mistake. For this is what Thuanus says in that place of his history, wherein he mentions the massacre of Lyons. 'Baudem fortanum expertus est Claudius Goudimelus, excellens nostra ætate Musicus, qui Psalmos Davidicos vernaculis versibus à Clemente Maroto & Theodora Beza expressos ad varios & jucundissimos modulationum numeros aptavit, quibus & hodie publice in concionibus protestantium ac privatim decantantur (3). — The same fate attended Claudius Goudimel, an excellent musician of our time, who set the Psalms of David, translated into metre by Clement Marot and Theodore Beza, to various and most pleasing tunes, which at this time are sung both publicly and privately by the Protestants.'

[C] Mr Varillas . . . is to blame for believing, that Goudimel and Claudin the younger were one and the same person. We shall see in the following remark, that he has done it. To confute him, I must alledge here a notable fact concerning this Claudin, which will inform us, that he was alive nine years after the Paris massacre. I have found this fact in the commentary, that has been printed with the life of Apollonius Tyastus, translated into French. I shall set down the words of the commentator (4): 'It was also by these two Phrygian and Subphrygian tunes, that Timotheus made an experiment of his skill in the person of Alexander, by the former making him run to arms, as he was at table, and by the latter bringing him back to his former tranquillity. I have sometimes heard the Sieur Claudin the younger say (5), (5) The author who, without disrespect to any one, far exceeded all the musicians of the preceding ages; that an air, marginal summa-ry, He Chyprien of Claudin the younger, the son of all the musicians, (6), in the time of Henry III, king of France and Poland, of happy memory, whom God absolve; which, as it was sung, made a gentleman take his sword in hand, and swear aloud, that it was impossible for him to forbear fighting with some body. Whereupon they began to sing another air of the Subphrygian mode, which made him as peaceable as before; which I have had since confirmed by some that were present: such power and force have the modulation, motion, and management of the voice, when joined together, upon the minds of men (7). (7) Id. ibid. To conclude this long annotation: If one would have an excellent experiment of these twelve modes, let him sing, or hear sung, the Dodecachorde of Mr Claudin the younger, of whom I have spoken above; and I assure myself he will find in it (8) He com- all those figures and variations managed with so much danted at Lyons. art, harmony, and skill, as to confess, that nothing See Thuanus, can be added to this master-piece, but the praises that ubi supra, pag. 1083, who taxes all the lovers of this science ought to bestow upon Mandelot with this rare and excellent man, who was capable of car-bale hypocrisy in rying music to the utmost degree of it's perfec-pretending to dis-approve the mis- sion, if death had not frustrated the execution sacre, and to pu- nish the authors of his noble and profound designs upon this subject.

[D] he makes a curious observation upon those, who excepted not so excellent a musician out of the massacre. These are his words: 'Mandelot (8) vainly attempted to prevent the massacre of thirteen hundred Calvinists at Lyons, and especially the incomparable musician Goudimel (9), so well known by the name of Claudin the younger. His greatest crime was the composing the noblest airs to Marot's and Beza's Psalms, which were sung in the Protestant congregations; and in his punishment no regard was had to the Roman law, which indulged those that were eminent in their profession, because the public, by taking them off, lost incomparably more than it gained by the example of their punishment (10).'

had been taken how Goudimel wrote his name, it had not been so disguised, as it has been [E]. There are some of his letters (a) printed amongst the poems of Melissus; his intimate friend. He there writes himself Goudimel. Melissus made some verses upon the sad destiny of his friend. I shall set down the epigram, in which it is observed, that Goudimel would have found more humanity amongst the waves of the Ægean sea, as heretofore Arion, than he found in his native country [F]. I believe this musician was of Franche Comté [G].

The indulgence of the Roman law, which Varillas speaks of, will excite the curiosity of a great many readers. They will look upon it as a very remarkable particular: but as they know he has imposed much, even in point of history, the principal object of his studies, they will not think him very worthy of credit in a matter of civil law, which was not his province. Wherefore, to set them at ease, I will give them a better authority, that is, the testimony of a man of much more learning, who has cited two very grave authors. See then what Girac has observed against Colhar (11). Our doctor offends a-new against the rules of the civil-law, he who pretends sometimes to discuss matters of right. It is absolutely false, that an artist deserves so much the more to be punished, as his work shall be admired, and charm the beholders. All the interpreters of the civil-law maintain the contrary; and it is a practice frequently observed by princes and sovereign courts, to give those their life, who excel in any art, though they deserve to lose it for the crimes they have committed.*

[E] If notice had been taken how Goudimel subscribed, his name had not been so disguised as it has been. Thuanus calls him Gaudimelus: Gisbert Voëtius (12), Gaudimellus: Varillas, Gaudinel: Jeremiah de Pours, Guidomel. The same Guidomel set to music the Psalms of David, printed at Paris by Adrian le Roy and Robert Balaard, in the year 1565. He also composed nineteen spiritual hymns, printed at Paris by Nicholas du Chemin, in the year 1555 (13).

[F] I shall set down the epigram, in which it is observed, that he would have found more humanity among the waves, than . . . in his own country. It is at the seventy ninth page of a book, intitled, Melissi Schediasmata Reliquia, and was printed in 1575, in 8vo. It contains several pieces of poetry upon Goudimel, which are not Melissus's.

Prensus ab externo si Goudimel hoste fuisses Vestor in Ionio Musice clare mari;
Ille tibi vitam vel non voluisset ademtam,
Lenitus cithara carminibusque tuis;
In tutos aliquis vel, sicut Ariona, Delphin Tergore portasset te quasi nave locos.
Audivere tuos Galli moduloseque probantur Indigenæ, decori quis tua Musa fuit:
At datus es letho, licet infons, inque cruenti Stagnanteis Araris præcipitatus aquas.

GOVEA (ANDREW) (a), in Latin Goveanus, a native of Beia in Portugal, was principal of the college of St Barbara [A], at Paris, in the XVIth century, where he educated three nephews, who became famous for their learning. The king of Portugal allowed them wherewithal to maintain themselves at Paris. MARTIAL GOVEA, the eldest of the three, became a good Latin poet, and published a Latin grammar at Paris. ANDREW GOVEA, his younger brother, taught, first grammar, and then philosophy, in the college of St Barbara, and was at last made principal of this college in the room of his uncle: and, because he acquitted himself well of that employment, he was invited to Bourdeaux, to exercise the like function in the college of Guienne. He went thither in the year 1534, where he discharged his duties with an exactness very advantageous to youth [B]: this engaged John III, king of Portugal, to send for him back into his kingdom, to set up a college at Coimbra, like that of Guienne. Govea left Bourdeaux in the year 1547, and took with him some learned men fit to instruct

[A] He was principal of the college of St Barbara. This is the right translating of Andrew Schottus's Collegii Barbarani præfatus (1), and not principal of the college of Barbarini, as Mr Teiffier renders it (2).

[B] ANDREW GOVEA . . . discharged his duties with an exactness which was very useful to youth. This may be seen in Buisin's preface prefixed to Gelida's letters, printed at Rochelle in 1571. Ubi quædam egerit, quem se gesserit (Andreas Goveanus)

Proh scelus indigenum! nam barbarus hostes in hostem
Barbaricum LANIIS mittor esse solet.

Hadst thou been ta'en by foreign foes a prey,
Sweet lyrist, sailing in th' Ionian sea,
Thy song had given thee life and liberty.
Or, like the fam'd Arion heretofore,
A dolphin's back had born thee safe to shore.
France rank'd thy muse her ornaments among,
Each Gallic ear delighted with thy song.
Yet thou to death, unmerited, wast sent,
Thrown into Arar's stream, thy punishment.
From Frenchmen this . . . thy countrymen . . .
bear!
Barbarians to their foes less cruel are.

I would forgive the Latin poets, what cannot be excused in the historians, viz. the leaving out, changing, or adding, of some letters to Goudimel's name, it being a very harsh word in Latin poetry.

[G] I believe that this musician was of Franche Comté. I guess so, because his birth-place was situated upon the Doux, a river that runs by Bezançon.

My friend, my Goudimel, is dead and gone:
Witness ye streams of Arar and the Rhone!
Fast as ye roll'd the carnage to the deep,
I saw ye boil the cruel slaughter weep.
The Dubis, Loire, Garumna, and the Seine,
Were seen in mournful murmurs to complain.

He designed to return to Bourdeaux, after having spent two years in putting the college of Coimbra in a good method; but he died before that time (c) in June 1548, being fifty years of age, or upwards (d). He was a priest and a preacher [D], and never printed any thing (e). ANTONY GOVEA, the youngest of the three brothers, was the most famous of them all. See, in Moreri, what Thuanus (f) says of him: it would be needless to repeat it. I shall only observe, that if it be true, as Thuanus affirms, that Govea read the civil-law at Grenoble (g) [E] to a numerous auditory, the author of the Bibliothèque de Dauphiné should not have said, he practised in Grenoble, and read in the university of Valence. There is another reflexion to be made upon Thuanus's narrative [F]. By way of supplement to Moreri, I shall say, that Govea studied the civil-law at Toulouse in 1539; that he had before that been a teacher at Bourdeaux, in the college,

It came to nothing at last, says he (5), except that a poor servitor was delivered into the hands of Ant. drew Govea, a Portuguese, principal of the college, doctor of the Sorbonne, (commonly surnamed Sinapivorus, that is, Mustard-Eater) to be lashed. Beza had been speaking of Aymon de la Voye, a Protestant martyr, burnt at Bourdeaux, in the year 1541, and of some scholars who were taken the next day, being suspected of having stuck up a paper, which was found fastened to the post.

[E] If it be true . . . that ANTONY GOVEA taught . . . at Grenoble. Having not the books I want, I leave abundance of things in uncertainty: they, who have left them so, having all sorts of libraries at hand, are more to be blamed than I am: however, the uncertainty I am in will move some readers to make a full enquiry into the matter. I do not scruple to repeat this remark, because I am persuaded, that this dictionary will be read by piece-meal; and therefore it is necessary to mention this more than once.

Andreas Schottus might satisfy me concerning what I have read in Thuanus about Govea's being a professor at Grenoble, were it not that, in the very place, where he declares, that Govea taught in that city, he writes inaccurately. Here is the whole passage (6).

scendi inscripsit. Gratianopoli ad legem Falcidiam quæ perdifficilis est dictabat anno 1566 (7). Quarto post anno uxorem ibi domum duxit, ex eaque liberos sustulit Petrum & Mansfredum, quorum illum Petrus Bertrandus Cadurcorum Episcopus in baptismatis fonte suscepit. The natural meaning of these words, is, 1. that Govea taught the civil-law at Cahors, before he taught it at Valence; that is, before the year 1555. 2. That he taught at Grenoble in the year 1566, and married there in 1570. 3. That the bishop of Cahors was godfather to the eldest of his sons. These three things appear so disordered, that they offend an exact reader. Good sense teaches, that Govea was professor at Cahors, when he desired the bishop of the place to be godfather to his son: but, according to this account, he taught at Cahors before the year 1555; and therefore what does Schottus mean, when he says, that Govea was a professor at Grenoble in 1566, and married there in 1570; and that the bishop of Cahors was godfather to his eldest son? have not I reason to distrust Father Schottus? a German civilian, who has reprinted at Leipzig the lives of some civilians, increases my mistrust; for he makes a very solid objection against these words of that Jesuit, Gratianopoli ad legem Falcidiam . . . dictabat 1566. The objection is this: 'Videtur hic Schottus temporis rationem minus rectè observasse, fieri enim non potuit ut prælectiones suas ad L. Falcidiam anno decimum 1566 habuerit Goveanus Gratianopoli, qui eadem jam an. 1560. Michaëli Hospitalio Francie

Canclario inscriperat (8). — This Schottus seems to have been mistaken as to the time; for Govea could not have read his Prælectiones ad L. Falcidiam in the year 1566, at Grenoble, having inscribed them long before, in 1560, to Michaëli Hospital, chancellor of France.'

Note, that Stephen Pasquier affirms (9), that Antonius Goveanus taught the civil-law at Grenoble, and died there. He is out at least as to the last fact. I have just read, in the twelfth letter of the second book of 1560, that Govea was professor at Grenoble. 'Ei (Cujacio) Valentia succedet Gribaldus, pulchrum sane p. ubi ipse & Lorientus conjuncti fuerint, & habuerint Gratianopoli vicinum Goveanum, qui utroque est longe scelerator. — Gribaldus will succeed Cujas at Valentia, where he and Lorient will be colleagues, and have Govea for their neighbour at Grenoble, who is wickeder than them both.'

Emilio Ferreto qui Avenione jus civile docebat, cum Lugduni privatis studiis intentus desideret (Antonius Goveanus) ad illius perplexæ scientiæ professionem evocatus est. — Antony Govea, being intent upon his private studies at Leyden, was called from thence by Emilio Ferretus, who taught the civil-law at Avignon, to be professor of that intricate science. The sequel of the discourse shews, that Ferretus did not advise Govea to study the civil-law, but to teach it; and this is clear enough from the words I have quoted. According to those words of Thuanus, Govea was invited to Avignon by Ferretus, to teach the civil law. Upon this, two difficulties arise: one is taken from this, viz. That Thuanus, having said, that Govea quickly got the true way of explaining the civil-law, for which he was so admired, as to provoke the jealousy of Cujas, adds, Igitur Goveanus Tolose primum, dein Divione Cadurcorum, post Valentia & Gratianopoli jus civile magna auditorum frequentia professus est. The substance of which narrative is therefore this: Govea, being invited by Ferretus to Avignon to teach there the civil-law, quickly became an excellent interpreter of it, so far as to raise the jealousy of the great Cujas. He therefore taught the law first at Toulouse, then at Cahors, afterwards at Valence and Grenoble. May not one ask this great historian where he has left Avignon? does he not manifestly contradict himself? should he not have said, that Govea taught first in that city? the second difficulty lies in this; that, in the Bibliothèque de the Spanish writers, where there is an abridgement of Govea's life taken from his own writings, it is said indeed, that he taught the civil-law at Cahors, Valence, and Grenoble; but as to Avignon and Toulouse, it is only said, that he studied the law in those two places with great application. 'Juvenis natu grandior tres fere annos in Juris civilis studio operam dedit Emilio Ferreto Avenione proficenti, suæ memoriæ facile principi; quemque parentem alterum appellare lib. 2 de Juris dictione non dubitat: neque ex eo tempore à Jurisconsultorum libris longius unquam oculos dimovit. college, whereof his brother was principal; that, in 1542, he taught at Paris under his uncle [G]; that, some time after, he returned to Bourdeaux to his brother; that he continued his abode in that city after his brother was gone to Coimbra (b); that he was reckoned an atheist by some people [H]; and that it is not probable he died in 1565, as Thuanus affirms (i); nor in 1595, as Nicolas Antonio says. This last author has not been perfectly exact [I]. Nothing can be said more glorious to Antony Govea, than the greatest application. A famous historiographer of Savoy (12) would confute the narrative of many writers, if what he says was true, that, in the year 1559, the duke of Savoy set up an university at Mondevins, and, amongst other learned men, made Antony Govea professor there.

[G] In 1542, he taught at Paris under his uncle. When Andrew Govea the nephew went to Bourdeaux, in 1534, he had been for some time principal of the college of St Barbara at Paris, in the room of Andrew Govea his uncle (13). And therefore, since the latter was principal at Paris in 1542 (14), we must conclude, that he resumed his post, when his nephew went to Bourdeaux; which Elias Vinetius should have observed in express words, to make his relation more intelligible.

[H] He was reckoned an atheist by some people. He was a counsellor at Grenoble: he read lectures in the university of Valence, and wrote some books in those two towns; where (15) he was accused of having spoken ill of the deity; and he was obliged to vindicate himself, which he did in an excellent discourse, that was formerly in manuscript in the library of Ennemond de Rabot d'Illins, first president in this parliament; upon which de Gordes, the king's lieutenant in this province, took occasion to become his protector. This liberty of speaking made Calvin call him an atheist in one of his works (16). If the work, out of which I have taken this passage, contained two or three volumes in folio, the author might be excused for using a loose citation; but it is a book of 224 pages in 12mo. The author might therefore have taken the pains to look for the place, where Calvin speaks so ill of Govea, and he would have given great satisfaction to his readers by citing it; for he would have saved them the trouble of perusing eight or nine volumes in folio. I will not be guilty of that fault, as large as my work is; but I shall quote Calvin's words, and mark the page where they are to be found. Agrippam, Villanovanum, Doletum, & similes vulgo notum est tanquam Cyclopum quospiam Evangelium semper fastuose spreverit: Tandem eo prolapsi sunt amentie & furoris, ut non modo in Filium Dei execrabiles blasphemias evomerent, sed quantum ad animæ vitam attinet, nihil à canibus & porcis putarent se differre. Alii (ut Rabelæus, Deperius, & Goveanus) gustato Evangelio, eadem cœcitate sunt percussi. Cur illud? nisi qui sacrum illud vitæ æternæ pignus, sacrilega ludendi aut ridendi audacia ante profanarant (17)? - - - It is notorious, that Agrippa, Servetus, Doletus, and such like, always treated the gospel with the utmost contempt. At length they came to such a pitch of madness, that they not only poured forth execrable blasphemies against the son of GOD, but thought themselves, as to the life of the soul, upon a level with dogs and swine. Others (as Rabelais, Desperiers, and Goveanus) having tasted of the gospel, were struck with the same blindness. Why so? unless because they had before sacrilegiously and contemptuously profaned that sacred pledge of eternal life? We learn from these words, that Govea was a scoffer, and that at first he approved the reformation. This matter of fact is little known. See here the two verses against Govea, concerning his want of faith.

Antoni Goveane, tua hæc Marrana propago,
In cœlo & cellis non putat esse Deum.

Govea, thy Jewish race a GOD deny
Both in the cellar, and the sky.

They served for an answer to this distich, which he had made against a counsellor (18):

Dum tonat, in cellas propero pede Vallius imas Confugit: in cellis non putat esse Deum.

When thunder rumbles in the skies,
Down to the cellar Vallius flies.
There, to be sure, he's safe: why so?
He thinks there is no GOD below.

You will find these four verses in the first Scalligerana, with some other things that are to Govea's honour. Goveanus doctus erat vir, & valens dialecticus, optimus poëta Gallicus, nec enim Hispanum judicaveris, adeo bene Gallice loquebatur. - - - Govea was a learned man, an able Logician, and a good French poet; for you would not take him for a Spaniard, he spoke French so well. In the second Scalligerana, the atheism, of which Calvin accuses Govea, is called a calumny: Goveanus fuit doctus Lusitanus. Calvinus vocat illum Atheum cum non fuerit; debebat illum melius nosse. - - - Govea was a learned Portuguese. Calvin calls him an atheist, when he was not one: he ought to have known him better.

[I] Nicolas Antonio has not been perfectly exact. He affirms (19), that Antony Govea taught the civil-law at Toulouse, about the year 1539; but Elias Vinet deserves more credit, who had a most intimate acquaintance with Andrew and Antony Govea, and was desired by Andrew Schottus to send him the history of them. He only says, that, in the year 1539, Antony Govea studied the civil-law at Toulouse (20). Every one sees the difference between studying, and teaching the civil-law. Nicolas Antonio adds, that Govea was professor a little after at Paris, and at Bourdeaux, and that at last he fixed at Cahors, where he taught the civil-law with a wonderful reputation; which, reaching as far as Turin, moved the duke of Savoy to invite him into his service, offering to make him master of the requests and his counsellor. Cadurci demum substitit juris civilis antecessor in summo laudis atque eximiationis loco positus. Quod cum prospexisset ab ipsa Augusta Taurinorum Sabaudia Dux, &c (21). There are many mistakes in this account. Govea's name was heard of from a nearer place, after he had left Cahors: he read in the duke of Savoy's neighbourhood, at Valence in Dauphiné; and it was not in Quercy that this prince's offers were made to him. Besides, the princess Margaret (22), sister to Henry II, and wife to the duke of Savoy, recommended him to her husband. Now, as she was a learned woman, she always desired to know, who they were that distinguished themselves in France by their parts and learning. Nicolas Antonio pretends, that Govea was still alive in the year 1595; for, says he, Telsauro, the younger, makes an honourable mention of him under this year, in the nineteenth questio forensis. If I had that book, I should perhaps discover, that this commendation was not bestowed upon that Govea I am speaking of, but upon his son; and, though I could not discover it, I should however believe, that Govea did not live till 1595; for Vinetius, who died in 1587 (23), speaks of him as of a man that was dead (24). Nicolas Antonio, having falsely supposed, that Govea was alive in 1595, censures Elias Vinetius (25), who believed that he died at sixty years of age. This censor's reason is, that Govea taught the civil-law at Toulouse in 1539. He is in the right to infer from thence, that Govea, being suppositum alive in 1595, died older than Vinetius believed. This consequence is not so strong, if we suppose, that Govea studied the civil-law in 1539; yet it is strong enough, because Vinetius observes that Govea had been a teacher at Bourdeaux, before he studied the civil-law at Toulouse. A teacher of a class is commonly above twenty years old; and so Govea would have been at least seventy seven years old in 1595: You will ask me, what I have then to say against Nicolas Antonio? Is not Vinetius justly beaten at his own weapons? I answer, no: for since he died in 1587, he could not suppose that Govea was alive in 1595; and it is only upon this supposition that Ni-

what Ronfard said of him (k). Several of Govea's writings have been published both upon philology and the civil-law. Some maintain that he excelled the great Cujas in parts [K]. I will say something of MAINFROI GOVEA, his son [L].

cholas Antonio's censure can be well grounded. It is certain he did not know when Vinetus died; his censure is an undoubted testimony of it: nor did he know, that Thuanus has bestowed an encomium upon Govea; for had he known it, he would have cited that place, and not another, wherein that great historian speaks of him only occasionally (26). Besides, Thuanus having placed Govea's death in the year 1565, Nicolas Antonio would not have failed to take notice of that mistake, which, according to him, is an egregious one. Many people, and amongst others Mr Allard, at the 119th page of the Bibliothèque de Dauphiné, and Mr König, at the 356th page of the Bibliotheca vetus & nova, follow Thuanus therein; but Andrew Schottus is none of them, since he asserts, at the 301st page of the Bibliotheca Hispanica, that Govea taught at Grenoble in the year 1566, and got children there after the year 1570.

[K] Some maintain that he excelled the great Cujas in parts. Antony Faber pretends, that Govea and Cujas were the two most excellent civilians of their age; but with this difference, that Govea had a happier genius, and, that, trusting too much to his parts, he did not think that labour was either honourable or necessary; whereas Cujas, of a less penetrating genius, laboured like a man, who was persuaded, that, by dint of application, those things might be discovered, which nothing can conquer but the strength of wit. They that understand Latin will be pleased to see in what manner Antony Faber has pronounced this judgment. Tulit ætas nostra maximos in Jurisprudencia viros; non paucos, sed præcipuos, si quid mei ingenii est, (cæterorum pace dixerim) Anton. Goveanum & Jac. Cujacium. Illum ut mihi quidem videtur, multo feliciore ingenio ad Jurisprudenciam natum: sed qui naturæ viribus tam consideret, ut diligentia laudem sibi non necessariam, minus etiam fortasse honorificam putare videretur. Hunc contra minus lucido præstantique ingenii acumine, sed qui assiduò labore ea quoque se adsequi posse crederet, quæ solis ingenii nervis parari queunt (27). Cujas himself was much of this mind: he would have given Govea the precedence, if he had observed him to be as studious, as he was ingenious. Adolescens (Cujacius) Antonii Goveani Jurisconsulti ingenium admirabatur, sed indigentia hominis notata, nihil deteritus est, deteritum iri se dicens à jure tractando, si homo Lufitanus tanto ingenio, tamque subtili, labores civilium studiorum serio suscipere ac sapere voluisset (28).

Paquier gives the pre-eminence to Cujas above Govea. 'Taking a review, says he (29), of the three classes of those that have written upon the civil-law; in the first, I highly value Accursius amongst the glossators; in the second Bartolus . . . and amongst those of the last, which I call humanists, I give the first place to our Cujas, who, according to my judgment, never had, nor has, nor perhaps ever will have, his equal. And, in the midst of the latter, I see none that has written in more elegant language than Govea and Duarenus, for the little they have left of their works; and of these two, I give the precedence to Govea.' I do not understand how Duarenus can be said to have written little, when his works make a large folio (§ 2).

[(§ 2) Duaren has not written near so much as Cujas. This is what Paquier would say, not in lib. 9. ch. 10. p. 902. but lib. 9. ch. 39. p. 902. of the edition of 1643. REM. CRIT.]

[L] I will say something of MAINFROI GOVEA, his son. He was born at Turin, and got a good faculty of writing both in prose and verse. He understood polite literature well, and the civil and canon law; and got the esteem of the duke of Savoy, his master, who honoured him with a counsellor's place in the senate of Turin, and in the council of state. He died in 1613. We have his Consilia: Notæ & Animadversiones in Opera Julii Cæsar: Carmina: Oratio funebre nelle morte di Filippo II Rè di Spagna (30).

GOULART (SIMON), a native of Senlis, and minister of Geneva, was one of the most indefatigable writers of these latter times [A]. When he did not put his name to a book, he denoted it by these three initial letters, S. G. S., which mean Simon Goulart Senlisien (a). It is by this mark father Labbe (b) believes with reason that he discovered him to be the author of the marginal notes, and summaries, in Nicetas Choniates's Annals, of the Geneva edition, in 1593. Goulart died at Geneva very old, in 1628 [B]. The ordinary date of his epistles dedicatory is from St Gervais, which is the name of part of Geneva. If we did not know, that he dated in the same manner the letters that he did not design for the public (c), we should doubtless believe, that he did it, because this date did not make his compositions suspected by the Catholics, as the name of Geneva would have done. He had a very extensive knowledge of books; for which reason Henry III desiring to know the author, who disguised himself under the name of Stephanus Junius Brutus, to vent a very republican doctrine, sent a man on purpose to Simon Goulart, to be informed of it; but Goulart, who knew all the mystery, would not discover it, for fear of exposing those that were concerned (d). Scalliger

[A] He was one of the most indefatigable writers of these latter times. This appears by the multitude of books he adorned with notes and summaries (1), or comments, or which he turned into French, or wrote of his own. Du Bartas's weeks are one of the books, upon which he has commented. He did not content himself to translate Camerarius's historical meditations into French, but added many thing to them. He made a great collection of admirable and memorable stories. La Croix du Maine will inform you of many French translations written by Simon Goulart; that of the history of Portugal (2); of the chronicle of Carion; of some tracts of Theodoret; of John Wierus's books concerning the imposture of devils. Add to this the version of all the works of Seneca, published at Paris, in two volumes, in 4to in the year 1590. The same author writ several tracts of devotion and morality, and upon the affairs of his time. D'Aubigné praises the latter; for, giving the titles of some books of this kind, he goes on thus: 'To which I will add the several learned, patriotic, and cogent writings, which Simon Goulart, of Senlis, has written on several occasions; a writer

'fit to write history, if his profession had permitted him to write without judging (3).'

I have observed in the margin, that Simon Goulart added notes and summaries to Amiot's Plutarch. I must farther say, that he added to them some parallels, upon which Varillas passes no favourable judgment. 'As ingenious, says he (4), as was Simon Goulart, of Senlis, minister of Geneva in our father's time; and as diligent as he was to add to the French Plutarch the comparisons that are wanting in the Greek, there is but one that is good, which is that of Alexander the Great with Julius Cæsar.'

[B] He died very old, in 1628 (§ 2). We learn from a letter that he wrote to Scaliger, the seventeenth of October 1606 (5), that he was then at the end of his sixty third year. There are few that have been in the ministry so long as he: for he succeeded Calvin in the year 1564 (6).

[(§ 2) Simon Goulart died at the age of eighty six years, and had preached seven days before his death. This is what D'Aubigné says, in the last page of his Opuscula Miscellanea, where we find the ecology of this minister. REM. CRIT.]

liger esteemed him much [C]. A son of Simon Goulart was minister of the Walloon church at Amsterdam, and earnestly espoused the Arminian interest [D].

[C] Scaliger esteemed him much.] 'Mr Goulart... has succeeded well upon his Cyprian. He is a fine man, who has learned every thing of himself; and who began the Latin tongue late, when I was at Geneva. It is said, that his son pleases his church. I like Mr Goulart's performance upon his Cyprian: I have read it throughout. His sermons were very perspicuous. He has castrated Montagne's works; Quæ audacia in scripta aliena! Non putassem Goulartium, quod serius incæpit, tam bene posse scribere, ut scit (7). I shall now speak of his son.

[D] One of his sons espoused the Arminian interest.] Being provoked by a young minister, his colleague, he preached one day against those, who say, that, by virtue of the decrees of reprobation, some children, who die at the breast, or in their mothers womb, are damned eternally. He was suspended for it in 1615 (8). He was one of the Remonstrant ministers, who, for refusing to subscribe to the synod of Dort, were turned out of their places, and expelled the country. He retired to Antwerp; from whence he wrote some letters, that have been inserted in the collection, which I cite in the margin. He wrote one to his father in March, 1620 (9), in which he mentions a book, which he had printed two years before, with this title: Examen des opinions de M. F. Bassecourt (10) contenues en son livre de disputes, intitulé, Election éternelle & ses dependances. He retired into France after the end of the truce between the Dutch and the Spaniards, and staid some years at Calais, from whence he went into the country of Holstein. There is one of his letters (11), which gives no good testimony to the ministers, with respect to the wars of religion, which prevailed in France at that time. According to Mr Witte, he was born at Senlis (12), and died at Fredericstade in 1628, at fifty two years of age. Mr Mollerus, who thought he was of Geneva, before his reading the second Tome of the Diarium Biographicum, changed his notion, when he knew that Mr Witte made him a native of Senlis: Senlisensem Silvaneum esse rectius forte tradit vir clarissimus Henr. Wittenius (13). I think Mr Mollerus's first opinion the more probable of the two; and as he observes, that Mr Witte ascribes to Goulart the son, the works he should have ascribed to Goulart the father; he might have said, that probably the time of the death of the one has been confounded with that of the other (14). See what he afterwards observed in his book De scriptoribus homonymis, at the 678th and 679th pages.

GOULU (NICOLAS), in Latin Gulonius, the son of a Vine-Dresser near Chartres [A], was made Regius Professor of the Greek tongue in the university of Paris, in the year 1567 (a), in the place of John Daurat, whose daughter he had married. He translated from Greek into Latin, Gregentius's dispute against Herbanus the Jew (b), which Giles de Noailles, ambassador of France in Turkey, brought from Constantinople. This version, together with some notes of Nicolas Goulou, was printed with the Greek text at Paris in the year 1586. A collection of several pieces of this professor had already been printed in the same city, in 1580 [B]. He had two sons, John and Jerom, of whom I shall speak hereafter. Magdalen Daurat, his wife, was a learned woman. Her epitaph shews, that she understood the Greek, Latin, Italian, and Spanish tongues. Mr Menage (c) affords me all these particulars. We shall see in the articles of Nicholas Goulou's sons, or in the remarks of this article, what remains to be observed concerning his works. It is somewhat probable, that d'Aubigné meant him in the eighth chapter of the first book of his Baron de Fénéste. The place is very satirical [C]. Some wonder, that Daurat did not oblige his son-in-law to change his name of Goulou [D].

(c) Ibid.

[A] He was the son of a vine-dresser near Chartres.] William du Val, who, in his catalogue of the royal professors, says that Nicolas Goulou was of Limoulin, has committed a fault; and perhaps has done it by considering, that Daurat, who had given Nicolas Goulou one of his daughters, and his place, was of that country. Goulou himself declares, before some Latin poems, which he published, that he was of Chartres (1).

(1) Menage, Remarques sur la Vie d'Ayraud, pag. 251, 252.

[B] A collection of several pieces of this professor had been already published.] Namely, the translation of Apollinaris's Greek paraphrase upon the Psalms: a paraphrase in Greek verse upon the Magnificat, the Nunc Dimittis, the Song of Zachary; an hymn of Jesus Christ; and a preface in Greek verse upon Apollinaris's paraphrase. This book was unknown to the last continuator of Gesner's epitome, and to Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who made some additions to that epitome. And it does not appear in the catalogues of Draudius, nor in that of Oxford, nor in that of Thuanus, nor in that of the archbishop of Reims.

[C] The place is very satirical.] For the honour of the learned Magdalen Daurat, I could wish, that either Nicolas Goulou had been married twice, and that the four following lines concerned his other wife; or that d'Aubigné was not mistaken about the country of him he mentions: for this would prove, that this satire does not concern Nicolas Goulou. However it be, it is thus he speaks: 'There was, at Paris, a native of Loudon, and a learned man, called le Goulou: he was mad, when his wife took to board those that studied the law: he would only have little boys: upon this, four verses were made, the sense whereof is well worth the rhyme.' They are these:

Du Goulou savant ne prend guerres
Les barbus pour Pensionnaires;

Il choisit les petits enfans,
Mais la Goulouë les veut gaudes.

Goulou to board will ne're take in Youths with a beard upon their chin;
Children alone be'll entertain;
But Madam Goulou will have men.

That which might make one suspect, than John Daurat's son-in-law is not here meant, is, to see, that he is not styled professor, or Greek reader; which probably d'Aubigné was not ignorant of; and he was not a man, who on such an occasion would be wanting to characterize a man. Let us therefore leave the thing undecided. Du Verdier Vau-Privas did not know this man's christian name. 'Daurat says he (2), had a daughter, whom he married to G. Goulou, a public reader of the Greek tongue, with whom he had some debate; and, speaking of him, he called him mon Goulou, (my glutton).'

[D] Some wonder that Daurat did not oblige him to change his name of Goulou.] I borrow this remark from Mr Baillet. 'This same Daurat, says he (3), who seemed to be ashamed of, and disgusted with, the name of Dysnemandi (dine-early), made no scruple to marry his daughter to another learned man, named Goulou (glutton); which name denotes something still baser than that of Dysnemandi, and which is not much better than Lurco among the Latins. After what he had done for his own name, there is reason to wonder he did not make it an article in the contract of his daughter's marriage, that Goulou should change his name; and that he was willing, that not only his son-in-law, but also his grand-children, should preserve that name, and render it immortal to posterity, without taking any farther liberty than that of changing it into Latin by the word Gulonius. Doubtless there is reason to wonder at it: for on one hand, the practice of metamorphosing one's name was common at that time amongst the learned; and, on the other, it must needs be somewhat unpleasant to bear a name, which excites certain ideas, and occasions a thousand silly allusions. It is very probable, that, when families began to distinguish themselves by proper names, some persons were called by a name that suited them for certain defects. This is in all likelihood the reason why, in all countries, some families bear the name of blind, crooked, and black. Upon this score, Du-rat should have been displeased with a name that made people think he was descended from a starveling, and that his son-in-law had not a better original. I omit the scurvy jests, that the poets of Balzac's party grounded upon the name of his adversary Father Goulou. See the Vaticinium Galateæ de exitu Pantophagi, prefixed to Mr de la Motte-Aignon's answer (4).

(4) Compare with this what you find in remark [A] of the article FEU-ARDENTIUS.

GOULU (JOHN), son of him I have been mentioning, had not perhaps more merit than his father, though he made more noise. He was born at Paris the twenty fifth of August 1576 (a), and, being admitted an advocate, he designed to exercise that profession in the parliament of that city; but he had the misfortune to be at a stand the very first time he pleaded a cause [A]; and it is thought, that this disgrace made him resolve to leave the world, and turn monk. He chose the order of the Feuillants, and was admitted into it in 1604. He was so much esteemed in his order, that he had always some office in it, and at last was made general [B]. His religious name was that of Dom John of St Francis. As he understood Greek, he applied himself to translate into French Epictetus's Enchiridion, Arrianus's Dissertations, some tracts of St Basil, and the works of Dionysius the Areopagite [C]. He added to this last translation an apology for the works of this Dionysius. He also revised the Latin version his father had made of the tracts of St Gregory Nyssen against Eunomius, and published it. It is in the edition of St Gregory Nyssen (b), procured by Fronto Ducaeus (c). Father Goulou, not contented with making translations, engaged also in controversy, and wrote a book against that, which Du Moulin had published concerning the call of pastors [D]. We have also his life of Francis de Sales, bishop of Geneva; and his funeral oration of celeberrimus inter Jurisconsultos tunc temporis eminere possit. We must not deprive an elogy of the privilege of being subreptitious, but we should not extend it so far as to make it obreptitious.

[B] He chose the order of the Feuillants: . . . He was made general. They, who say he was twice general (8), did not consult his elogy in the second edition of his Dionysius the Areopagite (9). This elogy informs us, that, from the time of his novitiate, he had always some employments in the order; and that at last he was raised to the first, which he exercised for six years; after which he was made counsellor, and assistant to him that succeeded him. From whence it appears, that la Motte-Aignon is mistaken, when he says (10), that Dom John Goulou has been these three years general of his order. He wrote this in 1627, or in 1628. Father Goulou died in the beginning of 1629, being no longer in the office of general, which he had exercised six years: the conclusion is evident. An author of Livonia (11) says, that this father was general of the congregation of the order of Cîteaux: he should have said, of the congregation of the Feuillants, which is a branch of the order of Cîteaux.

I have not named each translation according to its time; but here they are in better order. The first was that of Dionysius the Areopagite, which was printed in 1608, and reprinted in 1629, and in 1642. The second was that of Epictetus: it came out in 1609, and it appears by the licence, that he undertook it for queen Mary de Medicis. The third was that of St Basil's homilies upon the Hexameron, which was printed in 1616 (12).

[D] He wrote a book against that, which Du Moulin published concerning the call of pastors. I find a great difference betwixt the monk St Romuald, and la Motte-Aignon; not only with respect to the quality of this answer, which the latter despises, as much as the other commends it; but also with respect to the time, in which it was written. It was in the life-time of Francis de Sales, if we believe the monk: who tells us (13), that this prelate, having read the book of the Call of Pastors against Du Moulin, judged, that Father Goulou was the only person fit to succeed in the labours of cardinal du Perron against Heresy. But la Motte-Aignon pretends (14), that this father officiously undertook this answer after the death of Coiffeteau; and he admires how he should presume to think himself a proper combatant to succeed the great Coiffeteau against Du Moulin. Francis de Sales died some months before Coiffeteau; and therefore he had not seen Father Goulou's answer, if

Nicolas le Fevre, preceptor to Lewis XIII: but it is said he never recited it [E]. To speak the truth, he got no great reputation by those pieces; but he was engaged in an affair in the year 1627, that made him extremely talked of [F]. A Feuillant, who went only by the name of Brother Andrew (d), had made a small collection of thoughts, whereof he believed Balzac had only been the transcriber. Those, who envied Balzac's glory, so mightily cried up this piece, which was only handed about in manuscript, that it gave occasion to the Apology, which Ogier, his good friend, published, in which Brother Andrew was very severely treated. The copy that was sent to Father Goulu, who was then general of the order, was taken for a challenge, which put him into a furious passion. He published two volumes of letters against Balzac, wherein he horribly inveighs against him. He gave himself the name of Phyllarchus, that is to say, Prince des feuilles, Prince of the leaves, as his adversaries rendered it; and it is not to be doubted, that he had in view his quality of general of the Feuillants, when he disguised himself under this false name. To have a right notion of his animosity, one need only consider, that he did all that lay in him to engage the whole world in the ruin of Balzac, and gave him up to all the rigour of the secular power: nay, he attempted to engage the women in the punishment of this adversary. He directed his speech to them, using the flattering words of handsome ladies (e); and declared, That if they had never so little courage, they were obliged to put out Balzac's eyes with the points of their needles; or, in case of mercy, to submit him to the same punishment the court ladies designed to inflict on John de Meun; which was that of the lash. The zeal of Father Goulu, who thus, in a book, raised all the world against an author, whose whole fault consisted in using some thoughts, that were insipid, too free, and too immodest, and in not repressing the heat and exaggeration of a growing imagination; this zeal, I say, that came from the press, was not the most mischievous. That of his emissaries, who as far as his jurisdiction reached, and wherever they could set foot, vented, in conversation, a thousand disadvantageous things against Mr de Balzac [G], according to the custom of bigots [H], was much more dangerous. Then it was that Father Goulu's

if it was undertaken at the time specified by la Motte-Aigron. But that you may know on which side the mistake lies, I ought to inform you, that Father Goulu's book against Du Moulin came out in 1620, and Coëffeteau did not die till 1623.

[E] We have . . . his funeral oration of Nicolas le Fevre . . . but it is pretended, that he never recited it. La Motte-Aigron positively affirms it; and therefore we must read with some caution what is said in Moreri's dictionary, in the article of Nicolas le Fevre, that John de St François, a Feuillant, made his funeral oration. Mr Balzac (15) cites a passage of it, which is in a very high-flown style, and somewhat harsh. It was printed the first time in 1612. The author put his name only to the second edition in 1616. The third edition was enlarged with two tracts (16).

(15) Relat. à Menandre, part III.

[F] He was engaged in an affair in the year 1627 that made him extremely talked of. This is the epoch of Balzac's and Father Goulu's difference; for that which incensed the latter, was, the apology published for the former, and printed off the eighth of April 1627. The first volume of Phyllarchus's letters, which came out the same year, is chiefly levelled at Mr Balzac; but the apologist is also attacked in it from time to time. This shews, that Menage and Peter Borel are mistaken, in saying, the one (17), that prior Ogier answered Father Goulu's books against Mr Balzac, in a book, intitled, Mr Balzac's apology; the other (18), that Des Cartes very seasonably recommended Mr Balzac, in opposition to Father Goulu, in the year 1625, to cardinal Barberini, legate in France. It is certain, that prior Ogier's book was published before Phyllarchus's letters, and that, in 1625, Balzac had no controversy with Father Goulu.

(19) Richelet, vie des Auteurs François, prefixed to a collection of letters, pag. 42.

Richelet has committed the same fault as Mr Menage. Father Goulu, says he (19), inveighed more against Balzac; for he wrote a very severe criticism upon his writings, which might have given some trouble to that eloquent man, if Mr Ogier, a young ecclesiastic, had not writ an apology, wherein he shewed, that the good father was in the wrong. We should, in matters of fact, follow the advice, which Des Cartes gives with respect to philosophical speculations, examine every thing afresh without any regard to what others have written concerning it: but it is infinitely more convenient to stand to the testimony of others; and this is what prodigiously multiplies the assertors of falsities.

The proof of this is to be found in the Relations to Menandre. You there see (20), that, in all the places subject to the general of the Feuillants jurisdiction, Balzac was now called the monster; and that he was known to the novices and lay-brothers only by that name. You there find Balzac's complaints against the inventions and artifices of calumny. 'Nothing has been omitted, says he (21), to give credit to my adversary, and to destroy my reputation. A school difference is become an affair of state; and a sport about syllables and words is grown into a general war of wits. Many stories have been spread to my prejudice, and many more to the advantage of my enemy. All voices have been canvassed; all France has been solicited for him. He has neither wanted orators, nor poets, nor parasites, who have preached him up, and sung him, and drank to his victory in good companies. . . . (22) Not to speak of the practices carried out of the kingdom, and of the monstrous picture that has been made of me in all the courts of christendom; you need only know what happened at Paris in the first heat of the war. For three months together, several men of his faction went out every morning, two and two, being ordered to do me ill offices in all the districts of the vulgar, and every where to spread their slanders, with a design to raise the populace upon me, and move them to treat my person, as their superior has treated my book. . . . To strengthen their crew, they have been in quest of men, condemned by the public voice; men, famous for their debaucheries and scandalous lives; known all over the kingdom by the ill opinion they entertain of the Christian faith, and the contempt they profess of our holy mysteries. They have offered to this set of people; who can believe it? but it is true, however, that they have offered them their protection against the Jesuits; and that they have emboldened them against the alarms of their conscience, and the threatenings of the laws: 'It is true, that they promised them their favour and testimony, in case they should be accused of impiety, or of any other capital crime, provided they would join with them on this occasion, and declare war against me, under the banner of my adversary.'

Some of them write libels, which others set off in conversation; and there are no cavils, but by this means they convert into good reasons with abundance of people. It is a scene that is acted in all countries: such people are so well known, that it has been no difficult thing to paint them to the

Alone, with ease, the goblet's weight sustains.*

We find, in the eleventh book of Athenæus, a long explication of Homer's verses relating to this cup; but, far from meeting with any thing in it that favours la Motte-Aigron, I have found in that author, that the thing is not to be understood as if no Greek could have lifted the cup, but that no old man like Nestor could have done it. Hercules, who was a great drinker (39), had a very great cup; but I do not observe, that it required three men to carry it. Statius allows but two.

Two youths bring forth, and sweat beneath the weight.*

*This erst Alcides, when from toilsome war,
Or slaughter'd monster, he return'd, was wont
Singly to lift, and quaff the liquor off.*

Many things might be said concerning Hercules's cup, which was of that prodigious capacity, according to some, as to have served him for a vessel upon the sea (41); but all this would be foreign to the purpose (42).

GOULU (JEROME), younger brother of the foregoing, was Regius Professor of the Greek tongue in his father's place; whom he succeeded at eighteen years of age (a), in the year 1595 (b). He was afterwards physician of the faculty of Paris. I speak of his children in a remark [A]. It has been said in the elogy of the general of the Feuillants, that he resigned the professorship of the Greek tongue to his younger brother [B].

[A] I speak of his children in a remark. His wife was Charlotte de Monantheuil, daughter to Henry de Monantheuil, dean of the faculty of physic at Paris, and Regius Professor of mathematics. From this marriage proceeded, amongst other children, NICOLAS GOULU, who wrote a book of elogies on the Goulus; JAMES, steward of the king's household, known by the name of Mr de Monantheuil, and Martha wife to Renatus Labitte, advocate in the parliament, grand-nephew to that James Labitte, judge of Maienne, who made an index to the books of the civilians, and who has been honourably mentioned by Cujas, in the first chapter of the fourth book, and in the fifteenth chapter of the fifth book of his observations (1).

[B] The general of the Feuillants resigned the professorship of the Greek tongue to his younger brother. These are the first words of that elogium (2). 'Inter Gallos doctrina illustres Joannes Gulonius annurari meretur, quem Nicolaus pater (Joannis Aurati gener ac in regia Græcæ linguæ professione successor) singulari naturæ bonitate præditum adolescentem non vulgariter & adeo felici successu instruit, ut ab Academiæ Parisiensis curatoribus dignissimus sit judicatus, qui sublato è vivis parente literarum ejus professionem susceperet; sed in fratrem se minorem muneri istius functionem paternam pietate transmisit. . . . John Goulu deserves to be ranked among the learned men of the French nation, whom his father Nicholas (son-in-law of Joannes Auratus, and successor in the royal professorship of the Greek tongue) educated with such success, by reason of his uncommon genius, that the curators of the university of Paris thought him the most fit person to succeed his father in his professorship: but he, with a paternal piety, delivered over that employment to his younger brother.

GOURNAI (MARY DE JARS, DE), adopted by Michael de Montagne [A], and famous for her learning. See, in Moreri, what family she was of, and several other circumstances of her life. I have not much to add to it. We find in the Perroniana, a very disobliging touch upon this gentlewoman [B]: The occasion of it was a satire,

[A] She was adopted by Michael de Montagne. She expressed no less respect and zeal for this father by adoption, than for her true one. You will acknowledge this, if you consider well what she says in the preface to Montagne's essays. She caused this book to be printed in the year 1635, and dedicated it to cardinal de Richelieu. The preface she added to it deserves to be read, and will particularly please those, who love the history of books, and editions. The judgment she made of Montagne's first essays, and the affection she expressed for Montagne, upon the bare esteem she conceived for him long before she saw him, put that author upon many reflexions, and occasioned the adoption. He esteemed her from that time and foretold she would be capable of the finest things (1).

(1) See Montagne's Essays, lib. ii, cap. xvi, at the end, pag. m. 606.

(2) Pasquier, in the second volume of his letters, book xviii, pag. m. 384, 385.

Pasquier acquaints us with some circumstances of this kind of adoption. 'Michael Montagne, says he (2), left two daughters; one that came from his marriage, heirs to all his estate, who is well married: the other his daughter by adoption, heirs of his studies; both of them most virtuous ladies: but I cannot conclude my letter without speaking more particularly of the second. She is Madame de Jars, related to many great and noble families of Paris. She never intended to have any other husband than her honour, enriched with the reading of good books, especially the Lord Montagne's essays; who, in 1558, making a long stay at Paris, she came on purpose to visit him, to be personally acquainted with him. Besides, Madame de Gournai, her mother, and she, brought him to their house at Gournai, where he was three months, in two or three several journeys, with all the civil treatment that could be desired. At last, this virtuous lady, hearing of his death, crossed almost all France, by the help of passports, as well by her own desire, as that of the widow and daughter of the deceased, who invited her to come and join her tears and lamentations with theirs. The story is truly memorable.'

[B] We find in the Perroniana, a very disobliging touch upon this lady. I set down the passage at length. As Mr Pelletier was telling him (3) one day, that he had met Mademoiselle de Gournai, going to petition the lieutenant-criminal (4), to prohibit 'La Défense des Beurrieres, (a Vindication of the Butter-women) because therein she is called a strolcher, and one that has served the public; he said, I do not believe the lieutenant will order any one to seize her body; for few would take that pains; and as for what is said, that she has served the public, she has done it so privately, that it is only guessed at. To shew the contrary, she needs only put her picture to her book; which is the answer I once made to Mademoiselle de Surgeres, who desired me, at Mr Rets's, to prefix an epistle to Ronfard's works, to shew that he did not love her in a dishonourable way. I told her, instead of this epistle, you need only prefix your picture to them. I am certain, Mrs de Gournai would have taken this railery for the greatest affront: for, though nature had amply made amends for the faults of her face, by the perfections of her mind; so that, if she had been despised for her body, she had a ready and glorious consolation, yet there is no probability, that she was ever so humble as to renounce the esteem of her bodily agreeableness, so much as reason required. I question whether the virtue of the greatest saints would be proof against so desperate an affront as this.

(3) That is criminal du Perron.

(4) Methinks the prohibition of books belongs to the lieutenant-civil.

satire, wherein she was brought in, and which was one of the sequels of the Anti-Coton [C]. There was also a libel published under the title of Anti-Gournai (a). Notwithstanding cardinal du Perron's biting railery, he had an esteem for this learned gentlewoman. He is in the list of those, who have praised her [D]. She was regularly paid the little pension granted her by the court (b); and she always lived unmarried. She was very well received, when she waited upon the princesses [E]. She had done well not to write against the partisans of the Anti-Coton. A person of her sex ought carefully to avoid such quarrels. Satisfactions are a sort of rustics, who observe no measures (c): They attack women in the most sensible part. She was represented, not only as older than she was [F], but also as a woman of a bad life (d). There were published much at the same time two stories, which are but little alike, concerning Mr de Racan, and Mrs de Gournai [G]. I wonder Moreri should say, that her books did not come out till after her death (e).

viz. To silence the calumny of those satirical wits, who say you have not preserved an exact continence, you need only shew your self or your picture. It is certain, that cardinal Perron carried the insult beyond all bounds; and I believe the gentlewoman would have been more willing to have had no learning, and very little wit, than to pass for a person so void of handsoneliness, as to preserve her virginity, only because she could find none that would take it.

[C]. Occasioned by a satire, wherein she was brought in, and which was one of the sequels of the Anti-Coton.] This satire, in the Perroniana, is called La Defense des Beurrieres (the Defence of the Butter-women). I could easily believe this was not the true title, and that it should be called Le Remercement des Beurrieres (the Thanks of the Butter-women); for I have read a satire (5) intitled, Le Remercement des Beurrieres de Paris au Sieur de Courbouzon Montgomery, in which are these words at the beginning (6): And particularly by the noble defence of the Fathers Jesuits, which, following the steps and memoirs of Mrs Gournai, who has always well served the public, you have published a week ago. Some pages after, we read this (7): Not long ago (it is a butter-woman, who speaks to the Sieur de Courbouzon) some awkward people went about to interlope upon your market, and to rob you of your custom, as one Peletier, and Mrs Gournai, a maid of fifty years of age, who have pretended to publish defences for the Jesuits, as having an interest in the cause, under pretence they have been recalled and re-established at the request and solicitation of the pension-general of Venus. To which if we add a passage which I put in the margin (8), I think it will be manifest, that all the complaints Mrs Gournai designed to make to the judges, concerned the Remercement des Beurrieres. For the rest, what I have cited from this satire shews, that Mrs de Gournai

(9) published some pieces for the Jesuits, and against the Anti-Coton. Here is the title of the piece, that is ridiculed in the Remercement des Beurrieres: le Fleau d'Ariflogiton, ou contra le Calomniateur des Peres Jesuites, sous le titre d'ANTI-COTON, par Louis de Montgomery Sieur de Courbouzon. We may affirm a thing, which Mr Baillet does not affirm (10), viz. that the author of the Fleau d'Ariflogiton appeared under his true name. Mr Baillet thinks, that Courbouzon's piece came out after the Fleau d'Ariflogiton (11), whereas they are both one and the same. The adversaries of the Jesuits were not contented with insulting our maid in the Remercement des Beurrieres, but they wrote a book against her, which they intitled, Anti-Gournai. Mr Baillet speaks of it, but not in giving the list of the pieces that came out on occasion of the Anti-Coton (12): nay, he does not seem to have known, that this gentlewoman was concerned in that Anti.

[D] Cardinal du Perron . . . is in the list of those who have praised her.] To prove this, I will set down a very long passage, which concerns her, in the memoirs of the abbot de Marolles. They, who shall think I might have been contented to transcribe part of it, are such as are not curious to know the particulars of the lives of illustrious persons. It is not for such readers that I write. I make this declaration once for all. 'This honest maid, (thus it is the abbot de Marolles speaks concerning our Mrs Gournai) whom I have always very much esteemed, and whom I have frequently visited, had a candid and generous soul. The beauty of her mind was greater than that of her body; and the knew abundance of things, which are not common to persons of her sex. We have several books of her writing, both in prose and verse, that are collected into one volume, which she printed in her life-time, and intitled, Prejens de la Demoiselle de Gournai. They, who attempted to jest upon her, had no reason to boast of it. Many great persons have praised her, both in her life-time, and since her death; and, amongst others, Michael de Montagne, Justus Lipsius, cardinal du Perron, cardinal Richelieu, Mr Coppean bishop of Nantes, Mr de Rochepois bishop of Poitiers, Mr Seguier chancellor of France, and the superintendants, who always carefully paid her a little pension, which the king allowed her; and she refused a larger, for the keeping a coach, which I know was offered her by cardinal Richelieu. Many learned men did also frequently visit her; and the good lady reckoned, in the number of her best friends, Mr de la Mothe le Vayer, the prior Ogier, and his brother, and Messieurs Haberts, Cerisai, Le stoile, Boisrobert, de Revol, Colletet, Malleville, all well known in the republic of learning; and, if I mistake not, she did me the honour to place me among them (13). [E] She was very well received, when she waited upon the princesses.] The same abbot de Marolles says so, speaking of the duke of Retelais, eldest son to the duke of Nevers. 'Mrs Gournai, says he (14), was one of his great diversions, and though he was of a galanting temper, yet there was no lady but he would leave to discourse with her, whether he saw her at his sister's, or whether he found her at Madam de Longueville's, his aunt, or at the countess of Soisson's, whom he visited sometimes. [F] She was represented as older than she was.] See, printing the first edition of her works.

[G] There were published two stories, which are but little alike concerning Mr de Racan and Mrs Gournai.] The first is to be found in the Menagiana (15), and the Paris in 1633; other in the Recueil des bons mots (16). The first represents Mr de Racan and Mrs de Gournai, as two persons, who very frequently visited each other, and spoke their mind very freely, when they disliked each other's verses; which, amongst authors that are friends, is the very top of familiarity. But, on the contrary, the second story is wholly adapted to persuade us, that there was an ill understanding betwixt them. It goes under the name of one of Boisrobert's good stories, and is called, the three Racons. It is pretended, that this gentlewoman desiring to know the marquis de Racan, there was a wit, who persuaded him to give her a visit; but, when he knew the day and the hour, he had the malice to send to this gentlewoman, some time before, a person of the court, pretending to be the marquis de Racan. When this visit was over, he went himself to Mrs de Gournai, and called himself the marquis de Racan. He was received, and expressed to the lady a great surprize, that any one should have Colfe, who the confidence to assume his name, to pay her a visit. As soon as he was gone, the true Racan arrived. Mrs de Gournai had immediately notice of it: she was a Gascon (17), and something choleric in her temper; she flew into a passion at the sight of this third Racan, and without waiting till he spoke to her, Must I see nothing but Racans all the days of my life? said she in a rage; and arming herself with a slipper, she vigorously charged him, and drove him out of her chamber, without hearing him speak, giving him all the ill language her anger could suggest; and that she was not a Gascon, get;

gest: which so surprized the poor marquis de Racan, that he could not answer a word, but got away in haste, thinking that this learned lady was run mad (18). I could easily believe this to be a fable; and I chiefly judge so, because of the assault of the slipper. Probably it was either a meer invention, or a flourish of Boissier, to make a jest both of Racan and this learned lady. However, this adventure is very inconsistent with the great intimacy, mentioned by Menage, between that learned lady and the marquis de Racan. The following passage is to be found in the Menagiana (19). 'The marquis de Racan one day visited Mrs de Gournai, who shewed him some epigrams she had made, and asked his opinion of them. Mr de Racan told her, they had nothing good in them, and were without any wit. She answered, he ought not to take notice of that, because they were epigrams after the Greek fashion. They went afterwards to dine together at Mr de Lorme's, a physician. A dish of soup being brought in, that was not very good, she, turning to Mr de Racan, told him, Sir, this is a bad soup: madam, said he, it is a soup after the Greek fashion.' I shall observe, by the by, that this story has undergone the alterations usual to stories of this nature: the circumstances of it are prodigiously diversified. Read this passage of the defence de Voiture (20). 'Some body translated once, for one of our poets (21), who did not understand Greek, some epigrams of the Antologia. . . . He found them so flat and insipid, that, dining the next day at a prince's table, where a soup was brought in, that tasted of nothing but water, turning to one of his friends, who had seen those epigrams with him, here is, said he, a true soup after the Greek fashion.'

Note, that the story of the three Racans has been inserted in the continuation of the Menagiana (22); and so it is supposed, that Mr Menage contradicted himself sometimes in his conversations.

[H] She was very angry at this change of language. Here follows a passage, in which Sorel takes notice of an omission of Father Bouhours. 'To speak of a person, who was very angry at that time with this suppression of words, he should have mentioned good Mrs de Gournai, whom Aristus, one of the interlocutors in the dialogues in question, places amongst the illustrious and ingenious women. Certainly she well deserved it. But I would still place, above her learning, her generosity, goodness, and other incomparable virtues. It must however be owned, that she always kept some resentment against the new authors of her time; but she had reason for it; for some of them took a particular delight in exposing her. Those, who formerly saw her, know that she was in a violent passion, when she mentioned the new band, or the new cabal, and that it was her foible. She might afford matter enough for discourse about the language, both on account of what she was heard to say, and of what she has written about it. Those, who are not old enough to have conversed with her, must have recourse to her book, intitled, Les Avis & les Presens de la Demoiselle de Gournai. There are in it many chapters concerning the French language, and amongst others, the chapter of Diminutives, and some about poetry, in which she would revive the words compounded in imitation of the Greeks, and keep up Ronfard's language, without any exception (23). Let us see how Menage has described the passion of this lady. He at first mentions the proscription of these noble words:

... Mout, ains, jagoit,
Ores, adonc, maint, ainssi-foit,
A-tant, si que, piteux, icelle,
Trop plus, trop mieux, blandice, isnelle,

Though such presumption (with reverence be it spoken) does a prejudice to your petitioners, your good and faithful clients; and that the learned Madam Gournay, in favour of antiquity, has solicited our body to make it's public complaints against the decrying these ancient words: Nevertheless, &c.

Doubtless, many persons said, that Mrs de Gournai, being affected with the distemper of old people, condemned the reformation of the language, only because it was the production of young authors; or because she could not approve of it, without owning, that, at her great age, she wanted to go to school again. Doubtless, they applied to her what Horace said of some people, who fancy that their taste is the only rule of what is good, or that it were a shameful thing for them to yield to new-comers, and to confess, in their old age, the vanity of the studies of their youth.

Vel quia nil rectum, nisi quod placuit tibi, ducunt;

Imberbes didicere senes perdenda fateri (34).

Or that they like their own opinions best;

Or that they scorn, when aged, to submit

To greener years, and less experienc'd youth.

But, all things duly considered, this gentlewoman was not so much in the wrong as is imagined; and it were to be wished, that the best authors of that time had vigorously withstood the proscription of many words, which have nothing of harshness in them, and would serve to vary the expression, to avoid verses, consonancies, and ambiguities. A false delicacy, which was too much indulged, has very much impoverished the French language. The best writers complain of it; even those, who are least in want of words, and whose fruitful genius is able to supply that defect. See the reflexions of Mr de la Bruyere (25). Some of them bestow a thousand blessings on the bishop of Meaux, the bishop of Nîmes, and such other authors of the first rank, when they see them use words beginning to grow obsolete. This re-inflates, and makes them young again; at least it is a barrier against prescription, and may be opposed to the cavils of the Purists. Our language is very much indebted to the writers, who say certes in prose, and expose themselves for that word in their works (26). The same observation might be made with respect to other very convenient words, which the false delicacy of some wits, or the caprice of custom, have deprived, and daily deprive us of. The cause of the evil does not wholly lie in the inconstancy of living languages, which the antients have experienced, and very well described.

verses were made in praise of her cat; but I am persuaded, that the wits would have made many poems upon that subject, if her mistress had been young and handsome. It was a cat, whose fidelity has been immortalized by the abbot de Marolles [1].

Old words revives, and antiquates the new.*

There is I know not what conspiracy in the matter, which proceeds, not so much from the readers, that are authors, as from those, that are not. The latter give themselves the pleasure of criticising, without knowing what trouble there is in composing. Those, that are sensible of it, are more indulgent to words. I except two sorts of authors: the young, and those who write but a little piece in two or three years. A young author, who hardly reads any books but such as are the newest, calls fine language only the terms and expressions he finds in them. Wo to every word, and phrase, which he finds elsewhere: this is a word of the old court, says he; it begins to grow obsolete. As for a writer of half a page a day, he has not time to be sensible of the trouble occasioned by the suppression of abundance of expressions, which were good in the reign of Henry IV, and Lewis XIII. For which reason he pretends to be disgusted at all the words, that are suspected of being old. But, if he were to compose a long work, and at a quicker rate, he would not be so squeamish: the difficulties of the task, the intri-cacy of the repetitions, the almost unavoidable necessity of rhiming in prose, &c. would discover to him the prejudice that is done to authors by impoverishing the language they make use of.

[1] She had a cat, whose fidelity has been immortalized by the abbot de Marolles. He did the same service to a linnet of his landlady. 'A linnet, says he' (28), that did belong to the most worthy and most virtuous Mrs Belleville, in whose house I lodge at Paris, lived with her above fourteen years; and, tho' it were never so fine weather, this little bird never attempted to fly away, when it's good mistress put him out of his cage on her chamber-window. Mrs de Gournai's Pailion (which was the name of her cat), for the space of twelve years that she lived with her, never went out of her chamber one night, to run upon the gutters and tiles, like other cats. If this gentlewoman had had such galants as Catullus, her cat would have been celebrated as much as Lesbia's sparrow. Note, that the abbot de Marolles forgets not this sparrow, nor Melior's parrot (29), nor Stella's pigeon (30). To these examples we may add Madam des Houlières's spaniel (31).

GRAIN (BAPTIST LE), master of the requests in ordinary to Mary de Medicis, queen of France, has writ some pretty good histories [A]. He was born about the Year 1563 (a). He does not express any bitterness against the Protestants; on the contrary, he declares strongly for the edict that was granted them [B].

[A] He wrote some pretty good histories. We have two decads of his. The first is the history of Henry the great: the second is the history of Lewis XIII, from the beginning of his reign to the death of the marshal d'Ancre in 1617. 'In some parts of it, he has given us some particulars, that are not to be found elsewhere; and it is thought this history was impartially written, as by a true Frenchman.' This is what Sorel (1) says concerning the first decad. As to the second, he says (2), 'that this history having been published in the time, and during the credit of those, whom the historian speaks of, what happened before is very much cried down. The marshal d'Ancre, and those of his party, are very ill treated. Even the good servants of the queen-mother are not spared, which formerly made this book sought for, by some out of curiosity, and by others with a design to suppress it. It is especially observed, that as to what concerns the bishop of Lussan, who was afterwards cardinal de Richelieu, this author 'mentions a letter of his directed to the marshal d'Ancre, which is said to be written in very submissive terms.' There is good reason for saying so (3).

[B] He declared strongly for the edict that was granted to the Protestants. See the seventh book (4) of the decad of Henry IV, where you will find a fine apology for this prince, on account of the edict of Nantes; an apology, I say, supported with examples and reasons. D'Aubigné took care to insert the substance of it in his history (5). Le Grain had not changed his principles, when he writ his decad of Lewis XIII; for he there (6) apologizes for the letters patents (7), wherein his majesty declared, that he meant not to comprehend his subjects of the pretended Reformed religion in the oath and protestation made at his coronation, OF EMPLOYING HIS SWORD AND POWER FOR THE EXTIRPATION OF HERESIES. These two fine passages in favour of toleration are found in a book of Colomies (8).

GRAMMONT (GABRIEL DE), a French cardinal, in the XVIth century. I speak of him only to correct some faults of Mr Moreri [A].

[A] I speak of him, only to correct some faults of Mr Moreri. I. The interview of Clement VII, and Francis I, at Marfeilles, was not in 1552, but in 1532. II. Cardinal Grammont was not rewarded with the bishopric of Poitiers, for having persuaded the Pope to that interview; for he was possessed of that bishopric, when he left France, to go and negotiate with Clement VII. III. These words, the king gave him the archbishopric of Bourdeaux and Toulouse, which he was going to take possession of, ought to be censured, since they naturally signify, that both these bishoprics were bestowed at the same time upon this cardinal. But this is false. Besides, we know not which of those two archbishoprics he was going to take possession of. Mr Moreri's phrase does not determine it. IV. It is not true, that this cardinal died before he took possession of the archbishopric of Toulouse: for he did it by proxy, the twenty seventh of October 1533, and in person, the fifteenth of March following. V. The castle of Balura is a chimera; he should have said the castle of Balma: the cardinal died there, the twenty sixth of March (1) 1534, according to du Bouchet. This castle belongs to the archbishops of Toulouse, and is but half a league distant from the city. VI. If the cardinal was seized with a hectic fever, it was not when he went to take possession of the archbishopric: Moreri should have said, that his journey to Rome brought upon him a long distemper, of which he died, eleven days after his taking possession. Does a man die of a hectic fever in so few days? What surprises me is, that Catel (2), one of the authors quoted by Moreri, supplies me with the correction of all the faults before-mentioned. What is this man thinking of, to quote authors whom he never saw? Catel corrects a fault of John du Bouchet, concerning the name of the castle (3); and therefore Moreri might have certainly known it's true name.

(1) Moreri says, the twenty fourth of March.

posed an history, that is esteemed [B]. I have read, in a German author, a remarkable fact, which I very much doubt of [C]; but, if it were true, it would be very much to president de Gramond's glory. Patin's letters do not confirm what the German author says [D].

fect integrity. His son gives him this character, in relating an action, more becoming a courtier, than a senator zealous for good discipline. He says (1), that Mr de Montmorency, governor of Languedoc, would have his wife to be received, in all the towns of his government, with such honours as had never been used. He desired in particular, that the magistrates of Toulouse would send armed men to meet her. His proposal was often rejected; and it was represented to him, that plays, dances, and music, are a proper pomp for a woman's reception; but the military honours ought to be reserved for those, who have a jurisdiction over arms. Bartholomew de Gramond was of another opinion, viz. that the dukes of Montmorency should be received in the way that her husband desired; he was deputed to the Capitouls (2) from the parliament, and persuaded them to comply with the desire of the governor of the province. This happened in 1619. We find here no footsteps of the ancient Roman gravity. Our historian had done more for his father's glory, if he could have said, that the deputy of the parliament confirmed the Capitouls in their resolution to reject the innovations, which the duke of Montmorency required of them for his dukes. This conduct had bespoke him a man, who had made good use of Tiberius's counsel moderandos foeminarum honores (3), and of the speech of Severus Cæcina, a Roman senator, in the reign of that emperor. It was rejected, but is it to be wondered at? Rome had lost all its fine maxims. Note, that this senator gave his vote, for not suffering the governors of provinces to bring their wives with them (4). He gave very solid reasons for it.

[B] He composed an history that is esteemed.] It contains, in French books, the transactions of France, from Henry the fourth's death, to the year 1629 (5). It was printed at Toulouse in the year 1643. Foreigners have thought it worthy of their presses both in Holland and Germany (6). I make use of the edition of Mentz in 1673, in 8vo. This author's style is a little too concise, and not natural enough; but it shews, that president de Gramond was master of the Latin tongue. He had published, at Toulouse, in the year 1623, the particular history of the war, that Lewis XIII made with his Protestant subjects.

GRAMONT (SCIPIO DE) lord of St Germain, and secretary of the king's chamber, was a native of Provence. I have said elsewhere (a) that he saw at Rome the funeral honours of Mr de Peirefc, and that he died at Venice some time after. He wrote some Books [A], and, among others, one intituled Le Denier Royal: Traité curieux de l'Or & de l'Argent. Naudé speaks of this work with praise [B]. It is in 8vo, printed at Paris in the year 1620.

[A] He wrote some books.] He published at Paris, the Art of Consequences, in 8vo, in 1614; of the nature, quality, and wonderful prerogatives of the Point in 8vo, 1619. His Abridgment of Artifices, treating of several new inventions, and especially of a secret and exquisite means of understanding and learning any language whatever, even Latin and Greek, in one year, was printed at Aix in Provence, in 1640, in 8vo.

[B] Naudé speaks of his Denier Royal with praise.] These are his words: 'Quoniam res ipsa (vestigialium impositiones) plerumque à necessitate dependet, aut Principum voluntate, quæ leges non admittunt, inde est, quod pauci admodum reperti sunt, qui de illis Politicum quidquam monere voluerint. Quare unicuique tantummodo proferam Scipionem Gramontium;

[C] I have read, in a German author, a remarkable fact, which I very much doubt of.] Christian Funceus says, that the president de Gramond, following Thuanus's footsteps, in his boldness to speak the truth, and discover the faults of the government and of great men, got many enemies, and was not safe in his own country. 'In eo Thuanus par quod intrepide dicat, quid sentiat, non dissimulans gravissima aulæ & magnatum peccata, indeque idem quod Thuanus, fatum expertus. Simul enim ac prima pars historię prodit, multorum incurrit odia: ita ut vix Tholozæ tuto vivere potuerit. Quare non prodit tenus hac, nisi pars prima: si altera succederet, opus esset incomparabile, vel non nisi cum ipsa antiquitate comparandum. Arcanissima enim reip. Gallicæ auctor pene traverat (7).' Mr Gravelot, advocate of Nîmes, who was very much acquainted at Toulouse, and whom I consulted upon this particular, answered me several things, but nothing, whereby it appeared that he had ever heard of such a thing.

[D] Patin's letters do not confirm what the German author says.] Guy Patin is so far from representing Mr de Gramond as a martyr for the truth, that he calls him a base flatterer. I believe he strains things, and that at the worst, the German writer's extrem would be less vicious than Patin's. However, here are Patin's words: 'I have the history of Mr de Gramond, president of Toulouse, that you speak of. I have often discoursed with him, whilst he was in this city. He was a good old man, but he had a weak and bigotted soul. He was very desirous to get some memoirs, in order to carry on his history to the late king's death: but cardinal Mazarin would not give him that employment. He is lately dead at Toulouse (8). His book is very indifferent, and infinitely below Thuanus's history. It is full of falshities and flatteries unworthy of a man of honour. When it was printed off, and ready for sale, Mr de Gramond caused fifteen leaves to be reprinted, the better to flatter cardinal Richelieu, who was then at the highest pitch of favour. This good man thought there were no words strong enough to praise him: but he got nothing by it; for the cardinal died soon after (9).'

(8) We may conclude from thence, that König, who places his death in the year 1672, is mistaken; for that letter of Patin is dated the fifteenth of September, 1654.

I shall therefore produce only one, viz. GRANDIER (URBAN), curate and canon of Loudon, burnt alive as a magician, was the son of a royal notary of Sablé, and was born at Bovère near Sablé. He was a good preacher, which made the monks of Loudon envy him at first, and at last hate him, when he pressed the obligation of confessing to one's curate at Easter. He was a handsome man, agreeable in conversation, and neat in his cloaths, which made him him suspected of being beloved by the women, and of loving them [A]. He was accused, in 1629, of having lain with women in his own church. The official of Poitiers condemned him to resign his benefices, and to live a penitent. He appealed from that sentence; and, by a decree of the parliament of Paris, he was referred to the presidial of Poitiers, which declared him innocent. Three years after, some Ursuline nuns of Loudun were thought by the common people to be possessed [B]. Grandier's enemies immediately spread the report, that it was by his means, and accused him of magic: Which seems very odd; for if they believed he could send the devil into peoples bodies, they should have been afraid of provoking him [C]; they should have used him kindly

(1) Tom. XX, pag. 743.
[A] He was suspected of being beloved by the women, and of loving them.] The Mercuré François (1) says that Urban Grandier was a majestic and stately man, who had some reading and good parts, and besides was endowed with some natural and acquired perfections; but that, by a reduplication of extraordinary vices, particularly whoring and lewdness, he had . . . prostituted the honour of his character; and that his intention was, in canvassing for the place of ghastly father of the Ursulines, to make a dishonest seraglio of their convent, and as many filthy concubines as there were handsome virgins. The letter of Dr Seguin, a physician of Tours, says (2), that even Grandier's partisans acknowledged, that he lived in a debauchery, that was a downright impiety, profaning the most holy things, and openly abusing the religion he preached with great reputation. I have said, in the text of this article, that he was accused of having lain with some women in his own church. Mr Menage, who relates it, says only, in the notes, that he was accused of adultery; he does not say, that it was with the wife of a magistrate of Loudun. It is Monconis (3), who says this, upon the credit of the superior of the Ursulines. The relation, published in Holland, in the year 1693, does not permit us to doubt of the lewdness and pride of this priest.

accused of magic . . . the devils he corresponded with must needs have been meer black-guards in Lucifer's troops. They must have been less learned than those of Loudun, who had not studied so far as the third class, as one of cardinal Richelieu's courtiers said. They must needs be of the order of those ignorant devils, who, in Theodoret's orations, commit faults in the number, and the language, and offend against the measures of verse, and the rules of syntax (7). Here follow some proofs of the ignorance of the devils of Loudun. Mais being ended, Barré came up to the mother superior, to give her the communion, and to exorcise her, and, holding the sacrament in his hand, spoke to her in these words; Adora Deum tuum, Creatorem tuum; worship thy God, thy Creator: being pressed she answered, Adoro te, I worship thee, Quem adoras, whom dost thou worship? said the exorcist to her several times. JESUS CHRISTUS, replied she, making motions as if she had suffered violence. Daniel Drouin, assessor in the provostship, could not forbear saying somewhat loud, here is a devil, who does not understand concord. Barré, changing the phrase, asked her, Quis est iste quem adoras? who is he, whom thou worshipping? he hoped she would say still JESUS CHRISTUS; but she answered, JESU CHRISTE. Upon which many present cried out, this is bad Latin. Barré confidently maintained she had said, Adoro te JESU CHRISTE; I adore thee, O JESUS CHRIST (8).

Here is a very sharp railery against the Capuchin director of Martha, who was said to be possessed. It was reported, that she had two devils in her body, one called Belzebub, and the other Ashtaroth. The judges of Angers examined them in Greek and Latin. Belzebub, in a passion answered, 'that if he pleased, he could answer as well in Greek as in Latin. The Capuchin, to afford him an excuse, said, Belzebub, my friend, there are some heretics here, and that is the reason why you will not speak. They spoke Latin to Ashtaroth, who excused himself upon his youth (9a). Belzebub excused himself, saying, he was a poor devil. Hereupon there was a great dispute betwixt those on the bench, whether devils were bound to go to school. The civilians maintained, that it was the proprium in quarto modo of demoniacs, to speak all languages, as he of Cartigni in Savoy, who was tried in sixteen languages; by the same token, that the ministers of Geneva durst not exorcise him. Those of Angers were bolder. They begun thus: Com-mando tibi ut exeat Belzebub & Ashtaroth, aut ego augmentabo vestras penas, & vobis dabo actiores. The second time he said; Jubeo exeat super penam excommunicationis majoris & minoris. And at last being in a great passion he added; Nisi vox exeat, vos relego & confino in infernum centum annos magis quam Deus ordinavit (9). I doubt not but this is an invention of the author.

[(9a) An allusion to these words of Lucifer to Persephonas.

Ashtaroth, ne parle jamais:
Tu es encore trop novice.

Ashtaroth say nothing;
You are yet too young. REM CRIT.]

[C] If they believed he could send the devil into peoples bodies, they should have been afraid of provoking him.] Mr Menage was so fond of this thought, that, after he had used it in the life of William Menage (10), he inserted it in his notes upon that life. They accused Grandier, says he, of magic, the ordinary crime of those who have none, and which, kindly, for fear he should possess them with a legion of devils. However they accused him of magic. The Capuchins of Loudun, his great enemies, thought it expedient, in order to succeed in their accusation, to strengthen themselves with the powerful authority of cardinal Richelieu. To this purpose, they wrote to Father Joseph, one of their fraternity, who had a great interest with his eminence, that Grandier was the author of a libel, intituled, La Cordonnere de Loudun [D] (the shoemaker's wife of Loudun), which was very injurious to the person and birth of cardinal Richelieu. This great minister, amongst many perfections, had the fault to prosecute with the utmost rigour the authors of the libels printed against him: So that, suffering himself to be persuaded [E] by Father Joseph, that Grandier was the author of La Cordonnere de Loudun, he writ immediately to Mr de Laubardemont, counsellor of state, his creature, who was commissioned by the king to demolish the fortifications of Loudun, to inform himself carefully of the affair of the nuns; and gave him sufficient intimations, that he wished the destruction of Grandier. Mr Laubardemont made him a prisoner in December 1633, and, having taken ample information of the matter, he went to concert the business with the cardinal. Letters patents were issued out, the eighth of July 1634, to bring Grandier to his trial. These letters were directed to Mr Laubardemont, and to twelve judges of the courts in the neighbourhood of Loudun, all indeed honest men, but all credulous persons, and for that reason chosen by Grandier's enemies [F]. The eighteenth which, according to the excellent thought of Apuleius, who was formerly accused of the same crime, is not believed by the accusers themselves; for if a man was truly persuaded, that another could kill him by magic, he would be afraid of provoking him by accusing him of that abominable crime. But tho' this argument seems to be very solid, I am of opinion, that there have been some people, at all times, who believed those guilty, whom they accused of magic: for, in the first place, we must not too much rely on men's acting consequentially; besides, it is generally believed, that, when the judges have laid hold on a magician's cause, he can do no more mischief. Lastly, it is believed, that a magician will not venture to attempt any thing against his accusers, since this would be furnishing proofs against himself.

[D] They wrote to Father Joseph . . . that Grandier was author of a libel, intituled La Cordonnere de Loudun.] This libel is so intituled, because a shoemaker's wife was introduced speaking in it. Mr Menage takes the fooleries, that this satire is stuffed with, for a strong proof, that Grandier did not make it (11); and he heard Mr Bouillaud say, that it was certain Grandier was not the author of that libel (12). Mr Bouillaud, a native of Loudun, had been familiarly acquainted with him (13). See, in the relation printed at Amsterdam (14), with what artifice this satire was made use of, to destroy Grandier.

[E] . . . Cardinal Richelieu suffering himself to be persuaded.] I have read somewhere, that he promoted this farce, in order to intimidate Lewis XIII, and keep him more subservient to his designs, by these stories of sorcery, with which they stunned his ears. This is not probable, tho' it must be confessed, that the sublimest Genius's are commonly such as least neglect the occasions, that seem most ridiculous and absurd. I speak of those great genius's, who govern a state. Their great penetration makes them discover secret springs, where one would think there are none; because they know better than other men what use may be made of a trifle; because they are better acquainted with the weakness of mankind, and know better what the ignorance and weakness of some, and the malice of others, can produce. We must not therefore argue thus upon all occasions: such a thing is so absurd, so mean, so extravagant, that a man of sense and judgment would never mind it; and consequently it is false, that such a minister of state made use of it, invented, or supported it. The author of the history of the edict of Nantes observes (15), that many people looked upon the comedy, that was played for many years by the Ursulines of Loudun, to be an affair of religion. I believe he means, that those people fancied this farce was acted in order to undermine the edict of Nantes. He pleasantly relates the ridiculous answers made by those nuns. Note, that he says, that Grandier governed the convent of the Ursulines; but, in the errata, he corrects it, by saying, that he sometimes visited the nuns. This last fact is no more consistent, than the other, with the relation published in 1693. In the 25th page of it you will find these words: It is at least certain, that those nuns had lived seven or eight years at Loudun, without ever being visited by him: and, in the year 1634, when they were confronted with him, it appeared that they had never seen him. Father Tranquille has also maintained it in one of his books, and that the curate never meddled with their affairs.

At this very moment I call to mind, that it is in the Sorberiana that I read what I said at the beginning of this remark. The passage is curious. We there find, that Mr Quillet challenged the devil of those nuns, and nonplussed him, and that all the devil's craft was confounded; that Mr Laubardemont (16) was offended at it, and issued out a warrant against Laubardemont. Quillet, who, perceiving, that this mummery was carried on by cardinal Richelieu, to intimidate the late king (17), who was naturally very fearful of the devil, it signifies Hen-thought it was not safe for him to be at Loudun, or in France, and went into Italy (18). Naudé confirms what concerns the disgrace of this challenger. These are his words: 'Duncan and Quillet having opposed the imposture of the nuns of Loudun, the former was reprimanded for it, and severely threatened by cardinal Richelieu; and the latter was forced to go and serve the marquis de Cœuvre at Rome (19).'

[F] The judges were all chosen by Grandier's enemies.] The reflexion, that Mr Menage makes upon this, deserves to be set down: It is to be observed, says he (20), that no innocence can be proof against the choice of judges: let an accuser abuse the judges, and he will cause all the Jesuit's bishops to be burnt by Molinist judges, and all the Molinist bishops by Jesuit judges. Here is a subject for reflections (21). The attorney of the commission, called Deniau, counsellor in the presidial of la Fleche, wrote a tract concerning the devils of the nuns of Loudun (22), to vindicate the sentence of the commissioners.

[G] Upon the deposition of Alhtaroth.] This appears from the second verbal process of the exorcist (23). There were three possessions: during the first, the devils, except one, refused to tell their names: they only answered that they were enemies of God. During the second and third, they discovered their names the crime of magic, sorcery, and possession happening by his means in the persons of some of the Ursuline nuns of Loudun, and other secular women mentioned in the process: For the reparation of which crimes he was condemned to an amende honorable, and to be burnt alive, with the magical pacts and characters being in the rolls, together with the manuscript book, by him written against the celibacy of priests [H], and his ashes to be scattered in the air (b). Grandier, having heard this terrible sentence without any commotion, desired to have the guardian of the Franciscans of Loudun for his confessor: He was doctor of divinity of the faculty of Paris. They refused him, and offered him a Recollect, whom he would not make use of; saying, that he was his enemy, and one of those, who had most contributed to his ruin. They persisted in their resolution to give him no other confessor than this Recollect, and he persisted in his refusal; and so he made only a mental confession to God: After which, he went to the place of execution, and died very constantly and christianly. As he was upon the pile, a great fly (a kind of a drone) happened to buzz about his head. A monk, present at the execution, who had read in the council of Quieres (c), that the devils are always at hand, when men are dying, to tempt them (d), and who had heard say, that Belzebub signifies in Hebrew the god of flies, cried out immediately, that it was the devil Belzebub that flew about Grandier, to carry his soul to hell; upon which a very pleasant song was made. The devil's-craft of Loudun lasted a Year longer after the death of Grandier. Theophrastus Renaudot, a famous physician, and inventor of the French-Gazette, made an encomium on Grandier, which was printed at Paris in loose sheets. This is taken from Menage (e), who vindicates our Grandier, and calls the possession of those nuns a chimæra [I]. Nay, one would think that he designed to deny in general names and dignities, and accused Grandier by name. It is remarkable that they answered in French, though the exorcists spoke to them in Latin. But it is much more remarkable, that their testimony should have been admitted in a court of justice, and made a proof in a trial, wherein a man was condemned to be burnt alive. Were they ignorant of what our Saviour says of the devil (24)? Seguin's thoughts are very singular. It seems, says he (25), that it is not so much the judgment of men, as of GOD, who sent the devils from hell for the confusion of this wretch: for it is a wonderful thing how the devils rise up against him, and forced him to acknowledge, that they were his accusers. I leave it to the Sorbonne to determine, whether any exceptions should have been admitted against them, speaking from GOD and giving evident proofs of the truth, which they were forced to utter. It astonishes one to think, that Christian judges should reject the exceptions made against such witnesses; for it is matter of faith, that they are the fathers of lies. It were in vain to say, that the force of exorcisms hindered them from lying; for the experience of the contrary had been lately seen. The second verbal process imports (26), That so many exorcisms had been practised, and indefatigably continued, so many fasts, orations, and prayers had been made, that the master-devil and his associates having promised to strike the magician so violently, and in such a part of his body, that it would be as visible as painful; and moreover, having acknowledged that he yielded to the almighty power of GOD, and declared that he would retire from this monastery for ever; at last, on the thirteenth day of October 1632, he departed from the body of the said mother superior, and notified his departure by seven phlegms which she spit a great way: likewise the devil of sister Clara departed from her body; and afterwards all the nuns remained undisturbed, every thing was quiet, and the whole nunnery enjoyed a holy peace. But they kept not their promise; they impoled upon the exorcists: from the twentieth of November, of the same year 1632, most of the nuns found themselves molested and disturbed by evil spirits (27).

[H] The manuscript written by him against the celibacy of priests. Mr Menage, who heard Mr Bouil- laud say, that there was no proof, that Grandier was the author of this book (28), does not disown, that it was found among his papers (29). He adds, that this book was not ill written, that it was dedicated to a woman, and that it ended with these verses:

Si ton gentil esprit prend bien cette science
Tu mettras en repos ta bonne conscience.

If your fine sense takes this science right, you will Lull your good conscience to rest.

Doubtless he had this from Seguin's letter, inserted in the Mercurius Francicus; but, perhaps, he should not have concealed what is added there, that Grandier confessed, upon the rack, that he writ this little book. This physician is not to blame for saying (30), that this little book makes one suspect that Grandier was married. Note, he goes on, That it is dedicated to his dearest concubine, whose name is every where omitted as well as in the title. . . I cannot forbear telling you, continues he, that this tract seems to me very well done, and very coherent as far as the conclusion, which is wrong, and discovers its venom. There is nothing in it tending to magic; it seems rather, that the contrary might be inferred from it, if we had not otherwise sufficient proofs of. He had been saying a little before: As for the rest, he was a man of a very resolute and strong mind; and Mr President told me, he admired him at his trial, and regretted his loss. The funeral oration of Scævola Sammarthanus, made at Loudun by Grandier, is printed amongst the works of Sammarthanus (31).

[I] Mr Menage . . . calls the possession of those nuns a chimæra. He thinks it very probable (32) that they were only tormented with the suffocation of the matrix; and he says (33), that Grandier deserves to be added to Gabriel Nauvê's catalogue of great men unjustly accused of magic. However, he confesses (34), that he heard the superior of the Ursulines of Loudun say: 'that, when she was delivered from the devils that tormented her, an angel engraved upon her hand JESUS MARIA JOSEPH F. DE SALLES, and that she shewed him her hand, on which those words were really engraved, but lightly, and like those crosses we see on the arms of the pilgrims, who have been in the Holy Land. He heard her say farther, that the angel engraved first, on the upper part of her hand, the name of Francis de Salles; that this word removed lower to give the precedence to those of Joseph and Maria, and that all three removed lower still to make room for that of Jesus.' He has done well not to say in express words, that he took this for an imposture; the reader understands it well enough. But Monconis (35) leaves no room to doubt of the cheat; for which reason it will not be amiss to relate here what he says of it. He went to visit this superior of the Ursulines, the eighth of May 1645, and because she made him wait to speak with her above half an hour, he suspected some artifice. He desired her to shew him the characters, which the devil she was possessed with had imprinted upon her hand, when he was exorcised (36); she did it: 'he saw, in letters of a blood-colour upon the back of her left hand, beginning from the wrist to the little finger, Jesus; below, drawing towards the shoulder, Maria; lower, Joseph; and lower still in the fourth line, F. de Salles. She told him all the villainies of the priest Grandier, who had been burnt for sending the devils into the convent; and how a magistrate of the town, whose wife he had debauched, had complained of it to her, and that they agreed to neral all that is said of magicians [K]. This were to get out of one difficulty by another [L]. Since the composition of this article, the History of the Devils of Loudun has been printed in Holland (f); and it appears manifestly by that book, that the pretended possession of the Ursulines was a horrid contrivance against the life of Grandier. This relation is extremely curious, and attended with all the pieces relating to that trial. I found one thing in it, at which I was a little surprized, with respect to the great outcries that were made against Father Cotton [M].

We

'impeach him, notwithstanding the strong inclinations
'this miscreant gave her by his conjurations, from 'which the mercy of God preserved her. At last,
'Mr de Monconis took leave of her, and desired to 'see her hand again, which she very civilly gave 'him through the grate: he observed to her, that the 'letters were not so red as when she came, and that 'those letters seemed to peel off, and all the skin
'of her hand to rise, as if it had been a thin skin of 'starch-water dried up: with the end of his nail,
'by a gentle touch, he took off part of a leg of the 'M; at which she was very much surprized, though 'the place remained as fair as the other parts of the 'hand. He was satisfied with this. I do not in the least question it. The discovery of such a notable forgery, which had infatuated so many people, was an inestimable treasure to such a man as he. The new history of the devils of Loudun will inform you; 'that, when the wrinkles of old age had 'made the hand dry and lean, the drugs, that were 'used to mark those names anew, being no longer 'able to imprint them; the good mother said then,
'that God had granted her prayers, and suffered
'those names to be defaced, which were the occasion 'of abundance of people coming to trouble and 'importune her, and withdraw her frequently from 'her acts of devotion (37). You will there find also, that Cerisantes had the art of marking a name upon his hand (38), and that the queen's maids, in 1652, laughed at the engravings of the Ursulines (39).

[K] Nay, one would think that he designed to deny in general all that is said of magicians. In effect, he laughs at the first scene of this horrible tragedy, and draws from it some proofs for Grandier's justification.
That first scene consisted in this, that one of the nuns, being by night in her little, but most chaste, bed (40), perceived a spectre resembling their deceased confessor, and which owned, that it was he himself, and that he was returned to impart very extraordinary things.
The spectre said, it would appear to her the same hour the night following; it failed not to appear, and received the same answer as at first, that she could not treat with it without the privacy of her superior. Hereupon this spectre took Grandier's perfect shape. 'He talked to this nun of love-affairs,
'solicited her with addresses equally insolent and 'lascivious. . . . She struggles, no body assists her;
'the torments herself, no body comforts her; she calls,
'no body answers; she cries out, no body comes;
'she trembles, she sweats, she faints, she invokes the 'holy name of Jesus; at last the spectre disappeared.
I own, with Mr Menage, that this is proper enough to clear Urban Grandier as to magic; but not to justify him in other respects. Could not he, without being obliged to the devil Cedon for opening the door (41), gain the door-keeper and get into this nun's chamber, pretending to be a ghost and disguising himself with a mask resembling their late ghostly father.
This nun's story seems to intimate the accomplishment of the venerable act. Mr Menage says also (42), that no man of sense will believe, that Grandier had the power of disposing of devils at his pleasure, to send them to torment innocent virgins consecrated to GOD.
In fine, he praises the prudence and justice of Lewis
XIV, 'who has stopped the course of the proceedings 'against those, who are accused of magic and witch'craft, having commuted the penalty of death into banishment, with respect to many persons condemned,
'by a decree of the parliament of Rouën, to be burnt, as guilty of this crime; and having afterwards,
'by a decree of his council of state, the twenty sixth
'of April 1672, ordained, that, through all the province of Normandy, the prisons should be opened 'to all persons, that were detained for the same crimes; and that, for the future, such as should be 'accused of it should be judged according to the declaration, which his majesty promises, by this

'decree, to send into all the jurisdictions of France,
'to regulate the proceedings that are to be observed
'by the judges in the trials of magic and witch'craft.'

[L] . . . It is to get out of one difficulty by another.
It is certain, that the most incredulous and subtle philosophers must needs be puzzled with the phenomena relating to witchcraft. But, as to Grandier, I do not know but we might apply to him what Olympias said upon the sight of a mistress of her husband, whom she found extremely handsome and witty: let no body suspect her any longer of witchcraft, for all her enchantments are in her person (43). The curate of Loudun was a handsome genteel man, and a fine speaker; and this probably was the magic, with which he tempted the superior of the Ursulines (44), and subjected the nuns to violent and lascivious ardors (45). The vow of continence and devotion not being sufficient to remove this disorder, it was believed to be supernatural. This imagination spared self-love the shame of cherishing so long a criminal passion. They therefore believed themselves bewitched; all the machine was out of order: and, for the honour of that society, the first advances were not to be retracted.
There is nothing more dangerous for people, that believe their good reputation to be necessary to the church, than to make a false step. This mother-superior of the Ursulines might perhaps be sincere at first; but she was not so, when she received Monconis's visit; and yet she must carry on the farce to save what was past. Those, who perfectly knew the little town of Loudun, when those devil-crafts first began, might have explained them better than can be done at present.

Within a few months after I had composed what I have now said, I heard, that a man of that country was printing an exact relation of this adventure, at Amsterdam. I have found in it the confirmation of what I had conjectured, with an explication of the particular and personal passions, which occasioned this strange mummery; and if we believe the author of the relation, the superior was never in earnest.

He set down upon a piece of paper several questions he meant to propose to a woman possessed with the devil. Amongst other questions, this was one: what is the most proper passage of scripture to prove purgatory (46)? The Protestants joined with a great number of Catholics in crying out against this impious curiosity, and insulting both the father confessor of Henry IV, and the whole order of the Jesuits. Yet it is certain, that this confessor did but follow herein the practice of his church, excepting some questions he would have offered concerning political affairs.

Did not the exorcist of Loudun ask the devil (47), (47) Histoire des Diables de Lou-dun, pag. 371.
Which was the best means, by which a creature departed from GOD might return to him? Did he not ask him (48), whether since his fall he had ever tasted the pleasures of divine love? . . . And whether is the strongest bond that sustains men to the creature?

(48) *Ibid. pag.

. . . (49) Whether there was any body in hell, who had had a great relish of the divine love upon earth? 373.

(49) *Ibid. pag.

The devil answered at large these questions, and even discovered many secrets of his politics, and the means to overthrow them. These things have been not only practised at Loudun, but are the current style of the exorcists, as the Protestant divines object to the Roman Catholics. 'Si quis attente legerit nupera exorcista-
'rum scripta, ut Monachi Michaelis historiam Ludo-
'vici Gaufridi & obsessarum mulierum, non satis mi-'rari poterit impietatem & stoliditatem hominum, qui 'judicium controversiarum fidei à demonibus expof-
'cunt, eos fingunt penitentiarum prædicatores, eos adi-
'gunt, ut preces ad Deum fundant, & omnia reli-'gionis & pietatis externa munia obeant (50). So that the particular hatred against the Jesuits was Tom. III, pag.

Father

GRANDIER. GRAPALDUS. GRASSIS. 215

We find in the life of a Jesuit, who was one of the exorcists of the nuns of Loudun, several particulars upon this subject. I will mention two things out of it, one of which is very surprizing [N].

Father Cotton, which is not censured when others make use of it. I do not speak of the Protestants. A respect of persons will always prevail among men.

[N] I will mention two things, one of which is very surprizing. I know them only from Mr Cousin's extracts. Here is what I have read in his Journal des Scavans, in the place where he mentions the life of Father Seurin (51). Upon occasion of this father's conflict with the devils, the author of his life (52) proves at large the truth of the nuns of Loudun being possessed by the devil, especially by the testimony of two of the greatest wits of this age. The one is cardinal Richelieu, who sent exorcists to Loudun, maintained at the king's expence; and the other my lord Mountagu, who, having seen the devils go out of the body of the mother of the Angels, was perfectly convinced of it, and discoursed of it with Urban VIII, when he abjured his heresy, and made profession of the Catholic faith before him. What I am going to say is much more extraordinary. You will see there a man, who redeemed Jesus CHRIST; that is, who, to rescue him from the hands of the devil, gave up himself to the devil. Read these words of the journalist (53). 'When Father Seurin exorcized the nuns of Loudun, the devils declared, that two magicians had seized three hosts, to prophane them. Father Seurin fell to prayers, to obtain the deliverance of his master's body, and consented, that his own body should be submitted to the power of the devils, in order to redeem it. The offers were accepted, and the exchange performed. The devils took the three hosts out of the hands of their agents, and put them at the foot of the Pyx of the holy sacrament that was then exposed; and one of them entered into the body of the father, who remained possessed, or obsessed, the greatest part of his life.'

GRAPALDUS (FRANCIS MARIUS), a learned man, lived in the XVIth century. He was of Parma; and, when his country, being freed from the French yoke, was restored to the obedience of Julius II, he was chosen chief of the embassy that was sent to that Pope (a). His eloquence and fine shape recommended him to that employment (b). He excellently harangued Julius II, and published some verses upon the subject of his speech. The Pope crowned him with his own hand, with great solemnity, in the Vatican. Grapaldus, encouraged by this poetical crown, put himself upon writing a great many verses, which have been printed (c). The work, in which he shewed his learning most, is that, wherein he describes all the parts of a house [A]. He died of a retention of urine, being above fifty years of age (d).

[A] The work, in which he shewed his learning most, is that, wherein he describes all the parts of a house. Paul Jovius passes this found judgment on it. 'Sed multo uberius, says he (1), & latius ingenii famam propagavit, edito libro de paribus ædium, quo per optimis disciplinis perornatum diligenti cultura ingenium demonstravit. — But he acquired a much greater and more extensive character by the book he published on the parts of a house, in which he discovered a fine genius improved by learning.' This book has been often printed. The first edition is that of Parma by Antony Quintianus. I do not know the year, but only that the author put out a second seven years after: it was larger than the first (2). Gesner mentions only the editions of Basil in 1533, and 1541, in 4to. That which I use is of Dort in 1618, in 8vo.

GRASSIS (PARIS DE) is very much to be blamed for a cheat he put upon the public. He composed an epitaph upon a mule [A], which he caused to be engraved on a piece of marble, and afterwards hid it in the earth in his vineyard. Some time after, he ordered some trees to be planted in the place where this marble was buried; and when they came to tell him of the discovery of this inscription, he gave it out for a thing that had been foretold concerning his mule. The thing was only laughed at for some time, and the marble was little taken notice of; but some years after it grew considerable, and passed for an antique with abundance of people [B]: Infomuch that Thomas Porcacchi inserted this epitaph in a book, as a genuine piece of antiquity (a). Paris de Grassis is not the only person, that laid such snares for antiquarians [C]. I believe,

(a) Ex Museo Italico Mabillonii, Tom. I, pag. 176.

[A] He composed an epitaph upon a mule. He pretended, that one Publius Crassus had erected this monument to his mule. DIS PEDIBUS SAXUM is the beginning of that inscription.

[B] This epitaph passed for an antique with abundance of people. Father Mabillon affirms it. 'Viris eruditus non nullis facum fecit, says he (1), opinantibus id esse antiquum Thomas Porcacchius inter alios hoc epitaphium pro genuino, & antiquo habuit in libro Funeralium: immo Alexander VII in Adversariis suis notat id repertum fuisse prope sanctum Petrum. — Several learned men were deceived by it, taking it for an antique Among others, Thomas Porcacchi took it for genuine and antient in his book De Funeralibus. Even Alexander VII, in his Adversaria, observes, that it was found near St Peters.' He tells us, that Sebastian Maccius relates the story of this imposture in his collection of antient inscriptions, which is in manuscript in cardinal Chigi's library. Maccius had this from Annibal de Grassis, bishop of Jaccenia (2).

1505, three stones were found near the cape of Roco de Sintra in Portugal. There was upon those stones a Latin inscription in old characters, containing this prophecy:

Sibylla vaticinium occiduis decretum,
Volventur saxa literis, & ordine rectis,
Cum videas Occidens Orientis opes.
Ganges, Indus, Tagus, erit mirabile visus, Merces commutabit suas, uterque sibi.
Soli æterno, ac Lunæ decretum.

This was taken for a Sybilline oracle (3), and some learned men tried their skill in explaining those verses; but at last it was discovered, that Cajado, a Portuguese poet, was the author of them, and that it was he, who had buried those stones, and taken his opportunity to have them dug out. 'Fraudem detexit Castor par Varrerius: Scilicet, quo tempore Emmanuel Lusitanæ Rex, per Vascum Gamam, navigationes in Indiam Orientalem feliciter tentasset: Ulyssesponē vixit Hermicus Cajadas, poeta celebris, Angeli Politiani discipulus (4): hic tria marmora literis antiquis, hoc vaticinium continens, incidi, & clam circa believe, to say by the by, that this is the same man, who, in the beginning of the XVIth century, was master of the ceremonies under many popes, and bishop of Pefaro, and brother to cardinal Achilles de GRASSIS. His journal was cited in the writings on the dispute concerning the precedence between the republic of Venice and the duke of Savoy (b). His Ceremoniale is printed and esteemed (c). He expressed a great zeal against a plagiarist; for it is he whom president Cousin speaks of, in a passage which I shall set down [D].

‘circa oppidum Syntra, leviter terrâ tegi curavit. Postquam verò, tractu temporis, aliquam antiquitatis speciem contraxissent, amicos quosdam, in villâ suâ, circa quam hæc marmora occultata erant, convivio excipit; quibus strenuè epulantibus nunciat villicus, foissores marmora, ignotis literis inscripta, invenisse, procul dubio thesaurum eo loco desessum esse. Advolant omnes, inveniunt lapides, mirantur vaticinium, non sanè foliis inscriptum: Rex, hujus fraudis conscius, stuporem tamen simulat, versus aulicis describendos tradit, ipsa verò marmora, tanquam sanctiora καμψα, in gazophylacio religiose servat (5).

— Caspar Varrerius detected the fraud: For, at the time when Emanuel, king of Portugal, sent Vasco Gama, with success, on a voyage to the East-Indies, there lived at Lisbon one Hermicus Cajado, a famous poet, and a disciple of Angelus Politianus: this man got three marbles engraved with ancient characters, containing this prophecy, and had them privately buried a little way under ground, near the city Syntra. But after that, through length of time, they had contracted an appearance of antiquity, he invited some friends to his country-house, near which these marbles were hidden; and, during the banquet, his steward brought word, that certain marbles, inscribed with unknown characters, had been dug up, and that there was certainly some treasure buried there. Away run the company, find the stones, and wonder at the prophecy, not written indeed on leaves. The king, who knew this cheat, yet seemed astonished, orders his attendants to copy the verses, and lays up the marbles as great curiosities in his Museum. There are those, who say, that Cajado hoped by this trick to insinuate himself into the favour of his king, and squeeze some money out of him. Postea tamen compertum eisdem confictos & impositos fuisse à quodam Hermo Charado Lusitano, qui illos marmor inscripserat, defoderatque ut situ humoreque terræ aliquantulum deformati, vetustatis indicium exhiberent: rursusque per mercenarias operas refoderat, ut hoc tam nobili atque peregre regio antiquitatis monumento, Regis (Lusitanie, Emanuelis) gratiam, avidè in Orientis opes intenti, pecuniamque aucuparetur: ut testantur Cæsar Orlandus & Caspar Varrerius, quos refert Ortelius in theatro magno Tab. 5. novi orbis, & ab eo mutatus Malvenda lib. 3. de Antichristo cap. 16. Tornellus in annalibus 2. tom. anno mundi 3043. num. 7. pag. 48. (6). — It was afterwards discovered that they were not genuine, but the contrivance of one Hermus Cbaradus a Portuguese, who had inscribed them on marble, and buried them, that, being a little deformed by lying in the moist earth, they might pass for antiques; and that he had afterwards dug them up, that, by so noble a monument of antiquity, he might gain the favour of Emanuel, king of Portugal, who was then eagerly intent on the riches of the East, and might squeeze some money out of him; as we learn from Caspar Orlandus, & Caspar Varrerius, &c.

[D] It is he, whom president Cousin speaks of, in a passage, which I shall set down. Christopher Marcel, nominated to the archbishopric of Corfu, having recovered a copy of a book written by Augustin Patricius, under the pontificate of Innocent VIII, concerning the rites of the Romish church, printed it at Venice in 1516, and dedicated it to Leo X, without mentioning Augustin Patricius the true author of it, who had been master of the ceremonies at Rome from the time of the pontificate of Pius II, his uncle, who gave him the surname of Piccolomini, to that of Innocent VIII, under which he corrected the Roman pontifical, and composed that Ceremoniale. Paris de Grassis, who was master of the ceremonies under Leo X, had no sooner seen this Venice edition, but he made his complaint of it to his holiness, as of a crime that could not be expiated but by fire, that should consume the author and the copies. The Pope, who had licensed that edition, pretended to take fire upon the remonstrance of this zealous master of the ceremonies, and ordered a congregation to examine the affair. But notwithstanding the diligence of Paris de Grassis, many new editions of that book came out soon after, at Cologne, and elsewhere (7).

This is what we find in Mr Cousin's extract of the second volume of the Museum Italicum. I have consulted this second volume since the first edition of my dictionary, which convinces me, that Ovid had a great deal of reason to say, that it is best drinking at the fountain-head, Gratius ex ipso fonte bibantur aquæ (8).

I have found, that Paris de Grassis's passion against the archbishop of Corfu proceeded not so much from his ascribing to himself a book written by another man, as from his divulging, even with alterations, such ceremonies as ought to remain concealed. He remonstrates in a letter to Leo X (9), that he has been master of the ceremonies near sixteen years; and that he should think himself inexcusable, if he should quietly suffer them to be corrupted, and published, and his predecessors robbed of their due praises. He does not dissemble, that one of his grievances consists in this, that the publication of those things lessens their veneration, and exposes to contempt, what the veil of secrecy and mystery made venerable. ‘Quemadmodum iusti cuiusque principis est curare, ne quisquam suo jure fraudetur: ita, si diligenter insperimus, ad quempiam alium non magis spectat quam ad Romanum Pontificem, ne sacræ suæ ceremoniæ maculentur, neve aliqua in parte alterentur, ac præsertim ne corrumpantur: sed & quod omnium principum est, ne prolata in vulgus velut profuturæ pontificalium sacrorum exultationem minuant, flocci faciant, & contemnantur (10). — As it is the duty of every just prince to take care, that no one be deprived of his right, so, if we carefully consider it, no one is more concerned, than the Pope, to see that religion be not prophaned, nor its ceremonies in any respect altered, or corrupted: but, which is incumbent on all princes, to take especial care, that, by being made public, they do not expose the ceremonies of the pontificate to the contempt of the vulgar.’ He alleges the example of the ancient Heathens, who would not suffer the mysteries of the gods to come to the knowledge of prophane men. He instances particularly in the conduct of the old Romans, and king Tarquin, who caused Marcus Tullius to be thrown into the sea, as a punishment for giving the book of the sacred ceremonies to be transcribed. Our de Grassis desired, that the archbishop of Corfu's book should be burnt with the author, or at least that the author should be punished as should be thought proper. The Pope thought it a reasonable demand, and promised to have it examined in the next consistory.

Hanc epistolam cum in manibus Papæ dedissem, legissetque libenter & avide, & acceptasset rationes & argumenta in ea per me allegata; versus ad cardinales aliquos, qui sibi forte adhærebant, dixit me rationem habere super petitionibus meis: & librum ceremoniarum nuper impressum omnino comburi simul cum falso auctore, sicut postulassem, aut saltem ipsum auctorem corrigi & castigari omnino debere prout præsentibus videretur. Itaque ad primum consistorium rem & causam differre (11). — The Pope, having received from me this letter, and having eagerly read it, and approved the reasons and arguments alleged by me in it; he turned to some cardinals, who stood near him, and said to them, that my petition was reasonable, and that the book of ceremonies lately printed, together with their counterfeit author, deserved to be burnt, as I had desired; at least that the author ought to be corrected and chastised, as should seem proper to those present: he therefore referred the matter to the next consistory. We do not know what was the issue of this affair, there being some sheets wanting in de Grassis's Ceremoniale, in the place where the narration was to be continued (12). Father Mabillon can hardly forbear laughing at de Grassi's great zeal; and it is with some pleasure that he observes (13), that the book of the archbishop of Corfu was not burnt. He says, that the judicious Catholics do not build their veneration for the Pope upon those occult ceremonies, but upon his quality of head of the church. However, it must be confessed, that this zealot for secrecy had reason to say, that it was to be feared, that, if the mysteries of the Roman Ceremoniale came to be divulged, the people would not have so right a notion of them (14). For it is usual to admire much more what is not known, than what is. Nay, he seems to be sorry that the pontifical is made public; which, says he, is the cause that, to the contempt of the priesthood, the ceremonies contained in that book fall daily into the hands of the profane; and the sectaries make use of it to ridicule our religion. Sed utinam etiam illa quæ dixi, secretiora forent & magis recondita. Non enim ea quotidie ad profanas manus in sacerdotii contemptum, nec ad alienas sectas in nostræ religionis irrisum devenire videremus (15). Be it how it will, we may very well say, that he is too angry with the prelate of Corfu. He vilifies him at such a rate, that I question whether he conceived not as great an aversion for him, as they formerly incurred, that divulged the mysterious ceremonies of Ceres; a sort of people, that others were afraid to embark with in the same vessel, for fear of being involved in their deserved punishment.

GRASWINCKEL (THEODORE), a native of Delft, was a very learned civilian in the XVIIth century, which he made appear by several works [A]. He was not only well versed in matters of law, but also in the belles lettres, and Latin poetry. His merit was acknowledged; for he had good preferments at the Hague [B]. The republic of Venice made him knight of St Mark. He died of an apoplexy at Mechlen, the 12th of October 1666, at sixty six years of age, and was buried in the great church of the Hague, where his epitaph is to be seen, which is very glorious to him.

[A] He made it appear by several works. He published a book, at the Hague, in 1642, intitled, De jure majestatis, which he dedicated to the queen of Sweden. In which he lays down the principles most favourable to monarchs, and the most opposite to Buchanan's republican maxims. He took the part of the republic of Venice against the duke of Savoy, in the dispute of precedence: For he published a book in 1644, De jure præcedentie inter serenissimam Venetam rempubl. & sereniss. Sabaudia ducem, in which he confutes the dissertation published upon that subject in favour of the duke of Savoy. He had for a long time given proofs of his zeal for the republic of Venice. In the year 1634, he wrote an answer to the Squittinio, which he intitled, Liberia Veneta, seu Venetorum in se aut imperandi jus. In 1652, he wrote against one Burgus, a Genoese, who, as well as Selden, pretended, that the sea, no less than the earth, was subject to the dominion of some states. Maris liberi vindicta adversus Petrum Baptistam Burgum Ligustici maritimi domini assertorem, is the title of Graswinckel's work (1);

who, the year following, published a like tract against Welwood. I have also seen a treatise of his De præludiis justitiæ & juris, printed in 1660, in which he refutes a Portuguese Jesuit (2). He added a dissertation to it, De fide hæreticis & rebellibus servanda. I will not forget his Strictura adversus Felsen, nor his commentary upon Sallust, and upon a Spanish author, De vita & nec Cassii (3) & Bruti, nor his translation of David's psalms into heroic verse, nor his version of Thomas à Kempis (4) in elegiac verse, nor his poem in hexameter verse, in which he describes the life of Andrew Canterus, a native of Groningen, who was a prodigy of learning in his younger years. He also wrote some books in Dutch; The art of living well; a commentary upon the edicts of Annonsi; and two volumes in 4to (5), concerning the sovereignty of the states of Holland.

[B] He had good preferments at the Hague. He was advocate fiscal of the demesnes of the states of Holland, and recorder and secretary to the bipartite court, for the states-general.

GRATAROLUS (WILLIAM) a learned physician, lived in the XVIth century. He was born at Bergamo in Italy; and he left his country, to go into Germany, in order to profess the Protestant religion. After some stay at Basil, he was invited to Marburg, to be professor of physic. But he staid there only a year; whether it be, that the Hessian air did not agree with him, or that he regretted the loss of the pleasures he had enjoyed at Basil (a). He returned to that town some time after [A], where he died at fifty two years of age. He wrote several good books [B]. It is said, that

(a) Nobilis hunc misit Cæsar Bassæ, sed anno Vix fœmæ exacta rursus eò rediit. Sive quod Hassiæ non possit vivere celo, Sive quod in vocis urbs Bassæ foret. Petrus Nigidius, apud Freber. Theatr. p. 1252.

[A] He died at Basil some time after. It is affirmed in the Theatrum of Paul Freherus, that he died the sixth of May 1562, for which the fourth part of John James Boissard's Icones virorum illustrium is quoted: they might also have quoted the Diarium Historicum of Reulnerus. The new edition of Vander Linden (1) places this physician's death in 1562. Konig places it in 1566, and Thuanus (2), and Bucholcer (3), on the 16th of April 1568. Two prefaces (4), with some little pieces, which Gratarolus, being at Marburg, dedicated, the 25th of August 1562, to the Landgrave of Hesse, prove that he did not die at Basil the 6th of May of the same year. It is a sad thing to find such a disagreement among authors about a thing of this nature, which might so easily be exactly known. I have observed the like variations about Gifanius. See the remark [A] of his article.

[B] He wrote several good books. These are the titles of some of them; de Memoria reparanda, augenda, conservanda, ac de Reminiscencia. The first edition, which is of the year 1554, has been followed by many others (5). De prædicatione morum, naturarumque hominum sacris, & inspectione partium corporis. Prognostica naturalia de temporum mutatione perpetua, ordine literarum. De literarum & eorum qui magistratibus funguntur conservanda præservandaque valetudine. De vini natura, artificio, & usu, deque omni re potabili. De regimine iter agentium, vel equitum, vel peditum, vel navi, vel curru, seu rheda, &c. viatoribus quibusque utilissimi libri duo. He published some books of other authors, and added to them something of his own. Petri Pomponatii liber de causis occultorum affectuum, seu de incantatione, cum præfatione & glossis. Petri Apocensis libellus de venenis, ad manuscriptum exemplar correctus, cui adjecit multa ejus argumenti utilia. Correctiones & additiones in librum Italicum falso attributum Gabrieli Fallopio, cui titulus est secreta Fallopii. He made a collection of several tracts concerning the sweating disease in England, and concerning baths, and a compilation of several books of alchemy (6). It cannot be denied that he was a public-spirited man, since he not only sought remedies, that might be useful to magistrates, but also those that are proper for all sorts of travellers. He did not forget studious men; for he endeavoured to enable them to preserve their health, and strengthen their memory. A man, who could supply their necessities on this account, would deserve divine honours in the republic of letters, in which memory is almost as necessary as life.

GRAWERUS (ALBERT), born at Mesecow in the March of Brandenburg, in the year 1575, was in great esteem with the divines of the confession of Ausburg. He may be compared to those soldiers of fortune, who, going through all the military degrees, at last are advanced to the first posts. At first, he only taught school in Hungary (a) [A]; but, when Agria was taken (b) the Ottomans, he retired to Wittemberg, from whence he went to Isleben, to direct the school there: After this he was made dean of Mansfield (c); then he was admitted doctor of divinity in the university of Iēna (d), and, two years after, he was professor there in the same faculty. At last, in 1616, he obtained the superintendency of the churches of the country of Weimar (e). He died the 30th of November 1617 (f). He was the hottest divine imaginable; and never any man wrote with greater passion against those of the confession of Geneva. It is to him chiefly that the missionaries have recourse [B], when they design to shew the feuds, that reign betwixt the two Protestant communions. He was furious, not only in verbal disputes, but also in his writings [C]. They are numerous [D]; and most of them against the Calvinists. He also writ against the Socinians and the Romish church.

[A] At first he only taught school in Hungary. This is the idea we should form, by consulting only Spizelius; but, if you read the funeral oration (1), you will find, that the baron Gregory Horwath, having set up a new college at Scepus (2), made Grawerus rector of it, on the recommendation of Giles Hunnius, and that Grawerus taught there both philosophy and divinity.

[B] It is to him the missionaries have recourse. Father Adam, writing a book against Mr Daillé, produced I know not how many Germans, one Giles Hunnius, one Zephyrius, one Gibelin, one Philip Nicholas, and one Granverus (3), who are full of invectives against the Calvinists. He chiefly insisted upon a treatise of Grawerus, intitled, The most absurd absurdities of the Calvinistical absurdities (4). Here follows the prudent answer of Mr Daillé, but somewhat disobliging to the author I speak of in this article. 'They are angry brethren; we must excuse their passion, and comfort ourselves with the testimony that even their virulence gives to the goodness of our cause, in our controversies with them. Were they not in the wrong, they would not come to injurious language. It is certainly error that discomposes them. Truth has more gentleness and reserve, and is not used to fly out into such outrage. For, that Luther and his disciples were in a rage, when they writ those shameful and horrible things you have collected, is evident by the extravagance of their very words; as, to omit the rest, by this ridiculous title of one of their books, which you fail not to represent: The most absurd absurdities of the Calvinistical absurdities. A learned man would not speak so foolishly if he was in his right senses.' He concludes that chapter with these words: Thanks be to God, they are not all so passionate as your Gibelins and Granveres. Some of them are more gentle and tractable; and the late Dr Calixtus, a divine of Helmstadt, the most learned of all the Lutherans of his time, has sufficiently shewn it in two or three books ()*, which he published upon this subject (5).

Note, That Mr Daillé might have taxed the jesuit Adam with ill translating the title of our Grawerus's book. This is the true translation of it: The Calvinistical absurdities more absurd than all other absurdities.

[C] He was furious . . . in verbal disputes . . . and in his writings. He had a conference with Amling, in the year 1604, in the castle of Schochwitz; and he printed it with notes, which breathed nothing but his zeal for Lutheranism: Veritatis Lutheranae amore notulis quibusdam aspersis evulgatum (colloquium cum Amlingo). He never made such efforts in favour of his party as on that occasion. 'Singulari zelo & fervore spiritus sancti motus strenue & masculè adversus hostium quorumvis cohortes depugnavit, nec quicquam omisit quo veritatis cœlestis doctrina asserti pugnari queat, cum PRIMIS in gravissimo illo colloquio cum Amlingo habito (6). — Being moved (6) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris rectorato, pag. 41. by an extraordinary zeal, and the fervor of the holy spirit, he strenuously, and with manly courage, opposed whole legions of foes, and omitted nothing, which might assert and defend the heavenly doctrine of truth; ESPECIALLY in the conference he had with Amling.' Judge how much he inveighed against Sebastian Lamius, whom he convicted of Calvinism in a synod. Quem admodum etiam in synodo Hungarico-Kesmarcensi anno 95 habita Sebastianum Lamium heterodoxia Calvinianæ convicti (7). No doubt he accused him as a false brother, who, under the name of a Lutheran minister, hatched Calvinistical errors; which alone was sufficient to heat a man of a sedate mind: Besides, he disputed against him in a synod. The circumstance of the place was enough of itself to move his spleen. I must not forget, that he was called, the sword and the shield of Lutheranism (8).

[D] His writings are numerous. The bare titles will manifest the excess of his zeal. Bellum Calvinii & Jesu Christi, at Magdeburg 1605. Harmonia præceptorum Calvinianorum & Photinianorum, at Jena 1612, in 4to. I have already mentioned the Abjura abjuratorum, &c. His Anti-Lubinus, hoc est Elementum paradoxorum & emblematum Calvinisticorum D. Eilhardi Lubini, de prima causa & natura mali, at Magdeburg 1606, in 4to, is a book against the Calvinists, though Eilhard Lubin lived and died a Lutheran, as Mr Baillet affirms (9); for doubtless Grawerus suspected him to be of Calvin's opinion in some things. I omit the titles of his other books. You will find them in Spizelius (10), and in Paul Freherus (11).

GREGORY I, surnamed the Great, born at Rome of a patrician family, discovered so much ability in the exercise of the senatorial office, that the emperor Justin the younger made him prefect of Rome (a). He laid down this dignity, when he found, that it made him too fond of the world, and shut himself up in a convent [A], under the discipline of the abbot Valentinus (b). He was quickly taken out of it by Pope Pelagius II, who made him his seventh deacon, and sent him nuncio to Constantinople, to demand succours against the Lombards. He returned to Rome after the death of the emperor [B], and was for some time secretary to Pope Pelagius; after which he obtained leave to retire into his monastery (c). When he thought to enjoy there a quiet life, he was elected Pope by the clergy, the senate, and people of Rome; and, after using all imaginable means to avoid this dignity [C], he was obliged to accept it (d). It appeared by his conduct, that they could not have elected a more deserving person for that great post; for, besides that he was learned, and instructed the church by writing and preaching, he knew very well how to manage the tempers of princes for the temporal and spiritual interests of religion. The particulars of his conduct in this respect would carry me too far; and I am the more willing not to enlarge upon it, because every body may inform himself of it in a modern writer (e). But I shall observe, that our Pope undertook the conversion of the English [D], and happily effected it, by the assistance

[B] He returned to Rome after the death of the emperor. This emperor's name was Tiberius: He died the 14th of August 582 (4); which manifests a great fault of Mr Maimbourg. He says (5), that, though Gregory could obtain no succour, yet he proved very useful and serviceable to the church, since he composed, at Constantinople, his excellent book of morals upon Job, and by his learned conferences obliged the patriarch Eutychius to retract his errors concerning the resurrection. After which, continues he, his nunciature ending by the emperor Tiberius's death, who died at that time . . . he returned to Rome. He places these conferences in the year 586; he must therefore believe, that Tiberius did not die before this year, which is a gross error in chronology. Dr Cave places the same conferences and the death of this emperor in the year 586 (6). He has therefore committed the same fault. Baronius (7) places likewise this emperor's death in the same year: His false chronology was not known to Mr du Pin (8).

[C] He used all imaginable means to avoid this dignity. He wrote to the emperor a most pressing letter, in which he intreats him not to confirm his election, and to give orders for the immediate choice of another man of a greater capacity, strength, and holiness, than he (9); and, when he understood, that his letter had been intercepted by the governor of Rome, being persuaded that his election would be confirmed at the imperial court, he betook himself to flight, and went and hid himself in a cave in the midst of a forest, being resolved to live there . . . till, not knowing where to find him, they should proceed to a new election (10). He could never resolve to accept the papal dignity, till he understood from some heavenly signs, that it was God's will he should be Pope. It is said (11), that a dove flying before those that looked for him, led them the way they were to go; or, that a miraculous light discovered to them the place of his retreat. This very much resembles the adventure of the Magi who went to worship the new born Messiah. Mr Maimbourg's exclamation upon St Gregory's reluctance, is very judicious. 'A great example, says he (12), which ought to confound the furious ambition of those, who, having nothing comparable to the holiness, learning, and ability of this great man, who buried himself alive in the earth, to avoid the pontificate as a thunderbolt, do, by their scandalous intriguing, a kind of violence to the Holy Ghost, to raise themselves, against his orders, by ways purely human and uncanonical, to the highest place in the church'. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (13), in the extract of a book, intitled, De Clerico penitente. I ought not to forget another passage of Maimbourg, concerning St Gregory's answers to the letters he received from all parts (14), 'To let him know how much they shared in the joy, which every body exprefsed for his exaltation . . . He answered, that he was extremely sorry he had been taken from his solitude, to be engaged anew in worldly affairs. But, because experience has shewn in all ages (it is Maimbourg's reflexion) that the fine things, which a man of parts can speak and write, are not always a good proof of his integrity and virtue; and that many think and act quite contrary to what they preach and write; I shall not insert here what this great pontiff said of himself upon this subject in his writings.' But there is one thing, which equity will not allow me to omit: It is a fault of the famous Peter du Moulin, animadverted upon by Mr Maimbourg. That no body may complain of my extenuating or amplifying the thing, I will use the animadvertiser's own words (15).

'The minister du Moulin, in a little piece he has written, under the false title of The life of St Gregory I, surnamed the Great . . . would make us believe . . . that this Roman pontiff was of a religion contrary to ours. But, not to give myself the trouble of confuting so wretched a libel, I shall only shew, to evince what credit he deserves, that he begins with the most horrible and grossest imposture that ever was. For thus he speaks, in the second chapter, pag. 9, to prove, against the testimony of Gregory of Tours, that St Gregory did not oppose his being created bishop. Those, says he, who have written St Gregory's life, particularly Gregory of Tours, say, that he made some resistance; but this does not agree with what St Gregory himself says, in the fourth epistle of the first book, where he says, that he did not oppose his being made a bishop, and he cites in the margin these words; Sibi ut imponeretur episcopatus non resistisse. Let any one read that epistle, and he will find the quite contrary. St Gregory complains to his friend John, patriarch of Constantinople, that he had not, by his good offices, which he should have done him with the emperor, hindered the confirmation of his election; and he speaks in this manner: If we are commanded to love our neighbour as ourselves; why do not you love me as yourself? For I know with what earnestness you have declined episcopacy; and yet you did not interpose against the laying this same burden upon me. St Gregory here complains in express words, that the patriarch did not oppose his being made bishop of Rome; and the minister du Moulin will have it, that St Gregory confesses in this place, that he made no resistance, ascribing to that holy Pope, what he himself says of the patriarch of Constantinople by way of complaint.'

[D] He undertook the conversion of the English.

He sent into England some monks of his monastery (16), under the conduct of Augustin their abbot (17), whom the bishops of France consecrated first bishop of the English nation, according to the power they had from St Gregory (18). Etheldred reigned then in England, and had married Aldeberga, or Bertha, daughter to Charibert king of France, a young princess of much wit, instructed in good learning, and very zealous for the Catholic faith (19). She disposed him to hearken to the Pope's missionaries. He ordered them to come into his presence, and would not hear them but in the open field, according to an ancient superstition of the people, that if they had a mind to use any charm, or secret enchantment, to deceive him, it might vanish away, and lose all its force in the open air . . . He heard them very calmly, and told them, that he was extremely well pleased with what they said; but that those fine things, especially the magnificent promises they had made him of an eternal life, not appearing to him very certain, he did not think it expedient to forsake what he had learned from his ancestors, to run after uncertainties (20). He permitted them to preach in his kingdom, and suffered all those, who liked their doctrine, to embrace it. He himself was converted (21). And, because the example of kings is commonly very powerful, either in good or ill things, most of the English embraced the Christian faith after him. And that, which complicated their conversion, was his gentleness and moderation. For he did did not force any body to renounce their ancient superstitions, having learnt from his teachers, that the service that is done to JESUS CHRIST ought to be voluntary (22). The queen mightily contributed to these conversions; for she not only disposed the king her husband to use the missionaries kindly, but also to become a convert. There have been few revolutions of religion, either for the better or worse, which women have not chiefly influenced. Maimbourg gives us some examples of it (23). We may say, that, as the devil formerly made use of the artifices of three empresses, the wives of Licinius, Constantinus, and Valens, to establish the Arian heresy in the east; so God, to assault his enemy with his own weapons, was pleased to employ three glorious queens, Clotilda, wife of Clovis; Ingonda, wife of Ermenigildus; and Theodelinda, wife of Agilolphus, to sanctify the west, by converting the French from Heathenism, and exterminating Arianism out of Spain and Italy, by the conversion of the western Goths and Lombards. In another work, he had only mentioned the services done by women to bad causes. As if it was the fate of every heresy, says he (24), as has been verified by an hundred examples, still to find its protection, and, if I may so express myself, its strength in the weakness of some princes, who, either out of vanity to procure herself honour, or out of illusion, thinking perhaps to merit by it, desires to become the head of a party, which, not being able to maintain itself, falls, and, at last, overwhelms her miserably under its ruins.

[E] He sometimes was very remiss. The inconsistency of his maxims manifestly appears in his not approving, that the Jews should be forced to be baptized, and approving the constraining of heretics to return to the church. St. Avitus, bishop of Clermont in Auvergne . . . going after his clergy, in a procession through the city, all the people that followed him . . . fell suddenly upon a synagogue of the Jews, and pulled it down, so that there remained nothing of it but the place all levelled, without so much as one stone upon another (25). The prelate, desirous to make use of so favourable an occasion, ordered the Jews to be told, that they must either be converted, or depart out of his diocese. Three hundred of them were converted, and the rest obliged to depart. This example was quickly after followed in Spain and Italy, and especially in Provence, where more still was done than he did. For, without endeavouring to bring them over to the Christian faith by holy instructions and good examples, they forced them to be baptized whether they would or not; which caused as many profanations of so sacred a thing, and as many sacrileges, as there were baptized Jews. St. Gregory, to prevent so great a mischief, wrote to Virgilius archbishop of Arles, and to Theodorus bishop of Marseilles, two very good men, commanding them to see, that the Jews should not be forced to receive baptism, for fear the sacred fountains, in which men are regenerated to a divine life by baptism, should be to them an occasion of a second death, more fatal to them than the first by apostacy. He had written, a little before, the same thing to the bishop of Terracina (26). He commanded him to leave the Jews the entire liberty of assembling in the place that was granted them for the celebration of their feasts (27). This is what he wrote some time after to the bishop of Cagliari in Sardinia. The laws, says he to him, indeed forbid the Jews to build new synagogues; but they permit them to possess the old ones without any molestation †. And he adds, what he said also upon occasion of the Jews of Marseilles, that they are to be won to the faith by preaching, and not by violence; that God will have the sacrifice of the mind and heart to be voluntary; and he adds, that such as are converted by force and necessity, return to their vomit, when they can (28). So far all goes very right; but here follows a strange distinction, which makes a monstrous medley in his system. (29) Not but that, according to him, there is in this a great difference betwixt infidels and heretics, especially at the beginning of heresies. For the latter ought to be treated as rebels, traitors, and perjured people, who have violated their faith to God and the Catholic church, from which they are departed, by revolting against her, and attempting as much as in them lies, to destroy her. They may be forced to return to their obedience and duty; and, if they will not do it, they ought to be punished, according to the imperial laws, the holy fathers, and Calvin himself, who wrote a treatise upon this subject, to justify his conduct, with respect to Servetus, whom he caused to be condemned to the flames at Geneva. It is otherwise with Heathens, Jews, and Mahometans; and even with those heretics, who, being born in heresy, which they have received from their ancestors, have not been bred up in the church any more than those infidels. They ought not to be constrained directly and by main force, especially when they have been tolerated for some time. But St. Gregory teaches us, both by his doctrine and example, that it is good to constrain them indirectly, according to the gospel, which says, Compelle intrare; which may be done two ways; by a rigorous treatment of the obstinate; and by doing good to those that are converted. It is thus St. Gregory will have the Manichees to be persecuted who are obstinate in their heresy: and that he orders the bishop of Cagliari to raise the taxes of the peasants, and of those among the Heathens that belong to the church, and hold her lands, and still positively refuse to embrace Christianity: but, on the contrary, he will have the converted Jews to be eased of one third of what they are obliged to pay to the Roman church for the lands of her patrimony, which they cultivate in Sicily, that the others, being allured by the hopes of a like abatement, may more easily turn Christians; and to such as might suspect these interested conversions, he says, that, if these people are hypocrites, and not true converts, yet much will be got by it, in that their children at least will become good Catholics.

This might afford matter for a long discourse; but I shall content myself with some few notes. I. It is certain, that the alternative of conversion or banishment is very hard, and most proper to make hypocrites. For what will not people of an indifferent piety do, not to lose the delights of their native country? In a word, all those, who propose this alternative, condemn it as a tyrannical action, wherever they are exposed to it themselves; an evident sign, that they only judge of the justice of an action by the rule of their interest, Quod volumus sanctum est. II. This is giving the church a power, which she has not, to pretend, she can treat all those, that leave her, as temporal states treat rebels. The church can have none but voluntary subjects, and can never require an oath derogatory to the law of order, which will have us, at all times, and in all places, to follow the light of conscience; and consequently those who, to obey this light, break the faith, which they have given her, ought to be compared to those, who prefer primitive and absolute oaths, before posterior and conditional ones; for it would be an impious thing to engage in a formulary of faith, without presupposing it to be good: and thus all the oaths, by which men are engaged to the church, are conditional; but the obligation to the light of conscience is natural, essential, and absolute. What may be said of those, who, to obey their conscience, break their oaths to the church, is, that from understanding men they are grown ignorant. But is there any well governed state, that enacts any punishment against such as forget their learning, and only as fore-against those who get new notions, whereby they are persuaded, that what they took to be an error is a truth? We may therefore say, that, if the church had the power to punish, as rebels, such as forsake her, she might have a greater power than is exercised by the most despotic princes (30). She might punish as a capital crime the change of some ideas. III. It is no difficult thing to apprehend, that this is a chimerical distinction; for a man, who has been bred up in the church, could never renounce the power of leaving it, whenever his conscience should prompt him to side with another communion: and therefore he has as much

(30) That is, being considered as rebels, who are to be observed, that the foregoing, who possess the power to punish, do it only by virtue of their religion; and therefore, it is their religion that justifies the punishment: quod non notandum.

to reason. But, to make amends for it, his morals concerning the chastity of ecclesiastics were very rigid [F]: For he pretended, that a man, who had lost his virginity, ought not to be admitted to the priesthood; and he ordered the candidates to be examined upon that point. He excepted widowers from that necessity, provided they had been regular in their marriage, and had lived for a long time continent. He was also very severe with respect to calumny [G]. All things duly considered, he deserves the much right to follow that communion, as those that have been bred in it; for all the right of the latter consists in being persuaded that their religion is good.

IV. My maxims are so certain, that each party acknowledges the truth of them, when they do not suppose their own principle. A Jew is so far from calling a man, who forsakes Christianity to embrace Judaism, a traitor and a rebel, that he calls him a man faithful to God, to the truth, and to the true church: he calls none perfidious men, but such as renounce the Jewish religion. This is the way of all religions. V. As for the two methods of the Compelle intrare, I refer the reader to the Philosophical Commentary. I shall only observe, that the epistle of Merchants of the word of GOD (31) belongs peculiarly to those who use these two ways of converting (32); and that it is morally impossible but that sovereigns, who authorize them, must be put upon unjust and base measures (33).

VI. The reason why St Gregory would not have the Jews to be converted by force, is very good; because, said he, those, that are converted in that manner, return to their vomit, when they can safely do it. He was therefore very much in the wrong, to order that they should be converted, by over-rating the oblation, and discharging those, that turned Christians, from a third part of the tax; for it is manifest, that they, who are converted in that manner, return to their vomit, when they have it in their power. VII. And, if his reason for converting the Jews, by raising the taxes of the oblation, and moderating those of the converted, be good, he is to blame for disapproving the forcing them to baptism; for consider his reason: If they are not true converts, yet much will be got by it, in that their children at least will be good Catholics. May not the same thing be said with respect to those that are baptized by force? He cannot therefore be excused from a pitiful contradiction.

[F] His morals concerning the chastity of ecclesiastics were very rigid.] In the business of choosing a bishop, he principally recommended it to the electors to inform themselves, whether the person proposed was guilty of adultery, or meer fornication. 'Nay,' he would have them to ask him in private whether he had been guilty of that sin, admonishing him, that, if he was guilty of it, tho' no body knew it, and there was no proof to convict him, yet he could not in conscience receive orders; that, nevertheless, they should be given him, if he protested that he was free from that vice; but, if he confessed it, it should be gently represented to him, that he ought rather to think of a cloister to do penance, than of the priesthood, of which his crime, tho' secret, made him unworthy (34). This great pontiff understanding (35), 'That some ecclesiastics of Sardinia had committed that sin, after they had received orders, ordered not only that they should be deposed, without any hopes of being ever restored to the functions of their ministry; but also that, to prevent so great an evil, none should be admitted to sacred orders, and especially to episcopacy, without assurance, that they had always lived chastely, and even preserved their continency many years after they were separated from their wives, in order to be admitted to the priesthood.' The suffrages being divided at Naples in the election of a bishop, this Pope, without more ado, declared plainly that he could not approve John the Deacon (36), (37) because he had been well informed he had a very little daughter. What presumption, added he, is this in him, to aspire to episcopacy, when he is manifestly convicted, by this little child, of the small space of time he has preserved his continence? He caused it to be inviolably observed, according to the canons, 'that every ecclesiastic and beneficed man, whether sub-deacon, deacon, priest, abbot, or bishop, who should be guilty of impurity, if there were proofs of his crime, should be deposed, and put to penance in a monastery, and incapacitated to be ever restored to his order and dignity. . . . Hearing that the abbot Secundinus, who was a very wicked man, had committed horrible crimes, he said, that, without seeking proofs for a judicial conviction, it sufficed that he himself, perhaps boasting of what this sort of debauches call a good fortune, had confessed, that he had sported with women, which had not hindered him from being an abbot; whereupon he caused him to be deposed (38). He treated in the same manner the bishop of Dacelatina, a city of Illyricum, at present called Catara; and he gave order to his metropolitan, that, if this wicked man, who had been justly deposed for having stained his character by this infamous vice, durst ever pretend, or even intimate by a single word, that he had still some thoughts of being a bishop, he should be confined to a monastery to do penance all his life time, and be deprived of the communion till his death. . . . What is very observable herein, is, that the bishop of Tarentum being not accused, but only suspected, of keeping a concubine since he was a bishop, he advises him very seriously, that, if he is conscious of this crime, tho' it were in secret, and he denied it, and there was no convincing proof against him, yet he is obliged in conscience to depose himself, and to forbear all sacerdotal functions. This will seem the more strange, because this bishop having committed another crime, which in the eyes of the world seems to be much greater, he inflicted a much lesser punishment on him. For this angry prelate having been disobliged by one of the poor old women, that were kept at the expence of the church, caused her to be beaten at such a rate, that she remained half dead. It is certain, that, if she had died a few days after she had been so cruelly beaten, he had been most severely punished, according to the rigour of the canons, as guilty of murder: however, because she died not till eight months after, St Gregory did not think, that her death was to be ascribed to the blows she had received, and contented himself with suspending him for two months. But for the sin of incontinence, which, by the laws of human justice, should be punished less rigorously than that other action so unworthy of a bishop, he declared to him, that, if he had committed it, tho' it could not be proved, it was absolutely necessary, for the satisfaction of his conscience, that he should leave his bishopric (39). Mr Maimbourg does not leave this subject without saying, 'that the rigour of the canons upon this point is not at present in use, and that a man is not obliged to follow St Gregory's opinion upon this case of conscience (40).'

[G] He was very severe with respect to calumny.] All that Mr Maimbourg says upon this subject seems so good to me, that, finding nothing useless in it, I shall not abridge it. He observes (41) first, that there is a very subtle oppression, †† and the more dangerous, because it is most difficult to be discovered, viz. Calumny, which the wisest of men, and even those, who glory in suffering joyfully the first (42), find so barbarous and intolerable, that they cannot binder their constancy from being spoken, be their minds ever so strong. After which, he goes on thus: 'I know that the †† civil and canon laws appoint punishments for this crime, so much complained of in the world; but they are not always well observed with respect to ecclesiastics, as St Gregory testifies, and especially in the communities, where calumny hardly meets with any rebuke, under pretence that the punishing of a false accusation would take away the liberty of bringing true ones, and discovering punishable faults to the superiors. Now this is what St Gregory could in no wise bear with, as appears by many of his letters. In effect, Epiphanius ††, priest of the church of Cagliari, having been falsely accused of some great crime by other Sardinian ecclesiastics, who had even brought the accusation before the Pope; he himself, surname of Great: But he cannot be excused for prostituting his praises, to insinuate himself into the favour of an usurper [H], who had lately committed the most execrable parricide that history affords. It is a very remarkable instance of the slavery a man falls into, when he will maintain himself in great posts. If we compare his flatteries of the emperor Phocas, with those, wherewith he caressed a most wicked queen of France [I], we must acknowledge, that they, who forced him to be Pope, knew him better * self had a mind to hear the cause thoroughly. And, as he found it was nothing but a meer calumny, wherewith they designed to oppress this priest's innocence, he sent him back fully absolved to his bishop, enjoining him to restore him to his order, and to deprive the accuser of the communion, unless he was ready to shew, by canonical and most evident proofs, the truth of his allegations. This is what the law * requires, which adds, that the false accuser of his brother ought to undergo the same punishment the accused would deserve, if he was found guilty. Here is something farther. Hilary, sub-deacon of the church of Naples, having brought a false accusation against John, deacon of the same church, which could not be maintained against many witnesses, who attested the deacon's innocence; the holy pontiff was very much offended, that Paschasius, their bishop, had not as yet punished the slanderer. Whereupon he gave order to the defender, Anthemius, to tell him from him, that he would have him first deprived of his office of sub-deacon (†), of which he was unworthy: secondly, that he should be publicly whipped: for this sort of correction was in use at that time to chastise clerks, as may be seen in St Austin (‡), tho' this custom has been since abolished: and lastly, that, having been thus chastised, he be sent into exile, that is, either into a monastery to do penance, or by the order of the magistrate, to whom alone it belonged to punish a criminal with banishment by the law of the state. And as he manifested his abhorrence of calumny, by punishing it so severely; so he kept strictly upon his guard, that he might not be overreached; and never believed any informer, till having examined the least circumstances of the accusation, and exactly heard both sides, he could not in the least doubt of the truth of it. He was moreover so much afraid of being deceived by the artifices of calumniators, that, when he could, he forbore giving his judgment about an accusation, referring himself to some other person, on whose sufficiency and probity he intirely depended.

[H] He cannot be excused for prostituting his praises, to insinuate himself into the favour of an usurper. The emperor Maurice's army, being revolted against him at the instigation of Phocas, marched towards Constantinople, and took it without any difficulty. The emperor was delivered to Phocas, who by an unheard of cruelty, caused five little princes, Maurice's children, to be murdered in his presence, before their father's eyes, whom that unfortunate father could not save (43). The nurse of the youngest had cunningly withdrawn him from the massacre, and substituted her own in his place; but Maurice, who perceived it, caused his own child to be returned to the executioners. (44). After this, the tyrant, more cruel than the wildest beasts, being no ways moved with so brave and generous an action, which melted all the affluents into tears, commanded this poor little innocent to be killed, and the bloody sacrifice of his cruelty to be perfected, by laying Maurice upon the bodies of his five children, as upon an altar, where he was inhumanly butchered. The eldest son of Maurice had been a little before sent to the king of Persia; but he was taken at Nicea, and beheaded. The cruel Phocas put also to death almost all the relations and friends of the emperor Maurice, and even the empress Constantina, and her three daughters, contrary to the promise he had made to the patriarch Cyriacus, that he would suffer them quietly to live in a monastery where they were. In fine, there was never so much innocent blood shed, nor so many miseries and misfortunes, as in his reign. . . . (45). And indeed there never was a more infamous tyrant than this wretched man, without virtue, birth, honour, and merit, horribly ill-shaped, abominably ugly, of a frightful aspect, appearing always in a fury when he spoke, drunken, lascivious, brutish, sanguinary, without any sense of humanity, being wholly a wild beast in his look and humour, and having nothing of a man, but a very deformed shape; in a word, having all the ill qualities, which may be set in opposition to those, which the historians have extremely praised in Maurice (46). I have used Maimbourg's words, that nobody may say I have aggravated Phocas's crimes, to cast a greater blot upon St Gregory; and I will still use the same author's expressions, as to this Pope's flatteries, that I may not be accused of representing thing to his disadvantage. I confess, says that historian (47), that what I have been saying may offend those, who, after this, shall read the three epistles (†) which this holy Pope wrote to Phocas, and to Leontia his wife, when they knew at Rome what had been done at Constantinople, when he was crowned emperor there. For he seems in those three letters to rejoice, and to thank GOD, for his coming to the crown, as for the greatest advantage that could happen to the empire, and to speak of him in the most advantageous terms, as of an admirable prince, who would make it flourish again, by delivering it from all miseries wherewith it had hitherto been afflicted. And he thanks GOD, that the world, being delivered from so hard and uneasy a yoke, began to enjoy the sweets of liberty under his reign. Maimbourg gives the best colour he can to this strange flattery (48): he alleges several reasons for it; but he says nothing of the true one; which is, that Maurice had declared for the patriarch of Constantinople against Pope Gregory (49), in very nice disputes, such as are always the differences about authority, or superiority. The pope, overjoyed to be delivered from an emperor, who favoured the patriarch of Constantinople, loaded this new prince with praises, in order to obtain from him what he desired against his rival (50). There are hardly any examples of a virtue, that has been proof against the jealousy of authority, or the interest of a party. Tho' a prince be endowed with the noblest qualities, if he is withal contrary to a certain church, and is banished, or killed, the looks upon this as a heavenly favour, and respectfully kisses the human hand, that procures it, especially when this hand acts contrary to the other prince. In such a juncture, two contradictory propositions are found in the mouths of the clergy: the party, that loses it's patron, considers this loss as a horrid conspiracy of infernal powers; it cites both divine and human laws against the revolution: but the other side speaks of nothing but the wonderful ways of providence, the paternal care of heaven, and runs into political doctrines. But I question whether this prepossession was ever carried to such infamies, as those of St Gregory. What the bishop of Constantinople to file himself Occasional Patriarch, declaring that this Pope, who is so severe to a poor fornicating clergyman, and so terrible in his sentences thereupon, writes to Phocas, without so much as expressing his wish, that Maurice and his children had not suffered death. There are no men, that make greater outcries against the Sceptics than the clergy, and yet no men are more used to turn the rules of morality like a nose of wax, according to the reciprocal interest of their cause: (51) Maimbourg, which at the bottom is a most dangerous Scepticism. better than he knew himself. They perceived, that he had all the policy and address, that are requisite to get powerful protectors, and to draw earthly blessings upon the church. It is very probable, that the zeal he expressed against the ambition of the patriarch of Constantinople, was ill governed [K]. It is not certain, that he caused the noble monuments of the old Roman magnificence to be destroyed [L], lest those, who came to Rome, should give more attention to the triumphal arches, &c. than to holy things. The same ought to be said of what is reported, that he caused a vast number of Heathen books [M], and particularly Livy, vents, not forgetting to make a devout request for relics to the holy Father Maimbourg proves the exemptions, which are said to have been granted by this Pope to the pious queen Brunehild, to be fictitious; for it is this virtue St Gregory praises in her, and the like will ever be done to any one that is liberal to the church, the cully of those people, who sometimes are cullies in their turn. This puts me in mind of the answer that was given by a Carthusian to Philip de Comines. 'The body of John Galeazzo, a great and wicked tyrant . . . is in the Carthusian monastery at Pavia, near the park, higher than the great altar, and the Carthusians shewed it me, at least his bones, which smell as nature requires: a native of Bourges called him saint, and I asked him in his ear, why he called him saint, when he might see painted about him the arms of many towns he had usurped, to which he had no right? . . . he answered me softly, in this country, we call saints all those that are our benefactors' (54). This rule of these good monks is of all times and countries.

[K] The zeal he expressed against the ambition of the patriarch of Constantinople was ill governed.] This patriarch is honoured as a saint in the Greek church. He was called John the Faster. The surname, Faster, was given him, because he was a man of incredible abstinence, and prodigious austerities of life . . . (55). He did all that was possible to prevent his exaltation to the patriarchal throne (56). Pope Gregory gave him this testimony, Quo ardore, quo studio Beatitudo vestra Episcopatus pondus fugere voluerit scio (57). But when this great faster had sat for some time upon that fine throne, he was no longer master of his pride. Perhaps, he was tainted with this vice before he was made a patriarch: for it frequently happens, that, when corrupt nature cannot plunge men into pleasures, he makes it up by other faults, especially by the spirit of pride. Perhaps, the patriarchal dignity, by I know not what contagious fatality, inspired John the Faster with ambition. Be it how it will, this great dignity enabled him to give himself a free scope: he might colour his ambitions with the pretence of the rights of his patriarchate. Those, who pretend to an austere devotion, may more easily conceal their faults, when they are not in a post, which permits them to alledge the interests of the church, the glory of God, charity to one's neighbour, &c. But, when they are in possession of such posts, they may let loose many passions, and fully indulged them, under the sacred auspices I have mentioned. To return to John the Faster: he assumed the title of Oecumenical Patriarch: the Pope so resented it, that he forbade him, under pain of excommunication, to call himself so any more. John the Faster was so little moved with his threats, that he still retained that title. And he did it with that baughtiness, or rather affectation, that, in the acts of a synod, which he sent to Rome . . . he styled himself almost in every line Oecumenical Patriarch (58). This was the origin of a very great quarrel betwixt St Gregory and him. Many pretend this was only a dispute about words, and Maimbourg seems to prove it well enough. But he cannot do this without affording a terrible satire against the two principal prelates of that time, the bishop of Rome, and the patriarch of Constantinople: for can any thing be more ridiculous than the storms they raised, if it be true, that their dispute was only a vain question about a name (59)?

[L] It is not certain that he caused the noble monuments of the Romans to be destroyed.] It is certain he has been accused of it, as it appears from these words of Platina, who rejects this accusation. 'Neque est cur patamur Gregorium hac in re à quibusdam literarum ignavis potissimum carpi, quod suo mandato veterum aedificia sint disrupta, ne peregrini & advenæ

(ut ipsi fingunt) ad urbem religionis causa venientes pollubatis locis sacris, arcus triumphales & monumenta veterum cum admiratione inspicerent. Absit hæc calumnia a tanto Pontifice Romano præsertim: cui certe post Deum patria quam vita charior fuit (60). — Nor ought we, in this matter, to let Gregory be censured by the ignorant and illiterate, for ordering the buildings of the ancients to be demolished, lest travellers and strangers (as they pretend) coming to Rome on a religious account, should neglect places of devotion, and view with admiration the triumphal arches and monuments of the ancients. Be this reproach far from so great a Pope, who, certainly next to God, valued his country dearer than his life.' The same historian observes, that Sabinian, who succeeded Gregory, expressed a violent resentment against his predecessor, so far as almost to burn his books. Some inhabitants of Rome excited the new Pope to this, because, said they, St Gregory had mangled, or thrown down, the statues of the ancient Romans. Platina rejects also this accusation. Paululum etiam abfuit quin libri ejus comburerentur, adeo in Gregorium irâ & invidia exarsit homo malevolus. Sunt qui scribant Sabinianum instigantibus quibusdam Romanis hoc in Gregorium molitum esse, quod veterum statuas tota urbe dum viveret, & obruncaverit & disjiceret: quod quidem ita vero dissonum est, ut illud quod de abolendis aedificiis majorum in vita ejus diximus (61).

[M] He is accused of causing a vast number of heathen books to be burnt.] It is said, that the Palatine library, founded by Augustus, was reduced to ashes by St Gregory. I have read this no where but in Joannes Sarisberienfis, and therefore I give no great credit to it: these are his words. 'Si vero mathematicorum via esset usquequaque laudabilis, non tantopere pœnitisset magnum Augustinum se eorum consultationibus inclinasse. Ad hæc doctor sanctissimus ille Gregorius qui melleo prædicationis imbre totam rigavit & inebriavit ecclesiam, non modo mathesin jussit ab aula, sed ut traditur à majoribus, incendio dedit probatæ lectionis scripta, Palatinus

Quæcunque tenebat Apollo,

In quibus erant præcipua, quæ cœlestium mentem, & superiorum oracula videbantur hominibus revelare (62). — But if the method of the astrologers were every way commendable, the great St Augustine would not have been so sorry that he had consulted them. Besides, the most holy doctor St Gregory, he who edified the church with the eloquence of his preaching, not only banished astrology from court, but, as the tradition says, burnt the most valuable books of that science in the Palatine library; among which were those, which seemed to reveal the will of heaven to men.' He says in another place, that St Gregory suppressed profane books, to raise a greater esteem for the sacred ones. Fertur beatus Gregorius bibliothecam combussisse gentilem, quo divinæ pagine gratior esset locus & major autoritas, & diligentia studiosior (63). What is certain, is, that this Pope had conceived a great aversion for heathen books, as it appears from this passage of his history. Desiderius, archbishop of Vienna, was a man of an extraordinary merit, of admirable learning, and a shining virtue, to whom St Gregory wrote more than once with great commendations of him; and yet he found fault with his conduct, and sharply reproved him, as being guilty of a great crime, for spending his time in teaching some of his friends grammar and literature, and explaining the poets to them. He assures him, that this unlucky piece of news had given him so much trouble, that all the joy he had conceived upon hearing the success of his studies, and his great capacity, was changed into sorrow: Because, says he, the praises of Jupiter and of CHRIST cannot

The book which Dom Denys de Sainte Marthe (g) has published (b), intituled, The History of St Gregory the Great, was not come out, when I wrote this article. I have just now perused that history; and I should take it for a continual panegyric on this great Pope, if the author had not frequently interrupted his praises by many observations, wherein he explains things, illustrates matters of fact, or confutes some other writers. In his preface, he gives a catalogue of those, who have writ the life of St Gregory, in which he censures some faults of the minister Peter du Moulin, besides that, which we have seen in the remark [C]. He does not seem well pleased with Maimbourg [P]. He confutes cardinal Baronius as to what concerns St Gregory's having been a monk, and he opposes some notions of Mr Goussainville (i). What he observes against the centuriators of Magdeburg, is intermixed with false criticisms; we shall see it below [Q]. I do not find, that he blames Pope Gregory for any thing; he acts the

'be in the same mouth: consider what an unworthy and abominable thing it is for a bishop to sing such verses, as a devout and religious layman could not repeat with decency, and without doing injury to his profession. He adds, that tho' he has been informed from other hands, that it was not so, yet he cannot but lay it much to heart, and that he will make a more exact enquiry into the truth of it, because it is a horrid, and even execrable thing, to hear such a report of a priest and a bishop. But †† if, says he, at last, to comfort him, I can be fully satisfied that this report against you is false, and that you do not amuse your self with these fooleries of human learning, and worldly sciences, I shall give thanks to GOD for not suffering your heart to be defiled with the praises full of blasphemies, which those profane authors bestow on the most wicked men (64). Maimbourg did not fail to reflect upon himself after this narrative. See his words in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for September 1686, pag. 1034, and in Mr Seckendorf, pag. 4. of the first book of the History of Lutheranism.

[N]... And particularly Livy.] Antonius, archbishop of Florence, is the most ancient author cited for this by Volius. It is said, that Livy was thus treated, because he insinuates too much on the superstitious rites of the heathens. At mirificus zelus fuit S. Gregorii, qui ut S. Antonius, & ex eo Jo. Hesselius, ex utroque Raderus ad Martialem tradit, Livium propterea combussit, quod in superstitionibus & sacris Romanorum perpetuo veretur (65).

[O] I had almost forgot this pope's zeal for the psalmody of the church. (66) He especially applied himself to regulate the office, and the singing of the church: to which end he composed his Antiphony . . . (67). Nothing can be more admirable than what he did on this occasion. Though he had upon his hands all the affairs of the universal church, and was still more burthened with distempers, than with that multitude of business, which he was necessarily to take care of, in all parts of the world; yet he took time to examine with what tunes the psalms, hymns, orations, verses, responses, canticles, lessons, epistles, the gospel, the prefaces, and the Lord's prayer, were to be sung; what were the tones, measures, notes, moods, most suitable to the majesty of the church, and most proper to inspire devotion: and he formed that ecclesiastical music so grave and edifying, which at present is called the Gregorian music. He moreover instituted an academy of singers ††, for all the clerks to the deaconship exclusively, because the deacons were only to be employed in preaching the gospel, and distributing the alms of the church to the poor; and he would have the singers to perfect themselves in the art of true singing, according to the notes of his music, and to bring their voices to sing sweetly and devoutly, which, according to St Isidore *, is not to be obtained but by fasting and abstinence. For, says he, the ancients fasted the day before they were to sing, and lived, for their ordinary diet, upon pulse, to make their voice clearer and finer; whence it is that the Heathens called those singers, bean-eaters. I question whether, at present, the singers would willingly submit to that method, to which they are not used. However, St Gregory took care to instruct them himself, as much a Pope as he was, and to teach them to sing well. Joannes † Diaconus says, that, in his time, this Pope's bed was preserved with great veneration in the palace of St John of Lateran, in which he sung, tho' sick, to teach the fingers; as also the whip, wherewith he threatened the young clerks and the singing boys, when they were out, and failed in the notes. Here I must make an observation, against those, who cite authors without examining circumstances. The Walloon minister, who published a large book concerning the Divine Melody of the Holy Psalms, in the year 1644, did not trouble his head whether things were changed, or not, since Joannes Diaconus, who writ the history of St Gregory. Joannes Diaconus lived in the IXth century. He says, that the whip was still preserved, wherewith this Pope threatened the music scholars. But it does not follow, that we may use the present tense as he does, in relating this particular, and therefore the Walloon minister justly deserves censure. His words are these (68): Gregory the Great, before cited, instituted a school of singers, and built them colleges, with a suitable revenue. His bed is still shewn at Rome, to this day, upon which he lay and sung, and the whip, wherewith he corrected his disciples, and the authentic antiphony. Nauci. 94.

[P] Denys de Ste Marthe does not seem well pleased with Maimbourg. He says, that the History of St Gregory's Pontificate, published by this author, does not comprehend the whole life of that saint (69). He adds, that Mr Maimbourg mentions only some passages of his pontificate, which suited with his designs and views, neglecting all the rest, which nevertheless deserves to be known. I know, says he, in another place (70), that a famous writer, who has published the history of St Gregory's pontificate, and pretends to great impartiality, has blamed him for being so warm in a trifling matter. And yet I doubt not, but that, if St Gregory, or any other Pope, had pretended to style himself oecumenical patriarch; and if John, patriarch of Constantinople, or any other bishop, had opposed him in it, the same writer would have censured the Pope for it, as being an intolerable presumption and usurpation, and praised the generosity of the patriarch, of the bishop, and, in general, of any one, who would have opposed him: so dangerous it is to write a history with a prepossessed mind, which makes a writer as eager to intermix his opinions with the things he relates, as to relate those things with a perfect sincerity. This gives an ill idea of Maimbourg's probity.

[Q] What he observes against the centuriators of Magdeburg is intermixed with false criticism. Every body knows, that there is a great dispute betwixt the Protestants and the Roman Catholics, concerning the vows of celibacy; and one of the arguments alleged by the Protestants, is, that these vows are attended with many disorders, and works of darkness (71), unfruitful if you please in the gospel-sense, but most fruitful in another sense, since they give life to a vast number of human creatures. It is true, there are fruits that are not suffered to ripen: they are stifled as much as possible before their birth; which is done to conceal the first crime, but not without a second sin still more enormous than the first. This is what is said by the controversialists; and they add, that the discovery of these disorders has sometimes occasioned the revocation of the severe law of celibacy. Here follows the part of an apologist every where, in the praises bestowed upon Phocas and queen Brunehauld,

cap. vii.

follows a long passage of Denys de Ste Marthe. I will not undertake to confute a story, mentioned by the centuriators of Magdebourg, which destroys itself. They pretend, that St Gregory the Great, having made a decree to separate priests from their wives, was obliged to revoke it, because of the ensuing consequences. A little after this regulation, (say they) the Pope having sent some people to fish in a pond that belonged to him, instead of fish, they drew out six thousand beads of little children. Gregory therefore, knowing that these children were the fruits of the priests' incontinence, whom he had deprived of their wives, revoked his decree, and did penance for the sin he had committed in occasioning so many crimes. They add, that St Udalric, archbishop of Augsbourg, writ this to Pope Nicolas. This whole story is a confused heap of silly fables. For what reason did they chuse the Pope's fish-pond, rather than the Tiber, or other public places, to throw those six thousand beads of children in? What became of their bodies, which are not mentioned? Is it credible, that those, who killed them, and whose interest it was to conceal them, would have cut off their heads, and carried them within the precincts of the Pope's palace, to have their crimes quickly discovered? Were they not afraid they would float upon the water? How were they all agreed to carry those beads to the same place? For it is not said that any were found elsewhere (72). These are difficulties, which Baronius and Bellarmine do not offer in confuting this story of the Magdebourg centuriators. I know not whether they may have been invented by Denys de Sainte Marthe: he will give me leave to tell him, that if they may seem specious to those, who go no farther than the first impressions, they will appear destitute of solidity to those, who examine things attentively. It will be granted me, that, in matters of fact, those, who undertake to confute an adversary, ought to raise objections contrary to his design. Now let us see whether the objections of Father de Sainte Marthe are such. I think they would be solid, if Udalric, and those, who alledge his letter, pretended, that the murderers of those bastards cut off their heads, and threw them only into the Pope's pond. This assertion would be liable to the inconveniencies mentioned by the author; and it were a most difficult thing to alledge any probable reason against his several questions. But this was not the meaning of the centuriators, who only designed to relate what had been discovered in St Gregory's pond: and, if they said nothing of the Tyber, or other public places, it is not because they did not believe, that any bastards of the clergy had been thrown into them, but because they knew not, that the same crimes had been likewise discovered in those places, or because they were contented with the consequences, that might be drawn from what had been seen in the pond. They supposed it was an easy thing to draw this inference: six thousand children have been found in the Pope's Pond only; therefore the number of the children, who have been stifled, to prevent the infamy of their fathers and mothers, is almost infinite: for how many have been thrown into the Tyber, and into wells, and common shores? How many have been buried, &c? When a man says, that many medals or bones have been found in digging up the foundations of a palace, does he pretend, that it is the only place, where such things might be found? and because he says nothing of the other places, may one deny what he affirms? It is to be observed, that there was a particular reason to mention that pond, rather than the Tyber, &c. Rivers do not use to be drained, but ponds are drained from time to time, in order to take all the fish out of them; and then one may know whether any children have been thrown into them. To know the number of them, it is sufficient to count the heads, which are single parts of a child, and may be easily distinguished: which is the reason, why it was sufficient to mention the heads, in Udalric's epistle. Father de Sainte Marthe ought not to think it strange, that no mention should be made of the bodies. If commissioners had been appointed to inspect the pond, they might be blamed, if their verbal process did not contain more circumstances than Udalric's letter. It had been their duty to observe, whether any bones had been found, besides the heads; whether all the bodies were* without flesh: whether some were only half rotten, or half eaten, by the fish, and such like particulars: but an author, who alleges this discovery as an argument against the law of celibacy, need not insist upon so many circumstances; it is enough for him to say, in general, that six thousand heads were found. If what Father de Sainte Marthe affirms concerning the situation of that pond was true, it would be a considerable objection: but who told him, that this pond was in the inclosure of the palace? Would Baronius have omitted this reason, if it had been well-grounded? Would he have said only, that fish-ponds were not public, and that they were strictly looked after (73)? This is but a weak reason; for centinels are not placed in the night about a pond: care is only taken, that no fisherman may get into it without the owner's leave; but this will not prevent the throwing of a child into it.

Perhaps many controversies, engaged in the defence of the centuriators against Father de Sainte Marthe, would perhaps be contented with this apology. I know some, who would look no farther, and who, in a most insulting manner, would boast of having obtained a compleat victory over the monk, who undertook to confute this passage of those German authors. As for me, who think it an honour not to imitate (74) a conduct so contrary to sincerity, I declare, that Denys de Sainte Marthe has alledged some other arguments incomparably more solid than those, which I have refuted: for he adds (75), but how can they have the impudence to say, that St Gregory grew remiss, in process of time, as to the continence of priests? Did ever any Pope express a greater zeal for the observation of it? One may know what he thought of the matter, by the answer he made to St Augustin, who proposed several difficulties to him: for, when he answers the second article, he excludes, in express words, the clerks, promoted to sacred orders, from the number of those, who are allowed to marry. The better to confound the heretical writers, who give credit to this fabulous story, I have already shewn, that Pope Nicolas I was dead before St Udalric was born, and that this holy man had been dead a long time before Nicolas II was made Pope. Here are two good arguments against the centuriators: Baronius (76) and Bellarmine (77) made use of them with great advantage. The benedictin should have been contented with them; for mixing false reasons with good ones is the right way of multiplying replies and rejoinders in infinitum: an adversary, who meets with false proofs in his way, may easily keep up a dispute; and many persons of his party, who never read the works of the contrary party, will think that he has got a compleat victory. Which is the reason why things are never cleared with respect to many people, and why many others consider as matters problematical, such facts as most deserve to be rejected. It seems to me, that the story mentioned by the centuriators, and their Udalric, is altogether groundless; for, on the one side, there is no footsteps to be found, any where else, of the law of celibacy being revoked by St Gregory, and of his doing penance for it; and, on the other, it plainly appears from the writings of that Pope, that he never permitted priests to marry. His whole remissness consisted in not requiring that the sub-deacons, who had been ordained before the decretal (78) of his predecessor, should be obliged to part with their wives; but he forbade their being promoted to superior orders; and commanded, that the bishops should ordain no new sub-deacons till they had made them promise to live in celibacy (79). Therefore unless it be clearly made out, that St Gregory revoked the law of celibacy and did penance for it, and moreover if it be not clearly proved that there was an Udalric, bishop of Augsbourg, cotemporary with a Pope called Nicolas, those, who alledge the letter of one Udalric, and the six thousand heads found in St Gregory's fish pond, will never deserve any credit.

I shall make two or three observations more. I. The centuriators do not give a good turn to this story. These are their words: Beatus Gregorius Magnus Papa primus aliquando suo quodam decreto uxores sacerdotibus ademit. Deinde paulo post cum idem Gregorius jussisset ex piscina sua pisces aliquot capi, piscatores pro piscibus sex millia capitum infantium suffocatorum repererunt.

Brunchauld, the many fabulous miracles related by that Pope in his dialogues [R], and his unfettered principles about perfection for religion, &c. If it were true, that part of this Pope's books was burnt after his death, and that they would have repererunt. Quam eadem infantium cum intelligeret S. Gregorius ex oculis fornicationibus vel adulteriis sacerdotum natam esse; continuo revocavit decretum, & peccatum suum dignis penitentia fructibus purgavit (80). They suppose, that Pope Gregory made a decree against the marriage of priests, and that, not long after, he ordered some fish to be taken out of his pond, but that the fishermen found in it six thousand heads of children, instead of fish; whereupon the pontiff revoked his decree, and amended his fault by fruits worthy of repentance, being sensible that the murder of so many children proceeded from the priests incontinency. I repeat it again, this narrative is ill turned. It is supposed, that six thousand children were thrown into the Pope's pond in a very little time, and that the fishermen, who found the six thousand heads of those poor creatures, took no fish. This account is very absurd: so great number of children, drowned in the same place, requires many years (81), and would rather increase fish, than wholly destroy them. This story would look more probable, if it had been said, that St Gregory abrogated celibacy, which had been established a long time; and that he permitted the clergy to marry, because, having ordered his pond to be cleared, which had not been cleared for many years, six thousand heads of children were found in it. This account affords as many years as one can desire. I conclude, (which is my second observation) that the ill placing of circumstances (82) makes a matter of fact doubtful, unlikely, ridiculous, and absurd, tho' it be never so certain and true in itself; for, supposing it to be true, that six thousand heads of children were found in that place, Udalric, and the centurions, relate the thing so carelessly, as to make one doubt of it. I observe in the third place, that Theophilus Raynaud supposes, in a passage quoted by me in another place (83), that the heads were found in the well of Pope Gregory II; so that he mistakes both the place and the Pope. Bellarmine asks (84) how it came to be known, that the six thousand children were bastards of the clergy, and not of laymen; which is indeed an objection, but no perplexing difficulty. For, tho' Pope Gregory might think, that laymen had a share in the procreation of those children, he would have been sensible, that celibacy imposed upon the clergy occasioned a greater debauchery. It is certain, that lay-people destroy abundance of children to conceal their fault (85). Take notice, that Udalric, bishop of Augsburg, lived in the Xth century, and that the letter in question was printed in the book, intitled, Orthodoxologia Sanctorum Patrum, at Basil, in the XVIth century.

[R] The many fabulous miracles related by this Pope in his dialogues. 'Some learned men, who do not approve the recital of so many miracles, doubt whether St Gregory is the author of those dialogues, because they do not appear to them worthy of so great a doctor (86).' Denys de Sainte Marthe, who speaks thus, solves the doubts of those learned men with very solid reasons, and shews that those dialogues are the works of St Gregory. Mr du Pin is of the same opinion (87); but he owns at the same time, that they do not seem to be worthy of the gravity and judgment of that holy Pope, being full of extraordinary Miracles, and almost incredible stories. It is true, he relates them upon the credit of others; but he should not have been so credulous as to believe them, and afterwards to publish them as matters of fact. . . . The stories mentioned in those dialogues, are frequently grounded upon a bare relation of some ignorant old men, or upon common reports. The miracles, are so frequent, so extraordinary, and often wrought for so inconsiderable reasons, that it is a difficult thing to believe them all. He tells some stories which can hardly be reconciled with the lives of those he speaks of; as the voluntary imprisonment of St Paulinus in Africa, under the king of the Vandals. Vi- sions, apparitions, and dreams, are more frequently met with in the dialogues of that Pope, than are in any other author. Hence it is, that he owns that Pope; but one may easily guess, that he does about the latter end of his work, that more discoveries had been made in his time about the other world, than in all the foregoing ages. But I do not think that any body will warrant the truth of all those relations. Father Denys de Sainte Marthe acknowledges (88), 'that he would not warrant all the mi- racles and visions contained in those dialogues.' Nevertheless he does not blame that Pope. That holy man, says he, might relate some upon the testimony of persons a little too credulous. He thought they were not to be slighted by reason of the edifying things he observed in them. The prudent reader ought to examine what degree of certainty he allows them, and who are his authors. This monk plainly sets up for an apologist, who thinks, that St Gregory is not in the least to be blamed. But the work is, that the reasons he alleges to prove it are not solid; for if one may be allowed to publish a relation, because it contains some things that are edifying, how many fables may not one give out as true and pious histories? tho' a writer does not say in express words, this is matter of fact, no body ought to doubt of it; yet if he does not quote cotemporary and grave authors, but only an ancient tradition, he cannot be justified, and does not afford a sufficient preservative. He ought expressly and formally to say, I relate this as a thing doubtful, you are free to believe it or not, I have not a good authority for it: I say, he ought to express himself thus, that one may be sure he is not persuaded of the truth of what he says, and does not eagerly de- sire, that others should believe it. Any one, who relates a miraculous event, without intimating any thing, whereby it may appear that he doubts, or is willing others should doubt of it, does plainly shew, that he mentions it as matter of fact. It were in vain to say, that an historian is not allowed to sup- press whatever seems to him to be false, and that it is his duty to mention those which are well attested, tho' he does not believe them to be true; I say, such an objection would be insignificant, for it is no confusion of what I have laid down. What I assert concerns an historian, who does not intimate in the least, that he doubts of what he relates, or that he allows every body to disbelieve it. A good historian who mentions a thing, which he takes to be false, adds to it, it is said, or some other clause, which shews more clearly still what he thinks of it (89); (89) Equidem et therefore when he adds no such thing, it is a plura transcribo quam creco: nam nec adfirmare sustineo de quibus dubito, nec subducere que accepit. — In- them, and, if any one should tell them, that he does not believe them, they would take it as an affront, more than I be- and a piece of contempt. Now if these maxims are true, with respect to the writers of history, they are much more so with respect to a divine, who relates miraculous events in a moral book, or in a treatise of devotion, or, in general, in such a work of that Q. Curlius lib. of St Gregory. It ought to be supposed, not only ix, cap. i. See hereupon Fien- stromius's commen- tary, where you will find many such passages out of other historians. See also Tacitus's Annals, lib. iv, cap. xi, and the Maimbourg, liv. v, of the Histoire des Croisades, quoted in the Penfies Cometes, pag. 202. La Milla le Poyr, Dic- tionnaire sur l'Histoire, mentions several passages of Livy, whereby it ap- pears, that he is cautious in relating prodigies.

have been all destroyed, had it not been for an incident [S] much the same with that, which, in former times, prevented the Romans putting to death the senators, as having murdered Romulus (l), some persons would infer from it, that the glory of that Pope, and of some other ancient fathers, is like rivers, which, being very small at their spring, grow very large at a great distance from it. Something might be said against this comparison; but it is certain, generally speaking, that the objects of memory are of a very different nature from the objects of sight. The latter lessens in proportion to their distance, whereas the former do commonly increase, according as we are remote from their time and place (m).

not believe it. He very much enlarges, to shew, that the extraordinary things, related in those dialogues, were very frequent at that time. One of his reasons for it is, that there were many heretics to be converted, and many Catholics, who did not believe the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the dead (90). It is an undeniable matter of fact, that, in St Gregory's time, many christians wavered in the belief of those two fundamental doctrines of our religion. He † is so humble as to confess, that he himself had formerly doubted of the resurrection: and therefore he makes it his business, in many of his homilies, to inculcate those truths into them. As there have been, at all times, many libertines, even within the pale of the Catholic church, there have always been many people whose interest it was, that there should be no future life, no resurrection and judgment, and therefore they easily believed it; for a corrupt heart will soon be attended with an erroneous mind. However it be, it is certain, that Italy, and particularly Rome, was full of such unbelievers in St Gregory's time. It were needless to prove it, after what has been said upon this subject by the last translator of dialogues, in his excellent preface. Gregory of Tours † mentions a dispute he had with one of the priests of his church, who maintained, that there was no resurrection to be expected. He also speaks of a deacon of the church of Paris, who pretended to be a man of great parts, and who fell into that error, disputing about it with great eagerness: from whence it may be inferred, that many others in France were engaged in that dangerous hereby. If any one reads the dialogues, he will find, that Peter, the deacon, knew many christians, who doubted of the immortality of the soul †. Was it not therefore becoming the mercy of God, that he should work miracles at that time, to help the weakness of those poor infidels? and is St Gregory to blame because he collected them? I shall only make two short observations upon this: One is, that, if those unbelieving Catholics questioned only whether the soul was immortal, and whether the bodies should be raised out of their graves, they argued very pitifully; for the truth of the gospel being once admitted, it is a ridiculous thing to raise any doubts about those two points. The other is, that perhaps there never were so many unbelievers, as in the XVIth and XVIIth centuries; I mean such unbelievers, as are not contented to reject the building, without destroying the foundation, but who reject both the foundation and the building. Besides, there were in those two centuries a great many heretics (9), who wanted to be converted. Miracles should therefore at least have been as frequent in these ages, as in that of St Gregory. From whence we may conclude, that the argument of Father Denys de Sainte Marthe proves nothing, because it proves too much.

[S] If it be true that part of that Pope's books was burnt . . . and that they would have been all destroyed, had it not been for an incident.] Joannes Diaconus, in the 69th chapter of the fourth book of St Gregory's life, says (92), that Italy was afflicted with a horrid famine the same year that Pope died. The poor, who had been partakers of the liberties of that common father of the faithful, not receiving the same assistance from Sabinian, his successor, because it was said, Gregory had consumed the wealth of the church by his prodigality, some persons were so passionate as to discharge their fury upon the works of that holy doctor, not being able to do it upon him, and burnt a great part of them.

But as they were ready to burn the rest, Peter the deacon, a disciple of that holy man, represented to them, that it was to no purpose to throw those books into the fire, in order to eclipse the memory of that Pope, whom they hated, because they had been already dispersed all over the world. He added, that it was a sacrilege to treat so unworthily the writings of that holy father, over whose head he had often seen a dove, representing the Holy Ghost, and familiarly conversing with him. Peter, in order to confirm the truth of what he said, went up to the lobby, holding the gospel in his hand; upon which he swore, that what he had been saying was true; adding, that he had begged of God to make him die on the spot, if he had spoken the truth. The thing happened according to his wishes; for he expired at that very moment without any pain, and was buried under the lobby, where this surprising thing came to pass. The author, who furnishes me with this passage, cannot believe, that any one would have steered such a rage against the works of such a bishop of Rome; and he observes, that cardinal Baronius rejects this story as a mere fable, grounded only upon a false tradition, because no author more ancient than Joannes Diaconus makes mention of it (93). Theophilus Raynaud opposes this opinion of Baronius in the following manner. He observes, in the first place, that the silence of Paterius, Isidorus, and Ildephonsus, is a negative argument, and that the strength of such arguments is insufficient, and weak, as every body acknowledges (94). In the second place, that the authority of Siebert, alleged by Baronius, cannot serve for a proof against Joannes Diaconus. That cardinal says, that Siebert positively denies, that any work of St Gregory was destroyed on such an occasion, all of them having been preserved at the request of Peter the deacon. The Jesuit Raynaud affirms, that Siebert says the quite contrary, in the 41st and 43d chapters of his book De Viris illustribus. He observes in the third place, that St Gregory had written some books, of which nothing remains. 'Præsertim cum idem Joannes sequenti capite 70. ex ipsismet Sancti Gregorii Epist. ad Joannem Ravennæ Subdiaconum, demonstrat, plerisque libros à Sancto Gregorio fuisse conscriptos, quorum nullibi extant vestigia; ut expositionis in Proverbia, & in Prophetas, & in libros Regum, neque enim pauca quæ habemus in 1. Regum, & Ezechielem, mensuram implent titulorum illorum (95). — Especially since the same John in the seventieth chapter which follows, demonstrates, from the letter of the same St Gregory to John sub-deacon of Ravenna, that Gregory wrote many books, of which there remain no traces; as, an Exposition on the Proverbs, the prophets, and the books of Kings; nor do the few we have left, on Kings 1. and Ezechiel, come up to the title of them.' He makes use, in the fourth place, of an argument ad hominem, grounded upon Baronius's confessing, that the writings of that great Pope run a great hazard; and that the mutineers not being able to vent their fury upon Gregory, who was dead, discharged it upon his books in the middle of the great place of Rome. It is certain, that Baronius, by owning such a thing, destroys his own assertion: for, then, what does it signify to say, no book of Gregory's was burnt? have we not a strong proof of the contempt or hatred of the Romans against that pontiff, since they resolved to burn his books publicly, which they were so obstinately bent upon, that nothing but a great miracle could prevent it (96).

GREGORY VII, called Hildebrand before he was raised to the papal see. Of all the Popes, who went about to increase the pontifical power, none has been so bold and successful in it as he (a). He was without doubt a wicked man; but it cannot be denied that he had the qualities of a great man [A], as well as some conquerors, who are otherwise guilty of many crimes [B]. He was born at Soana, a small town of Tuscany, and rendered himself so considerable in the monastery of Clugny, that he was made prior of it. He negotiated several affairs with, and for the Popes, and was at last raised to the pontificate in the year 1073. He resolved, without any loss of time, to deprive the emperors of their right of giving the investiture to the bishops; but, being afraid of meeting at first with unsurmountable obstacles, if it could be objected to him, that he had acted as a Pope, before his election had been approved by the emperor (b), he wrote to that prince in very submissive terms, and declared to him, that he would not be consecrated nor crowned, till he knew his will about it. The German bishops advised the emperor to disapprove that election; but the only thing they could obtain was, that he would get himself informed of the manner how it was made; and he approved of it, as soon as he heard the good answers his envoy received from Hildebrand. He had quickly occasion to repent of it; for the new Pope, in the first council he held at Rome, renewed the ancient decrees against Simonists, and such ecclesiastics as kept concubines [C]; and made a new one, whereby he declared both those to be excommunicated, who should receive the investiture of any benefice from a layman, and those who should give it. He excepted no body: Hence it was, that his legates declared to the emperor, who went to meet them as far as Nuremberg, that they had express orders to treat him as an excommunicated person, and not to confer with him, till he had received from them the absolution of the excommunication he had incurred for the crime of simony, of which he had been accused to the late Pope (c). He did what they desired of him; he received the absolution, and wrote to Gregory, that he would be always very submissive

[A] It cannot be denied, that he had the qualities of a great man. A modern author gives us the following character of him. 'He was a man of small stature, but he had a very great soul, a quick and penetrating wit, an undaunted courage, and never gave over his enterprises, whatever difficulty he met with in the execution of them. He was fiery, impatient, hasty, bold, and daring, too forward in the execution of his designs, and carrying things to the last extremities, without being afraid of the ill consequences that might attend his vigorous, but too violent, resolutions. He was, otherwise, a man of an unblameable life, notwithstanding all the calumnies of his enemies. He gave first the example of what he required from others; and was very learned, especially in the divine sciences; the laws, and the rules and customs of the church, as the historians, and even the Germans, who have no reason to favour him, acknowledge. Lastly, if his fiery and inflexible humour could have permitted him to temper his zeal with the noble moderation of his five predecessors . . . it is certain, that he would have prevented many evils, and the shedding of a great deal of christian blood, and the historians would have bestowed none but great encomiums upon him (1).' If you consider well the following words of Naudé you will find in them the idea of a great man. He was one of the greatest pillars of the church, and, to speak of him sincerely and impartially, he was the first, who put her in possession of her franchises, and who freed the sovereign pontiff from the slavery of the emperors (2). Some may say, that purchasing liberty, shaking off the yoke, making one's self independant, and subduing one's own masters, are wicked actions; but they cannot say, that such things can be performed without noble endowments, and a great courage.

[B] . . . as well as some conquerors, who are, otherwise, guilty of a great many crimes. I am the more willing to use this comparison, because I am persuaded, that the conquest of the church was a work, that required no less courage and ability, than the conquest of an empire. The power the Popes have attained to is more to be wondered at, than the vast monarchy of ancient Rome; so that it may be said, that this great city was to be, in two different manners (3), the spring of the most sublime qualities, that are requisite for the foundation of a very great state. If this does not prove, that the Romans equalled other nations in moral virtues, it proves at least, that they had more courage and industry. It is an amazing thing, that a church, which pretends to have no arms but the spiritual ones of the word of God, and which grounds her rights only upon the gospel, that teaches every where humility and poverty, should have been so bold as to aspire to an absolute dominion over all the kings of the earth; but it is still more amazing, that she should have been so successful in such a chimerical design. If ancient Rome, which pretended only to conquests and military virtue (4), subdued so many nations, it is a noble and glorious thing in the eyes of the world; but any one, who reflects upon it, will not wonder at it. It is a much more surprising thing to see new Rome, pretending only to an apostolical ministry, arrive to so great a power, that the greatest monarchs have been forced to submit to it; for it may be said, that there is hardly an emperor, who opposed the Popes, but found himself the worse for it at last. At this very day, the quarrels of the most potent princes with the court of Rome do generally end to their own confusion. We have so fresh instances of it (5) that I need not mention them. In the eyes of the world, such a conquest is a more glorious work than those of the Alexanders and Cæsars; and therefore Gregory VII, who was the chief promoter of it, ought to be placed among the great conquerors, who had the most eminent qualities. You will see in the remark [S] my answer to an objection, published against what I say here.

[C] He renewed the ancient decrees against simonists, and such ecclesiastics as kept concubines. No Pope had ever been so severe as our Hildebrand against the priests, who did not observe celibacy; and therefore he was very much hated. Here are the words of Lambertus Schaffnabergensis: 'Pope Hildebrand, having called several synods of the bishops of Italy, ordered, that, according to the ancient canons, priests should have no wives, and those, who had, should part with them, or be deposed, admitting none into the priesthood, but such as should promise to live in perpetual continency. This decree being published all over Italy, he wrote to the bishops of Gaul, enjoining them to do the same in their churches, and that the priests should leave their wives, upon pain of excommunication. The whole faction of the clergy rose up immediately against that decree, saying, that it was heretical, and contained senseless doctrine, contrary to the word of God, which says, all men cannot receive this saying; he that is able to receive it, let him receive it; and likewise contrary to the apostle, who commands, that those, who cannot contain themselves, should marry, it being better to marry than to burn. They farther added, that this man, by a violent exaction, would have men to live like angels, and would occasion all manner of filthiness, by stopping the course of nature. These factious priests submissive to him. Nevertheless he did not permit the legates to call a council; and he kept with him those ministers of his, who had been excommunicated by the Pope. For which reasons, and several others, the Pope summoned him to appear at the next Synod of Rome; in default of which, he threatened to excommunicate him. The emperor slighted his threatenings, and offered all sorts of indignities to the legates, who had been so bold as to threaten him; and he convoked a council at Worms, wherein cardinal le Blanc set up for an informer against Gregory. He charged him with so many crimes [D], that the assembly declared the election of that Pope to be void, and wrote to him letters full of injurious words, to acquaint him with their determination. Those, who presented the letters, did it with great brutality; and yet that Pontiff, who, notwithstanding his hasty and fiery temper, had a great command of himself, took them unconcernedly, and without saying any thing (d): But, the very next day, having imparted them to his synod, he pronounced (e) in a solemn manner an anathema against the emperor [E], and declared I know not how many prelates of Germany and Lombardy excommunicated. The latter were so little concerned at it, that they quickly assembled at Pavia, and excommunicated him. As he had foreseen, that his conduct would draw upon him very potent enemies, he omitted nothing to strengthen his party; and, in the first place, he brought over three princesses to his interest [F]; one of which, called Mathilda, adhered to him in such a manner as was much talked of [G]. Besides, he excited the Saxons priests concluded, that, if he obstinately persisted in his resolution, they had rather renounce the priesthood, than forsake their wives; and he might then see where he could find angels to govern the churches, since he would not make use of men (6). Coëf-feteau adds, according to the testimony of Marianus Scotus, that many clergymen chose rather to be excommunicated by the Pope, than to part with their wives; but the Pope ordered, in a synod, that no Christian should bear the mafs of a married priest (7).

I shall observe a thing, which seems to deserve attention. viz. That the Popes have found it incomparably more difficult to bring the clergy of the northern countries under the law of celibacy, than those of the southern. When those of Italy and Spain had been for a long time subjected to that yoke, those of Germany, and other cold countries, held out still, and disputed the ground for marriage, tantum pro aris & focis: nay, I do not know but it may be said, that, in Luther's time, the concubinage of priests was more apparent and scandalous in Germany than in Italy. It ought not to be inferred from thence, that the inhabitants of the southern countries are more chaste: on the contrary it seems, that the northern priests chose rather to keep to certain concubines, than to disguise their incontinence by a vague leudness. They acted therefore with greater fairness, and perhaps they believed it was a less crime.

[D] Cardinal le Blanc charged him with so many crimes. In order to know his accusations, we need only read the sentence pronounced against the Pope by the assembly of Worms. I shall set it down as I find it in du Pleffis Mornai (8). 'Hildebrand, who calls himself Gregory, is the first, who, without our consent, against the will of the Roman emperor, appointed by God, and against the custom of our ancestors, and contrary to the laws, has invaded the papal see by his ambition, which he has made known for a long time. He will do any thing that comes into his head, per fas nefasque, whether it be lawful or unlawful. He is an apostate monk, who corrupts the holy theology by a new doctrine, adapts the holy scripture to his affairs by false and strained interpretations, disturbs the peace of the college, pollutes sacred things, and lends an ear to the devils, and to the slanders of the wicked, being at the same time a witness, a judge, and an accuser. He parts husbands from their wives, and prefers whores to honest women, fornication, incest, and adultery, to a chaste marriage. He sets the people against the priests, and the mob against the bishops; and would make every body believe, that none is rightly ordained, unless he begs the priesthood of him, or buys it, ab ejus Auribus, of his blood-suckers. He deceives, imposes upon, and bubbles the vulgar by a mere shew of religion. He handles the holy mysteries of religion, in senatulo muliercularum, among silly women: he dissolves the law of God, and encroaches upon the papacy and the empire. He is guilty of high treason divine and humane, desiring to deprive a sacred emperor and a good prince of his life and states. For these reasons, the emperor, the bishops, the senate, and christian people, declare him to be deposed, and will no longer leave CHRIST'S flock to the keeping of such a wolf.'

[E] He pronounced an anathema against the emperor. And, what had never been done yet by any Pope, he deprived him of the imperial dignity, and of his kingdoms of Germany and Italy; declared all his subjects absolved, by the pontifical authority, from the oath of fidelity they had taken to him; and wrote afterwards circular letters to all the bishops and princes of Germany, whereby he permitted them, in case Henry should obstinately persist in his revolt against the holy see, to proceed, by the same authority, to the election of another king, who might receive the imperial crown, and govern the empire justly, and according to the laws (9).

[F] He brought over three princesses to his interest. Viz. The empress Agnes his mother (10), the duchess Beatrix his aunt, and the countess Mathilda his cousin german. As for the empress, she might be of great use to him by her intreaties and remonstrances. And indeed she took a journey into Germany, with the legates that Gregory sent thither the first time; and the emperor promised to grant all the requests she made in the Pope's name, but performed nothing. The countesses Beatrix and Mathilda being very powerful in Italy, where they had vast estates, were able to assist him more effectually than the empress Agnes by her remonstrances, which Henry made no great account of. These two princesses, who were very devout, had a great opinion of Gregory's virtue, who was looked upon as a holy man, and very austere; nay, he was said to have revelations and extasies, with the gift of prophecy and miracles, which are powerful motives to make one a ghostly father. Afterwards they resolved to be entirely governed by him; and he, on his part, answering the confidence they reposed in him, took a particular care to direct them by his letters in the way to virtue, and expressed a great affection for them, and a mutual confidence: so that, when this great rupture between the Pope and the emperor divided the empire into two parties, they did not in the least waver, but openly declared for Gregory, and resolved to assist him with all their power, especially the countess Mathilda (11). I use the words of this Jesuit on purpose, lest the readers should suspect that I design to impose upon them by artificial translations. It must be confessed, that this Pope was a very cunning man, and that, notwithstanding his fiery and violent temper, he knew very well how to make use of the most effectual devices: he made sure of the female sex, and pitched upon the ladies, who had the greatest power.

[G] Mathilda adhered to him in such a manner as was very much talked of. A Pope, though never so peaceable and well-beloved, could not have avoided the satirical strokes of ill tongues, had he been so intimate with a lady, as Hildebrand with Mathilda. You may therefore judge, whether a Pope, so violent as he was, and who had many enemies, could avoid being defamed on account of the mutual affection between him and that countess. I shall set down another passage of a Jesuit, who cannot be suspected upon this occasion.

Saxons to a revolt; he made a league with the duke of Suabia (f); and dispersed several circular letters, which had a good effect; for he declared all those to be excommunicated, who should correspond with the emperor; he forbade all bishops to absolve him; and enjoined all princes to force him to submit to the holy see, or to proceed to the election of another emperor. What is very remarkable, is, that he durst maintain, that, in deposing him, he had only conformed to the practice of the court of Rome [H]. The league, that was formed in his favour in Germany, was so powerful, that, after a long deliberation, it was declared, that they ought to elect another king by the Pope's authority, who should give him the imperial crown (g). The emperor, notwithstanding his mean condescension to the confederate princes, could obtain but very hard conditions; which obliged him to go and beg the Pope's absolution; and, in order to obtain it, he was forced to submit to the most unheard-of indignities [I]. The countess Mathilda finding herself alone, and being absolute mistress of her states, because the duchess Beatrix, her mother, died much † about the same time that the death of Godfrey (12) came to be known, resolved to be directed by Gregory more than ever, made him intirely master of her mind, her conduct, and estate; and therefore, according to the usual custom of those devout women, who would think themselves undone if they were far from their directors, for whom they have sometimes too great a fondness, she did whatever she could not to lose the sight of him †. She constantly followed him, and did him a thousand services with an incredible affection. She only asked by his orders, which she executed with a wonderful exactness: and though she was the greatest princess of Italy, she preferred to that title that of his most humble servant, and dear daughter, looking upon him as her father and master, for whom she expressed a great deal of respect, zeal, and devotion: though perhaps she did it with less prudence and discretion than she should have done, if I may say so, without pretending to lessen the honour that is due to the memory of so illustrious a princess. For, in short, the partisans of the emperor, and the enemies of Gregory, especially the clergy of Germany, whom he absolutely resolved to deprive of their wives, whom they had impudently married against the most holy laws of the church, took occasion from thence to inveigh against him in a strange manner, to accuse him of too great a privacy with that countess †, and to tell many scandalous stories of him, and such as cannot be credited in the least, as being contrary to truth, and the known virtue of both. And therefore the German historian, who lived at that time, and who relates this, adds, that all judicious persons, and such as were not blinded and prejudiced by an unjust passion, were fully sensible, that they were mere impudent calumnies, which, like thin clouds, so vanished away by the apostolical life the Pope led in the sight of all the Roman court, that those, who knew him, did not entertain the least suspicion of him (13).

I am obliged in equity to mention, in this place, a complaint of Coëffeteau against du Pleffis Mornai. That monk was angry with du Pleffis, because he quoted only the first part of a passage of Lambertus Schaffnaburgensis: And therefore she cannot avoid being suspected of incestuous love, since the king's friends gave out every where, especially the clergy, whom he forbade to marry contrary to the canons, that he spent nights and days in her embraces, and that she, being extremely fond of that Pope, would not marry again after the death of her husband (14). Du Pleffis goes no farther; whereupon Coëffeteau makes the following complaint. But, reader, what will you say, if I shew you, that this author, this grave historian, as he calls him, confutes this impudent calumny in that very same place . . . How then can be so unfair and so bold as to alledge it to defame his life and domestic conversation (15)? This monk makes too great a noise for a small matter: I confess, that du Pleffis had not done amiss, to observe by the bye, that Lambertus Schaffnaburgensis confutes this; but, after all, his chief design being to tell what judgment was made of Pope Gregory, it is not very strange, that he should quote only the words of that historian, whereby it appears, that many scandalous stories were told of that Pope. Note, that he calls this Lambert, abbot of Hirtzaw. His adversary reproves him for it, and says, he was only a monk at Hirtzaw; but they are both mistaken; for he was a monk of Hirsfeld in the diocese of Mentz.

I shall conclude with a thought of Father Maimbourg. 'Though, says he (16), those reports were plainly false; yet, because men, through a malignity natural to them, are more inclined to give credit to ill reports than to good ones, especially with respect to those, who are in some reputation for their virtue, it produced an ill effect, and did Gregory some prejudice. From whence the directors of consciences ought to learn, that the shortest conversations they have with devout women are always the best; and that long and frequent discourses with them are always more dangerous, than useful, to those of their profession.'

[H] He durst maintain . . . that he had only conformed to the practice of the court of Rome.] This shews how little those are to be depended on, who boast of doing nothing but in imitation of the ancients: the greatest innovators have been so bold as to boast of such a thing. We have here a very remarkable instance of it, which I shall set down in the words of a Jesuit, lest any one should be apt to think, that I exaggerate things (17). 'I find also, that Heriman, bishop of Metz, having proposed to Gregory, in writing, his difficulties upon this subject, and asked, among other things, what answer was to be made to those, who maintained, that the Pope could not depose the king, nor dispense his subjects from their oath of fidelity, as he had done in the last synod at Rome; he answered him plainly, and without any hesitation , that he had done it very justly, according to the custom and practice of his predecessors, who had excommunicated kings and emperors, depriving them of their empire, and of their kingdoms. And yet Otho Frisingensis, a very learned and most holy bishop, and a man well affected to the Pope, and often commended by Baronius assures us, with great sincerity, that having been an exact †† reader of his stories, he had never found, that any Pope, before him, ever attempted such a thing (18).'

[I] He was forced to submit to the most unheard-of indignities.] He set out in the beginning of the winter, quemquam invenio ante hunc à Rotinno, and passed the Alps in the worst time of the year, being exposed to great inconveniences, which might raise compassion for a meer traveller, and much more for so great a prince, reduced to so miserable a condition Frising. Chron. lib. vi, cap. xxxv. (19). Nevertheless, his arrival in Italy gave some uneasiness to the Pope; and therefore Mathilda carried him to her castle of Canossa, that he might be safe whatever should happen (20). Many princes intreated him to absolve the emperor, but he continued a long time Select. Histor. Cap. Seculi xi & xii, Part. II, where he supposes, licitations of those princes, he told them at last, that he would absolve him, according to their desires; but upon was derived by condition, that, in order to make it appear to all the world that he truly repented of his revolt, he should first send him his crown, and all his other royal ornaments, to dispose of them at his pleasure; and that he should publicly confess, that, after what he had done, he was unworthy of being a king or an emperor. The princes threw themselves at the Pope's feet, beseeching him for God's sake to be contented with something more tolerable: and they obtained, with great difficulty, that he might come then, in GOD's name, if he had a mind to be absolved; but that, in order to obtain that favour, he must resolve to do whatever should be enjoined him for a penance (21). The emperor submitted to those terms (22). 'He went to the first gate of the castle, expecting with great submission what should be required of him. First, he was obliged to go in alone, and excommunicated friends were treated much in the same manner [K]. This made the Lombards less zealous for him; and he could not recover their esteem, but by expressing a great desire of revenging himself. The wars he had upon his hands in Germany, where Rodolphus duke of Suabia had been made king, prevented his attacking the Pope; but, having obtained great advantages over his rival, he shewed himself but little disposed to perform what Gregory required of him. Wherefore this Pope, in a council held at Rome in the year 1080, excommunicated and deposed him anew [L]. This last stroke brought things to the last extremities. The emperor called an assembly first at Mentz, and then at Brixen (b), wherein Gregory was declared to have forfeited the pontificate, and Guibert of Parma, archbishop of Ravenna, was elected in his room, and took the name of Clement III. This assembly, among other crimes, charged Hildebrand with magic [M]. The emperor, having gained two battles, one in Germany over Rodolphus, notwithstanding the Pope's prophecies [N]; the other, near to leave all his attendants without doors to wait for him, and go back with him at his coming out from thence; which was certainly a very nice point, and no sovereign prince but he would have submitted to it. For, in short, he delivered himself, as it were, bound hand and foot, into the hands of those, who might have absolutely disposed of him as they pleased, and kept him prisoner in a place that was thought to be impregnable, and out of which his attendants had never been able to rescue him. Besides, when he got out of the first inclosure, they stopped him in the second; where he was obliged to lay down all the ensigns of the royal majesty, to pull off his cloaths, and put on a woollen tunic, like a hair-cloth (23), and to stay there bare-footed in the coldest time of the winter; (for it was about the latter end of January), and fasting from morning till night, imploring with deep sighs God's and the Pope's mercy. And what is most strange, is, that this poor prince was forced to continue in this sad and pitiful condition three days together, whilst the Pope could not be moved with tears and intreaties to admit him sooner into his presence, in order to comfort him: and the thing went so far, that as he himself confessed, boasting of his extreme severity in his letter to the princes of Germany, all those, that were with him, murmured at it, being amazed at his hard-heartedness; nay, some made no scruple to say, that such a behaviour was more like the barbarous cruelty of a tyrant, than the just severity of an apostolic judge. They are the very words of Gregory, mentioned by cardinal Baronius. . . . (24). That prince was like to lose his patience, about the end of the third day of so severe a penance . . . when the countess Mathilda undertook this business with more earnestness than before: and then Pope Gregory, who could not deny any thing to so great a princess, to whom he was so much indebted, resolved at last to receive Henry on the fourth day in the morning, and to reconcile him to the church upon these terms: The he should submit to the judgment, which the Pope, in the time and place appointed for it, should give upon the accusations brought against him . . . and that, in the mean time, he should not exercise any act of sovereignty. I omit the other conditions, which were all very severe.

[K] His excommunicated friends were treated much in the same manner. He did not use much more gently the German bishops and others, both ecclesiastics and laymen, who came a little before to throw themselves at his feet, in order to be absolved from the excommunication, which they had incurred. For, before he absolved them, he caused each of them to be shut up in little cells, as in prisons, and made them fast a considerable time, against the custom of their country, where, by reason of the cold, fasting is with more difficulty observed than in Italy (25). Fasting is without doubt one of the greatest mortifications, that can be laid upon the northern nations, especially upon rich people, who are used from their younger years to feed well, and to make long meals, where, if they eat a great deal, they drink still more. If the Christian religion had been first planted in that country, I do not think they would have sent into the east the same canons about abstinence and vigils, which came from the east to the northern nations. See the complaints, which were made against cardinal Alamandus (26).

[L] He excommunicated and deposed the emperor anew. By this thundering decree, he deprived him of the empire, and of the kingdoms of Germany and Italy, absolved all his subjects from their oath of allegiance; and, what he would not do till then, confirms Rodolphus's election, to whom he sent a rich crown of gold, about which there was an inscription, contained in one verse, importing that CHRIST, who is the mystical stone, gave the diadem to Peter, and in the person of Gregory to Rodolphus. They are father Maimbourg's words (27). If it be true, that Gregory's father was a carpenter, we have here an instance, that men of the most lofty courage may be born among the dregs of the people. Can any body be more haughty than our Hildebrand was? did not he make it his business to humble kings, because, said he, they carried it too high, and he was resolved to bring down their pride by his severe usage. Imperatoribus & regibus, ceterisque principibus ut elationes maris, & superbia fluctus comprimere valeant, arma humilitatis, Deo auctore, providere curamus: proinde videtur utile, maxime Imperatoribus, ut cum mens illorum se ad alta erigere, & pro singulari vultu gloria oblectare, inveniat quibus se modis humiliter, atque unde gaudebat, sentiat plus timendum (28). — To humble the pride of kings and princes, we take care, by GOD's assistance, to provide the arms of humility: esteeming it useful to shew monarchs the way to humble themselves amidst their greatness, and discover to them the danger of the situation, they so much pride themselves in. Observe, that the Jesuit Maimbourg rejects what has been said of Gregory's father. These are his words. What is commonly said, that he was a carpenter's son, and that playing with shavings, when he was but a child, he accidentally formed some letters out of them, which were so disposed as to make this verse of the Psalmist, Dominabitur à mare usque ad mare; He shall rule from one sea to another; is a meer story (29).

[M] Among other crimes, they charged him with magic. This appears from the sentence pronounced against him. Du Plessis Mornai mentions it at large. And likewise, said he (30), in the year 1080, the bishops of Italy, Germany, and Gaul, met at Brixen in Bavaria (31), and condemned Hildebrand a second time as guilty of ambition, heresy, and sacrilege: 'Because, say they, he is a false monk, a magician, a diviner, an interpreter of dreams and prodigies, a despiser of the Christian religion, who has bought the pontificate, contrary to the custom of our forefathers, against the will of all good men, &c. A sworn enemy to the emperor and the empire, a corrupter of divine and human laws, teaching falsehood instead of truth, evil instead of good, &c. An instigator of all manner of wickedness, the abettor of a tyrant, a lover of discord between brethren, friends, and relations; occasioning divorces among married people; denying that priests, who have lawful wives, are true priests, and yet bringing fornicators, adulterers, incestuous people, &c. to the altars, &c. We, by the authority of Almighty God, declare him to have forfeited the pontificate; and if he does not voluntarily resign it, we ordain that he be for ever deprived of it. Sigonius, who also mentions this decree, uses these words, manifestum necromanticum, Pythonico spiritu laborantem: A plain necromancer, possessed by the spirit of Pytho'

[N] The emperor gained two battles. . . . notwithstanding the Pope's prophecies. Hildebrand, in order to encourage Rodolphus and the Saxons, assured them, that he knew, by revelation, That a false king was near Mantua, over the countess Mathilda's troops, resolved to go and settle his Anti-Pope at Rome. He effected it after many difficulties, and had the satisfaction of forcing his enemy to fly from Rome, and to retire to Salerno. Pope Gregory VII died there the 24th of May 1085 (i). It is no easy thing to give a particular account of his actions with any certainty; for, besides that the writers, who speak of him, confuse one another [O], it cannot be denied, that his enemies appear too passionate, and that what they say of his being a magician, looks altogether like a fiction [P].

to die that very year, which he understood of the emperor Henry IV; and if it be not true, added he, I desire to be no longer Pope; nay, if it does not happen before St Peter's day. Du Pleſſis Mornai (32), who had this from Siebert, observes, that Rodolphus, depending on that oracle, renewed the battle four times, others say six times, and not only lost it, but also his right hand, wherewith he had sworn to the emperor, and also his life. Coëffeteau answers (33), that cardinal Baronius had prevented that calumny, and showed that Gregory never pretended to the revelations, his enemies fastened upon him; but only that he affirmed in general, trusting to GOD's mercy, and the justice of his cause, that GOD would destroy his enemies, and that his friends would shortly be uppermost; but without fixing any day, as he had been falsely charged with it by the schismatics. 'From whence, says Baronius, Gregory's enemies took occasion to calumniate him, and to call him a false prophet, as if he had foretold that Henry should quickly die, and many other things of that nature. Though, the truth is, he never pretended to say that by a prophetic spirit, but according to the usual course of things; for it frequently happens, that men reap according as they have sowed. And therefore Gregory, relying upon the justice of his cause, was confident that God would make it prevail; which, says he, all things duly considered, will be found to be true; for Henry and his adherents came to a miserable end.' The reply, that was made to Coëffeteau, was this: He should have considered, that Baronius says this, upon occasion of a letter written by Gregory to his fellow bishops, and other faithful; and it is true, that the words of that letter may bear such an interpretation. But this does not prove that the Pope did not speak otherwise elsewhere. And, indeed, the charge laid upon him concerns quite another thing, not contained in a letter, but spoken in a public sermon, which he preached in his pontifical habit. The words run thus: Do not look upon me hereafter as a Pope, but turn me out from the altar, if this prophecy be not fulfilled on St Peter's day. It fell out, that the assassins, who had been bribed, could not strike the intended blow, in order to fulfil the prophecy; so that, to justify himself, he pretended that his words were only to be understood of the death of the emperor's soul, because he had not been able to kill his body (34).

It is plain, that du Pleſſis's objection remains in its full force, since Coëffeteau's answer, taken from Baronius, is altogether insignificant. We may therefore affirm, that Hildebrand pretended to foretell things, which quickly proved false by the event. Mind these words of Father Maimbourg (35). He wrote circular letters to all the faithful, particularly to those of the province of Ravenna, to persuade them to engage in a confederacy with the Norman princes against the anti-Pope. He also wrote to the princes of Germany, and exhorted them to make war against Henry, promising all of them, that they should obtain a glorious victory. But it fell out unluckily for him, that the success proved quite contrary to what he had so confidently assured them of; for, three weeks after he wrote those letters, bearing date the twenty second of September, the armies of Henry and Rodolphus came to a furious engagement on the fifth of October, upon the banks of the river Elleſtre near Merſburg in Saxony (36). Here is a dilemma: either Hildebrand believed, that his prediction would come to pass, or he did not believe it. If he believed it, he must be called a false prophet; if he did not believe it, but only designed to encourage the rebels, he ought to be called an impostor, who, by an execrable policy, sacrificed the sacredness of prophecy, and the honour of the holy name of God, to his temporal interest. We have seen, in our days, some interpreters of the Apocalypse, who may be confounded by a like dilemma. Hildebrand's craft puts me in mind of the article DEJOTARUS (37). Those, who pretend to foretell things to come, take care above all things to have a brazen face, and an inexhaustible source of equivocations, in order to explain events in their favour, though they be never so contrary to them. If the enemies meet with worldly prosperity, they say, they grow more obdurate, and that it is the true misery, that was foretold by them. See how Hildebrand applies to the death of the soul, what he ventured to foretell concerning the emperor's death. Of what use could it be to Rodolphus, that the emperor Henry IV should be damned after a certain number of years, if, before that, Rodolphus was to be killed in a battle gained by that emperor? what sense was there in foretelling the damnation of Henry IV, a prince, who was quickly to triumph over his rival? if Gregory VII had been a true prophet, that triumph would have been the first thing foretold by him. This I observe, to shew the vanity of that Pope's subterfuge.

[O] The writers, who speak of him, confuse one another. It is certain, that they run into extremes, some against Pope Gregory VII, and others against the emperor Henry IV. The modern historian, I have often cited, describes this so happily, that I rather choose to use his expressions, than my own. 'That (38) Maimboudi quarrel, says he (38), which divided all Europe, and armed one part of it against the other, did so prepossess and heat the authors, that wrote of it, that I may very well affirm, there never was seen so much animosity, bitterness, and rage, as appears in the works of those, who have undertaken to vindicate either of those parties, and who, by reason of their passion and prejudices, run into extremes. For, besides that they are not sparing of the most injurious words, against all the rules, I will not say of Christianity, but of common morality, and even humanity; some, after the schismatical cardinal Benno, revile in a most horrid manner the memory of Gregory VII, and represent him as the most wicked and execrable of all men: and others, on the contrary, will have it, that he had all the perfections requisite in a pontiff, and bestow upon him the greatest encomiums they can think of.' The better to judge of the historians of that time, it will not be improper to consider what was written for or against the league under Henry III, and Henry IV. How many false stories and calumnies were then published? I forbear alledging any instance of a later date; and I am persuaded, that those, who are most prepossessed, will grant me, that future ages would be very unjust, should they judge of our principal actors quite, by the libels daily printed on both sides, in which every body vents, with the utmost confidence, not what he knows, but what he forges and takes up in the streets. I write this in the year 1695.

[P] What they say of his being a magician has all the air of a fiction. Cardinal Benno says (39), that he learned magic of Theophilactus, who was renege. One day Pope Benedict IX, of Laurence his companion, of the archbishop of Meli, and of John arch-priest of San Giovanni Porta Latina, who was Pope Gregory VI, who, by conversing with devils, and the flying and singing of birds (40), pretended to know what passed in the remotest countries, the success of wars, and the death of princes. That, as long as they lived, even when they were Popes, he was the immediately chief minister and accomplice of their fascinations. The Porta Magiore. That, one day, coming from Alba, he left behind him a book of necromancy, he used to carry about him, which perceiving, when he came to the gate of the Lateran, he sent back two of his truly friends to fetch it, strictly forbidding them to look into it: but their curiosity prompted them to read it, and immediately the angels of Satan appeared to them in great numbers, who frightened them almost out of their senses, &c. That it was an usual thing with him, when he shook his sleeves, to send out fire and flames, and the like. Coëffeteau complains (41) of Du Pleſſis's et cetera. (41) Ubi supra, pag. 704.

However it be, I can affirm, that no Pope was ever so well or so ill spoken of as our Gregory VII. Many miracles are ascribed to him, and he has been placed in the catalogue of saints (k). It is said, that his body was found almost entire five hundred years after his death [Q]; and we may very well wonder at the uncertainty of history, when we read the apologies published by his favourers [R].

The
(k) See the Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans, April, 1689, pag. 166, 167, in the extract of the Acta Sanctorum Mail, Tom. VI, & VII, in which is the life of Gregory VII.

He forgets the best, says he: for Benno adds, that the wicked spirits urged those two servants to tell them why they had called for them, and given them so much trouble: command us quickly to do what you desire we should do, said those devils to the servants, otherwise we will fall upon you, and torment you. Whereupon the youngest said to them, pull down those walls quickly: pointing at the high walls of Rome, which was near: at the same instant those spirits threw down the walls of Rome, and the two young men, making the sign of the cross, returned to their master in a great fright. Coëffeteau will have it, that Du Pleffis was ashamed to insert this last story in his book, no author of that age having mentioned this overthrow of the walls of Rome. God forbid that I should suspect Du Pleffis of having designedly left out the most fabulous part of Benno's passage; but I dare say, he had not done amiss, if he had omitted his Et cætera upon such an occasion. His apologist charges Coëffeteau with a falsification. He should not, says he (42), have put in the margin, that no author of that age mentions the overthrow of the walls of Rome. Benno does not mention it neither: he only says of that young man, offendit illis muros altos vicinos Romæ, quos in momento maligni spiritus dejecerunt: that he showed them some high walls near Rome, which were immediately pulled down by those evil spirits: and therefore he said nothing of the walls of Rome, near which some old walls might fall down, though the historians do not mention it. The sincerity I pretend to does not allow me to declare against Coëffeteau: for I am persuaded he is wrongfully censured: Muros altos vicinos Romæ are the very walls of Rome, from which those two men were at a small distance, and not some other walls, that were in the neighbourhood of Rome. This is an instance of the equivocations of the Latin tongue. How many disputes do they not occasion?

Here follows the judgment Naudé made of cardinal Benno's narrative. 'I can hardly believe, says he, that such strange things can be said of the most profligate man in the world, as this author relates of that Pope, and occasionally of Sylvester II, John XX, XXI, and Benedict IX, who, as he says, by virtue of his magic, made women run after him through woods and mountains, and foretold things to come. But these stories are nothing, if compared with what he adds concerning archbishop Laurence, who very well understood the language of birds, and Gregory VII, who threw the holy host into the fire, attempted upon the emperor's life, caused six Popes to be poisoned by his confidant Gerard Bratzus, and had so well learned magic of Theophylactus and Laurence, Sylvester's disciples, that he sent out fire by shaking his arms, and a thundering noise out of his sleeves. But this author is too full of such stories to be credited; and since he had a mind to slander the Popes, he should have done it with more modesty and judgment (43). Satirical writers should continually think upon these last words. They will do too much, and do not enough, Ipsa sibi obstat magnitudo (44): they discredit true matters of fact by mixing several false stories with them. It were better for them to leave out some things, than to add needless ones (45). The maxim, dimidium plus toto (46), should be their constant rule. Father Maimbourg (47) observes, that the calumnies, published against Gregory VII, came to nothing, because they were too venomous, too grossly invented by men blinded with passion, and highly improbable.

[Q] It is said, that his body was found almost entire five hundred years after his death. He was buried at Salerno in St Matthew's church, which he consecrated not long before he died. His body was searched for in the year 1573, and it was found clothed with pontifical ornaments. The following epitaph was added to it (48). 'Gregorio VII. Soanenfi Pont. Opt. Max. D. 1085, May 25. This epitaph was inscribed by Marc Anthony Columna, archbishop of Salerno, having found his body, after about 500 years interment, clothed in the pontifical habit, and almost entire: A. D. 1578. June 30. in the Reign of Gregory XIII. He was placed in the Roman Martyrology in the year 1584, and his festival was celebrated in 1595 (49).

[R] The apologies published by his favourers. He who most signalized himself for this Pope was a German Jesuit (50): he produces fifty holy and learned authors, as he calls them, who gave a good character of Gregory VII. Amongst whom he reckons Paulus Bernriedensis, and Gerocus, or Gerobus Reicherpergensis. Du Pleffis thought (51), that this Gerocus wrote the Life of Gregory VII, and has quoted some thing from him upon the credit of Aventinus. But he is charged with a double mistake: His adversaries maintain (52), 1. That Gerocus did not write that life, but only mentioned (53) several things relating to that Pope's quarrel with the emperor. 2. That he does not say what du Pleffis quotes him for. Gerocus's book, published at Ingoldstadt in the year 1611, is alledged in order to prove it. Rivet replies (54), that one is not obliged to depend on that edition, as being procured by the Jesuit Greiser, who perhaps left out what he thought fit. This Jesuit maintains (55), that the Words, ascribed to Gerocus, are Aventinus's. He talks in a very haughty strain against those, who shall be so bold as to doubt still of Pope's innocence, after his apology, and the pieces published by Sebastian Tegnagel, the emperor's library-keeper. 'Quid Benno & Sigebertus, Gregorii VII. calumniatores, si conferantur cum tot sanctissimis & doctissimis scriptoribus à parte Gregorii VII. stantibus, quorum in apologia pro eodem pontifice, quinquaginta protulimus, recitatis eorum verbis; ex quibus nonnulli interea integri in lucem venerunt, ut Paulus Bernriedensis, & Gerocus, seu Gerobus Reicherpergensis, ut tacem præclara illa antiquorum monumenta, quæ in defensionem Gregorii VII. jam olim scripta, nuper ex tenebris eruit vir clarissimus dominus Sebastianus Tegnagel, J. U. D. Cæsareus Viennæ bibliothecarius, quorum fulgore tam præcorum, quam recentium in Gregorium VII. convicia adeo obnubilantur, ut jam non nisi à noctuis, ululis, vespertilionibus & nycticoracibus, & si quæ sunt aliæ hujus generis caliginis patientes, lucis impatientes aves, conspiciantur (56). — What are Benno and Sigebert, the calumniators of Gregory VII, when compared with so many holy and learned writers, favourers of that Pope, fifty of whom I have produced, in my apology for him: Among whom, some have come to light entire, as Paulus Bernriedensis, and Gerocus, or Gerobus Reicherpergensis; to say nothing of those excellent remains of antiquity, which, having been formerly written in defence of Gregory VII, were lately brought to light by Sebastian Tegnagel, doctor of the laws, the emperor's librarian at Vienna: by the lustre of which, both ancient and modern, the calumnies against Gregory VII are so darkened, that, at present, they are visible only to owls, and bats, and such like birds of the night.'

Is it possible that Aventinus should be guilty of what is laid to his charge? It is affirmed, that, in order to abuse the Popes more maliciously, he pretended to have found in old books the satirical reflexions, he had himself forged. 'Quis vel obiter in Aventino versatus nescit, Aventinum sine fronte in pontifices maledicta jacere, & ne impudentiæ aculetur mentiris talia à veteribus vel dicta vel prodita de pontificibus, cum

The anonymous writer of a book, intituled, l'Esprit des cours de l'Europe (1), which comes out monthly, has made a reflexion, which I shall examine. It concerns what I have said in the remark [B], concerning the Popes conquests. He thinks they were not so difficult as I imagine [S], and that one ought rather to wonder they have not been
